LOVE. I stayed till the last, low prayer was said,
And the living stood by the silent dead;
And our sister Peace, who cometh now,
With her soft, bright eye and holy brow,
I left her there by the mourner's side,
To soothe the heart so sorely tried.
Sweet sister, O say hast thou found a home,
Has the world a spot, thou canst call thy own?

PEACE. Sisters, we met at the infant's bed,
O'er his rosy sleep my spirit I shed,
And left ye there—and to manhood turned,
His cheek was flushed and his forehead burned:
Too much of earthly passion was there,
And I turned where a maiden knelt in prayer,

And I dwelt with her till her spirit fled,
And the mortal frame lay still and dead.
But 'twas not my home, and sisters sweet,
I pined for a spot where we all might meet.

LOVE AND JOY. Long time we stood by that infant's bed,
O'er his rosy path our spirits shed,
And scattered flowers around his way,
And taught his little hands to play.
We watched him well, till manhood came,
And with it ardent hopes of fame,
Till his soul grew sick in his weary way,
Till his heart almost forgot to pray,
We left him then with his empty name,
For love and joy dwell not with fame!

LONG-SUFFERING. Hail, sisters sweet, we meet once more,
Have ye found where are your wanderings o'er?
For I fain would know where ye come from a scene,
Where, my dear ones, ye all have been.
A close, a dim, a stifled room,
Where sorrow and sickness have found a home,
There's an aching brow, there's a breaking heart,
There's a soul that longs from earth to part,
Still bearing on as it ever hast,
Through all the woes of the bitter past,
And murmuring not, but in deepest trust
Awaiting the mandate 'dust to dust!'—
Twin sisters sweet, I left ye there,
Has he met his God with trustful prayer?

GENTLENESS AND GOODNESS. He waiteth the summons,
And calmly he lies,
As lieth the clouds,
In the sunset skies,
And calmly as sinketh
The sun to his rest,
So sinketh he now
On his Master's breast.
We have smoothed his pillow,
And cheered his heart,
And taken from death,
The bitterest smart.
We left him with Faith,
And she cometh now,
With her beaming eye
And her glorious brow.

FAITH. He has gone to his God,—triumphant he passed,
Undimmed is his glory,—high trust to the last;
I stood by his side, till the last look was given,
I stood by his side till his soul was in Heaven!
Why meet we here? Can we find no home,
Hath the earth no place we can call our own?
Hath the world no spot where we all may dwell,
And know not and fear not a sad farewell?
Say sister meek, what tale dost thou bring,
Through what scenes hast thou passed, with thy gentle wing?

MEEKNESS. The gentle of earth,
My spirit loves best,
With the young and pure,
I find sweet rest.
I soar not afar—
My flights are not high—
I dwell in a tone,
In the glance of an eye.
In the mother who gazes
With heartfelt joy,
And watches the sports
Of her infant boy.

FAITH. But sister, sweet sister, I've met thee oft,
Thy voice is so low, and thy tone so soft,
Thou art loved by all, and the glad and gay,
Both welcome thy coming, and urge thy stay.
But the last of our sister band is nigh,
With her glad, free step, and joyous eye,

As if she had brought whole realms at her feet,
Say what are thy tidings, sister sweet?

TEMPERANCE. Sisters all hail! and I am the last;
O'er all the world has my spirit passed,
The work has begun—the mighty, the strong,
And nations have blessed it, and loud is the song Which swells o'er the earth. The wicked hath turned
From his wayward path, and the heart that spurned
At all that is good, is a suppliant now,
And low at the feet of a Savior must bow.
Do we meet to rejoice? O there is deep joy,
Where the mother weeps o'er her penitent boy.
Do we meet to mourn o'er the sins of earth?
Then gird on our armor, and go we forth,
To soften the hearts of mankind by our power,
For high is our gift, and glorious our dower;
But which of our band, O say can tell
Where again we shall meet and say not farewell?

FAITH. If we all meet again,
On the earth ne'er to part,
Sweet sisters 'twill be,
In the christian's heart.
But the home of our spirits,
On earth is not given,
It is with our God,
Mid the glories of Heaven.

Orphan Asylums.

DISCOURSE BY REV. A. CASE.

AMONG the amiable proofs of the divine spirit and power of christianity, are the benevolent institutions which have sprung up under her fostering care, and by which christendom is distinguished in the annals of society. And these we deem to be the legitimate fruits of the gospel—the out-workings of the indwelling spirit of love and good will; and according as that spirit attains to the sovereignty, all antagonist institutions will cease to find support. It is beautiful to picture to the mind the home of Orphans, where christian benevolence labors to supply the place of the dead, and shield the unprotected from the evils of a stern world. This is like that beautiful feature in the Prussian government, presented in the fact that the children of criminals are educated at the public expense, that they may not be led in wrong paths and be brought to an abode of shame. Let the institution that shelters and blesses the Orphan, be richly endowed; its success builds up the true glory of a people; and the peculiar blessings of the God of Love will rest upon its benefactors. Within the walls of the Orphan's home let the Gospel be heard, for it hath a richer balm than human skill can compound, and opens a vista through which the eye of faith can look to everlasting life, bliss, and progress.

These remarks have been called forth by the reception of an unpublished discourse preached in the Orphan House Chapel, in the city of Charleston, S. C., before the inmates of the Orphan House, Sept. 13, 1840, by Rev. Albert Case, entitled, "Children Admonished," which we now present to our readers.

'CHILDREN, obey your parents in all things: for this is well pleasing unto the Lord.' COL. iii. 20.

IN addressing you my young friends, upon the words just read to you, I am not unaware that the orphanage of the grave has forever forbid the ears of many of you from hearing the admonitions of a fond parent, and has alike shut from your earthly view one or both of the natural guardians of your early life, whose duty it would have been, to have guided you by a ceaseless watchfulness to a knowledge of the requirements of your Father in heaven, and to the practice of every commendable virtue. Notwithstanding this, the injunction of the Apostle is not the less imperative upon you. The laws of the land, and what are much stronger—the laws of nature and nature's God, made it a bounden duty of your earthly parents to watch over, provide for, and protect you in your state of infancy to manhood.

Your heavenly Father, with a providential care that never sleeps, has raised up for you guardians of your every want, who cheerfully discharge the sacred trust which would have devolved upon your natural guardians. Obedience to those who watch over this institution, is therefore a duty you have to perform, and the correct discharge of it, will be well pleasing unto the Lord. When your mother who rocked you to repose, was snatched from your cradle—when your father, whose daily toil provided for you food and raiment, was gathered to his fathers—when the deep blue vaulted arch above you, was your only shelter, the trustees of the noble institution in which you reside, fed you, clothed you and sheltered you in comfort. Nor did their care cease with the supplying of your animal wants. As your young and tender minds began to expand, they provided you with the best instructors to cultivate your mind and fit you for usefulness. Nay, this is not all, they provided for your moral culture, and on each returning sabbath they gather you in this holy temple, to learn from this desk, the high and paramount duties you owe to your God. How deep, how boundless, how fervent should be your gratitude to that Being, who has thus imbued your fellow-men with that charity which is so benignantly extended towards you, and which provides for your every want. When on your bended knees you bow before the throne of an all-merciful God, let solemn prayer for their temporal and eternal good, unite with the incense of your grateful hearts.

Children obey your parents in all things. Separate and apart from the apostolic injunction, young as you are, you cannot fail to see the reasonableness of this requirement. In the economy of the human family, parents are clothed with wisdom and experience, before the rich blessing of children is allowed them. They must have passed through the many ills and temptations which are calculated to overwhelm such as are seduced from the paths of virtue. In all the vicissitudes through which they may have passed, they will have learned the necessity of looking to their Redeemer for strength and support. Hence it will be their first great duty to teach you the obligations you owe to that all-bountiful Being who continually watches over you for good. They will also teach you never to lean upon the arm of flesh for support, but to put all your trust in your Father which is in Heaven, who is the only shield and buckler that can protect you from all harm.

Before the light of revelation dawned upon the world, the Roman matron taught her children that the first great duty they owed, was to the gods they worshipped. With this better and more cheering light to guide you, how much more diligent should you be, in learning the great duties required of you by your Maker. These are plainly set forth in the sacred volume, in language so clear, that the youngest of you may fully understand them. Mark how direct is the injunction of the Apostle: 'Children, obey your parents in all things.' When God gave the law to Moses, which was to govern in all after time not only the Patriarchs and the holy Prophets, but the whole created universe, he made it imperative upon children to honor their fathers and their mothers, that their days might be long in the land which was their possession from him. Thus you will perceive, my young hearers, the injunction of the text is one which you never should infringe, for it proceeds from God. Obedience to it produces peace of mind and true happiness. It gives comfort to domestic enjoyment, and as the Apostle assures you, is well pleasing to the Lord. Considered, therefore, as the solace of your earthly guardians,—a grateful incense to the Lord, and the guarantee of a long and happy life, how implicitly should you yield a ready obedience to your parents, and the guardians of this institution. Such are some of the positive good effects of honoring your parents. I will now advert to some of the evils (for there are many, and all of them cannot be foreseen) of a different course of conduct. One of the duties required of you here is the cultivation and improvement of your minds, by the aid of instruction. If from a perverse and froward disposition, or any other cause, you neglect your studies, and are ushered into the world with barren, uncultivated minds, unfitted for employment in any useful business, idleness, dissipation, with their attendant evils, and perhaps deeper crime, and an unnatural death, may be the result. In all large cities, the houses of correction and refuge are filled with children whose ignorance has driven them to crimes of every description. Their moral natures have never been cultivated—they have never been taught their high and solemn duties to God, whose name they blaspheme, and whose laws they violate. They have neglected the opportunities which you enjoy, if they were held out to them of enlightening their understandings, and improving their minds, and shame, disgrace and punishment, are the inevitable consequences. Look around among your own acquaintance, in the narrow circle in which you move, and say, whether those who obey their parents in all things, and reverence their Father in heaven, are not the best cultivated in mind, and happier far, than the idle and dissolute. If you know this to be the fact, of itself, it is incentive enough to animate you in the pursuit of a like course of conduct.

God, for wise purposes, no doubt, (for he is all-wise) has created us, and made us subject to vanity—imperfection is our lot; and all he requires of us to do, is to imitate his own attributes of perfection as far as we are able. The command of the blessed Savior and Redeemer of the world, in his sermon on the Mount, is, 'Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.' It is our duty to strive to attain to all that is excellent in a character of all love and perfection. And however much we may fall short, and we all do, He who knows every sentiment of our hearts, as well as the weaknesses and frailties of his children, will give us increase of strength according to our zealous and steadfast perseverance to do his will. If, my young hearers, you enter upon the duties of life with a benighted mind, the chances are as ten to one that you fall into bad company, which is the sure forerunner of every evil. Men of adult age, find it very difficult to withstand the corrupting influence of bad company. And if they sometimes are ensnared, what can be expected of the young who associate with the vile? When, therefore, you see youths profaning the sabbath day, blaspheming their Maker, disobeying their parents, wrangling and fighting, or indulging in what is by them considered fashionable dissipation, shun them as you would a moral pestilence. The serpent's poison which flows from his sting, does not more swiftly and stealthily pursue its rapid course to the heart, than the contagious influence of evil communications. There is less to be dreaded in approaching a lion's den, than in running into the company of the ignorant and wicked. For the lion, when satisfied to satiety, will not leave his lair for what he does not at the moment want. But in the increase of the unnumbered votaries of vice, there is no satiety; and as the roll swells and proselytes increase, like the poetic description of ill fame which enlarges as it progresses, so does it gain redoubled strength and vigor in its multiplied numbers. The physical world has certain bounds and limits, but not so the moral world—there are no limits to charity, there is no limit to love and reverence to our Father in heaven. Man's capacities it is true, are circumscribed, because he is finite. But God is infinite, and his every attribute springs from his boundless love. He is just to his children, because he loves them—he is merciful to his children because he loves them—he is omnipresent with his children because he loves them. In short, the whole created universe, moral and material, is sustained, supported, protected and guided by infinite love. Why have the founders of this benevolent institution supplied you with competent instructors to improve your intellectual faculties? Why have they reared this sacred temple, and why do they kneel with you before this altar in devout prayer? Why do they unite in the solemn anthem with the deep notes of the breathing organ in singing praises to the Most High? Because they wish to promote your happiness, which can be done so effectually in no other way than by that mental improvement which will enable you to know the great ends for which you were created, as regards your duties to your God and your fellow-men.

There is another reason why you should pursue with unceasing industry every means which will improve and cultivate your minds. Solomon has said, 'Hear ye children the instruction of a father. Get wisdom, get understanding—forsake her not, and she shall preserve thee; love her, and she shall keep thee.' You, my young friends, are placed in a nation whose existence depends upon the wisdom and virtue of her sons. This is the most free nation on earth. The standard of civil and religious liberty has been planted here by your forefathers; and since they have been gathered to their tombs, you are left to guard the great and glorious inheritance, and hand it down to your children without a spot or blemish upon the bright halo that encircles it. In other lands, birth, wealth, or other adventitious circumstances, give preferment and distinction; but in this, our more favored country, there is no post of honor so high, no place so sacred, which the humblest individual among you may not aspire to. That distinction which is ordained by the constitution or municipal laws of a nation, which attaches to the puling infant in the cradle, and grows into adolescence with the possessor, is like a rush-light to the sun in its meridian effulgence, when compared with the high honors which are won from a nation's gratitude and love in despite of birth, poverty and want. The great orb of day in his ascent, sheds light upon the earth; but how much more rich and gorgeous are the brilliant and diversified hues which he leaves us when the natural horizon has hid him from our view. Do not, therefore, my dear children, be discouraged in your efforts to reach a high and honorable distinction, and thus be enabled at all times, to render to your country that essential service which you may be called on to perform. The field, the flood, and the forum, have already borne testimony to the usefulness of this valuable institution. Which of you may not yet be the instrument in the hands of God who ruleth and judgeth in the earth, to breast the invaders of your country, and preserve her honor inviolate and her liberties secure? Which one of you may not, at some future day, hold a listening Senate spell-bound by the resistless flow of eloquence in the cause of civil or religious freedom? May not some one of you yet be the American Homer to tell in song the deeds of the illustrious dead,—or the modern Praxiteles or Phidias to decorate some mighty temple erected to the memories of the patriots and statesmen of this great republic? Or may it not be in reserve for some one of you to guide the faithful pen of history, (like our own Bancroft) and give to futurity the important events of the present and passing time with no coloring but that of truth? O yes! These high distinctions may be reached by the most humble among you. But remember, my young hearers, this important fact, that it is by obedience to your parents, and above all, by a ready and heartfelt devotion to your Father in heaven, that can alone crown your efforts with success. He giveth the strength to overcome all things. He will not be always deaf to the entreaties of his children. The way that leads to the temple of fame is difficult and steep, and you must look to God for strength in all things.

By your intellectual improvement, you will be enabled to see the mighty truths of natural and revealed religion—the mind will be insensibly and irresistibly drawn from the vast field of all that is animate or inanimate, to the great Creator and Governor of the universe, and to the revelations contained in this sacred volume which brings life and immortality to light. Here you cannot contemplate without the most heart-felt emotion, the great love of your divine Father, who when the world was dead in trespasses and sins, gave his only begotten Son to take away the sin of the world. How sublime, how transcendently sublime, was the advent of the heavenly messenger who announced the birth of a 'Savior of the world,' to the alarmed and wondering shepherds on the plains of Bethlehem! What a deep and impressive manifestation did it give of God's guardian watchfulness over his children, his erring children of earth! We cannot, by a long life of devotion, repay the debt of gratitude and reverence we owe to our heavenly Father. From him did the command first proceed, 'Honor thy father and thy mother.' 'Obey your parents in all things.' Gratitude to God should inspire you all with a desire to obey his commands, and the blessing which flows from obedience should urge you onward to the performance of this duty. The exertions of this community—of the commissioners and teachers, which are made in your behalf, are called forth by a desire to cultivate your intellectual and moral faculties, to guard you from the seductions of vice—to fit you for your high and holy duties—to provide for the welfare of after generations;—in fine to banish ignorance and sin, and cause the power of correct principles to be exerted to the promotion of moral purity and righteousness. This is a heavenly desire, it was implanted in their hearts by that great Being, who is the source of love and goodness.

Can you, my young hearers, be so blind to your own welfare, and so ungrateful to these dear friends—so heedless of the requirements of your Father in heaven, as to give no heed to their counsel, and disobey these affectionate parents? The same principle of love which glows in their hearts toward you, and which is an emanation from the all-perfect God, was manifested to a great extent by the Lord Jesus, who labored, and suffered, and died upon the cross to enlighten and save and bless the world. Behold him in that painting* with all the love of a devoted friend—hear him say, ‘Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God.’ ‘And he took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them.’ Think you, my dear children, those favored ones that Jesus received into his sacred arms and blessed, could disobey him? O, were not their souls drawn out in love and affection to him? And can you wilfully disobey these kind friends, who, like our Savior, have stretched out their hands, saying, ‘Suffer poor and afflicted children to come to us at this Orphan House, and receive the blessing of support and instruction at our hands’? No! You will love them for their care and attention, for their labors and prayers by day and by night to improve your condition, and make you wise, useful and happy—and loving them you will obey them. The Prodigal Son, respecting whom a worthy and devoted minister,† discoursed to you last sabbath—when he was received to his father’s embrace, clothed with a new robe, a ring put on his finger, and made welcome by that father, no longer desired to disobey him. The father’s goodness overcame him, he became dead to sin and alive to righteousness. He was then anxious to please his father, for he loved him, and the history does not inform us that he ever disobeyed that kind father again.

The pious Dr. Doddridge who wrote the life of Col. James Gardner, represents him as having been a very sinful man; his moral character as black as that of the Prodigal Son. But, as he himself related, as he sat reading at night, he thought an unusual light fell on the book. Looking up, he saw suspended in the air, as he thought, a visible representation of the Lord Jesus Christ upon the cross; and he heard a voice, saying, ‘Oh sinner, did I suffer this for thee, and are these the returns.’ He felt that he had been all his life-time crucifying Christ afresh by his sin; he now saw what he had done, and at the same time was impressed with a thought of the majesty and goodness of God, which caused him to loathe sin and desire to be righteous. He saw his Savior pierced for his transgressions, and the disposition of his mind was changed, he became an obedient, exemplary christian. He says, ‘he saw and felt the love of God and the Savior to such a degree, as to swallow up his whole heart in returns of love, which from that time became the genuine and delightful principle of obedience, and animated him with an enlarged heart to run the way of God’s commands.’ My dear children, have you ever disobeyed the commands of these friends and teachers; think how much they have grieved; how they have wept, and prayed God to make you turn to obedience; and be constrained by their love for you, to cease to cause them sorrow, but love and obey them. I desire you to remember that by obedience to the Apostle’s injunction you will act in accordance with the requirement of the Savior and the command of God; for the text proceeds from the law of God, a law of higher power than any human authority, and far more sacred. It is a law based in that principle of love, which is deeper than the foundations of the mountains, and which is

Though your friends and teachers in this institution are not called to suffer death, like the Savior, or like the array of martyrs whose garments lie rolled in blood for their exertions in behalf of humanity, yet they are called to endure much toil and labor, to make sacrifices of money and time for you; and if need be, perhaps they would risk their life to protect these children. But the latter we trust, will not be required of them; and by imparting of their worldly goods to sustain this benevolent institution, they are enriching the world. By imparting instruction to you, they are employing their talent wisely, not only for your good but for theirs, and that of future generations. Mental, differs from physical wealth, for this reason, in imparting it to you, they do not impoverish themselves. Besides, it is doing good; and this is the way to be great. When the scholar, the philosopher, and the statesman, come down from their high places, as they do here, and walk hand in hand with poor and uneducated children, teaching them the inestimable precepts of wisdom; cultivating their intellectual and moral natures, they exhibit a love for the dignity of man, and afford a manifestation of true greatness. Such employment sheds a bright ray upon the path of the life of those here engaged—one that will not perish when their eyes are dimmed in death; but, in the greenest wreath that memory twines around their tombs, this, this shall be brightest and most lasting. My dear children, can I, need I say more, to cause you to yield a strict and cheerful obedience to the command of the Apostle, 'Obeys your parents in all things.' You enjoy favors and privileges to which many children of wealthy parents are strangers. You enjoy the favor of this whole community, and the constant care and instruction of the commissioners and teachers. You have also in addition to this, the high privilege of listening to the instruction of the ministers of the Lord Jesus, on each returning sabbath.

These favors and blessings all come from God, whose commands you should obey. It is his love, manifested in and through Jesus Christ, shed abroad in the hearts of this people, and these teachers and the ministers of God who address you here, that incites them to labor in your behalf. Let me entreat you, then, to remember, it is the love of God our Father, that has been exercised in raising up for you guardians, protectors, and teachers; and it is the same principle which prompts them to endure fatigue, and sacrifice much for your good. I beseech you, therefore, my dear children, be not unmindful of God, nor ungrateful to those who are devoted to your well-being; but by all your love of the Father, and of his Son who died for you, by all that esteem and affection you cherish for your friends and teachers, by all your desires to be wise and virtuous, by all your hopes of a long life, of happiness and peace, and of the approbation of God, 'Obeys your parents in all things.'

ODDITY NO PROOF OF WISDOM. Some people affect to differ from the world in general merely for the purpose of obtaining notoriety, and with the hope of being talked about. But those who seek distinction in this way, deserve nothing better than the obscurity from which they are attempting to emerge. Men of sense always conform to custom when they can do so without material inconvenience or the sacrifice of any important principle.

'I would not Live Alway.'

'I WOULD not live alway!' this earth has no charms,
To keep me, my Savior, away from thine arms;
My spirit is weary, and yearns for the rest
That waits the freed soul in the land of the blest.

Grant, Father divine! that this frame may decay,
When the flowers of Summer are fading away;
The leaves, as they fall, my fit monument be,
And autumn winds sigh forth a requiem for me.

Let me die in the gladness, and spring-time of youth,
While life bears the semblance of beauty and truth;
Ere friends prove false-hearted, or pleasures decay,
From sin and from suffering, take me away!

'I would not live alway!'—I joy in the trust,
That when this frail form shall return to the dust,
My spirit shall rise on the wings of thy love,
To seek its true home in the mansions above!

A Vision of the Night.

I stood in an elegant mansion, surrounded with a circle of friends, when a brother in the ministry entered, wearing a solemn and a sorrowful countenance, and silently handed me a scrap of paper. He gave me one look of unutterable import, that told of stern and violent thoughts within, and then silently left me. I opened the paper and read—written in hurried and irregular pencil marks—the following: 'Br. Bacon, Write on this question—"Are there not in life more struggles against evils, than for peace?"'

I had no sooner perused the note than I awoke, but the impression of the dream was as of a reality. I engaged in my morning duties, but that question still lingered before my vision, and I read it again and again. I pondered on its import, and strove to divine some cause for the proposition, as I vividly recalled the sad and solemn aspect of the querist. I then thought it might have been intended for my good, and 'Write!' was again the exhortation. I grasped my pen, resolved to let thought lead it as it would, and follow in humble hope of good. I follow now the dark stream of ink that flows from my pen, as I have sometimes traced a shadow which led to a beautiful object, and have there been fed with strange fruit of thought as I meditated on the varied working of one law—for there I beheld infinite beauties of colors all created by the same white light, as the sunshine of one happy idea will wake smiles on many countenances—all beautiful, but how varied!

And what did the spirit of my dream mean by the query? Alas, half our troubles arise, and half of our speech is wasted, because of the indefiniteness of language. We discuss for hours, and lo! our labor is all vain, because we pronounce Shibboleth, Sibboleth. Glorious will be that era when God shall 'turn to the people a pure language, that they may all call upon the Lord, to serve him with one consent.'

Yet though words are equivocal in their meaning, I must write—and write on the question too. But I cannot write a decision in one word, yes, or nay, though in more I may sin against the law of fact; for it is by struggling against evils that true peace is brought to the soul. 'Through suffering, the race, as the individual, is perfected,' said a thinker; and is it not written that the Captain of our salvation was made perfect 'through suffering;' that partakers of the sufferings of Christ, shall be partakers of his consolations; that Paul desired to know the fellowship of his Master's sufferings, in hope of his spirit being conformed to the self-sacrifice in Christ's death; that a man should offer thanks if he have power to endure grief, suffering wrongfully, for conscience toward God; that if any man suffer as a christian, he should not be ashamed, but should glorify God on this behalf—that he has this spirit of endurance. 'My brethren,' saith St. James, 'count it all joy when ye fall into (not when ye rush into) divers temptations; knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience. But let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing'—as disciples of the true Teacher. 'Take, my brethren,' he saith again, 'the prophets who have spoken in the name of the Lord, for an example of suffering affliction and of patience. Behold, we count them happy which endure.' And how are they to be counted happy? By the same rule that we apply to the prophecies which 'testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow.' It is the struggle against temptations, the endurance of evil, which reveals the glory of humanity—the strength of heart and energy of mind wrapt up in the elements of all beings. Fellowship with the sufferings of Christ is to be desired, for the glory consequent—for the developement given to the noblest attributes of character—for the out-shadowing of the inward divinity. Look into history, and has not the grandeur of man been revealed through suffering? Yea, suffering has been the cradle of genius; and there has ever been a fining-vessel for silver, and a furnace for gold. A glory has always followed suffering for conscience sake—for the True and the Right. Glory in the soul, if not revealed to man, has been the reward; as the strength of every enemy conquered has increased the might of the spirit, till in the omnipotence of its determinate will, it is like the prophet on the mountain encompassed with foes, when he exulted that there was more for him, though all invisible, than were against him. And in that soul there is peace—the struggles have their issues in a heavenly calm. Thus it is that 'the toils of youth make easy the virtues of manhood.'

But the solemn countenance of my brother did not testify that such was his soul's conviction. He was in the struggling state. The oak was swaying to and fro with the violence of the stormy wind; it had not yet known the strength given to its growth and expansion by the struggling. And O it is indeed a severe hour when the whole being is thus engaged—when the storm of thought encompasses every thing, bending the delicatest plant of affection to the earth, and wrestling with the strongest passion. We then seem made for suffering, and the very silence of all nature mocks us. We ask for a voice to speak one word, and we plead with the winds, the clouds, and the stars to pity us. But still the winds blow, the clouds float on, and the stars shine, or veil themselves, and no answer comes. Man and life then become deep mysteries, and not a letter of a divining alphabet is known. The moving world around us is but gilded and darkened vapors, and we ask, 'Whence came ye? Whither are ye going?' We feel that we are on a rolling globe, and our feet totter on the brink of a dark abyss. Thank God, the dream breaks! Down through the infinite travels a voice that speaks to the soul of its home, its Father, and its destiny, and as sweet music echoes in the soul as when the child of the Crescent hears the musical bells which he dreams are hung on the trees of Paradise, and which are put in motion by a wind from the throne of God! The spirit finds its longed for rest, and bows in adoration to conquering Grace. The Millenium is no longer an impossibility, and the heart, full of hope, looks forward to the time—

'When they, whose choice or lot it is to dwell
In crowded cities, without fear shall live, Studios of mutual benefit; and he
Whom morning wakes among sweet dews and flowers,

Be happy in himself. The law of Faith,
Working through Love, such conquest it shall gain,
Such triumph over sin and guilt achieve.'

Let then my soul ponder this truth, that through strugglings against evils the spirit gains possession of the divinest peace. Thus it was with Christ—thus it was with Paul—thus it has been with every christian. Thus it must be with thee, reader, and with humble me. In the strength of this thought, let us stand ready to endure manfully all forms of evil, panopied in the armor of Righteousness and determined to conquer. 'Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good'—good thoughts, good feelings and good actions.

A Sketch from Scripture.

BY MRS. J. R. SPOONER.

THE setting sun, still smiled o'er Syria's plains,
And decked with golden hues the earth and sky—
And Salem's gates, and lofty towers shone bright,
And proudly rose her massy walls on high;
While sparkling fountains played mid cypress groves,
Glitt'ring like diamonds in the sun's warm rays.
And Cedron's brook, wound slowly through the vale,
Reflecting blushes from the roseate sky.
Here too, Moriah's lofty brow was seen,
Exalted far above the hills around—
'The mountain of the Lord,' to which 'twas said,
'All nations were to flow'—the destined site
Of the proud temple reared by David's son.
And where of old Jehovah proved the strength
Of Abraham's faith! And here Siloam's pool,
With its clear crystal waters, flowed along
The mountain's base, with murmurs soft and low.
A battle had been fought—Phillistia's sons
Sought to o'erthrow once more the shepherd king,
Whom God had called to rule the Israelites.
But vain their boasted might, their strength was naught,
The Lord alone, the victory had won!
And David, weary with the battle's heat,
Retired to seek repose—not in rich tents,
Mid luxuries, our modern heroes boast—
But in Adullam's cave, (which once before His refuge proved, when Achish sought to slay,)
He threw his armor down, and faintly leaned Against the broken rock, while drops of sweat
Oozed from his pallid brow—a burning thirst
Seemed to consume his vitals, and his mind
Wandered to Bethlehem, which gave him birth.
The Phillistines possessed this much loved spot—
Whose hills, crowned with the olive and the vine,
A quiet shade cast o'er the hills below—
And cooling streams rushed down their rocky beds,
Singing glad songs of praise to nature's God.
And David longed and said, 'O for a draught
Of the pure spring, that flows by Bethlehem's gate!'
Scarce uttered were the words, ere there arose,
With eager haste to please—his favorite chiefs,
And the three mighty men broke through the host
Of the astonished Phillistine, and bore
Quick to their monarch's hand, the wished for draught.
Then Israel's king arose—a crimson glow
O'erspread his tired brow, till now so pale,
He took the cup, and poured on the ground!
And then, with eyes upturned to heaven, he cried,
Be it far from me, Lord, to do this thing!

The life of man was risked to slake my thirst—
I may not use an off'ring of such cost,
But to the Lord I freely sacrifice
The precious draught I dare not drink—it is
The price of human blood!

A Venetian Incident.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

IN the earlier ages of that Republic which in the days of 'blind old Dandolo' had become so illustrious that its aid was solicited by the most powerful nation of Europe, Isola Clivolo, one of the most desolate and uninhabited portions of the city of Venice, was the scene of an annual religious festival. One morning, the morning of the feast of the Purification, the Lagune was alive with ornamented gondolas, moving to the soft sound of music, and proceeding slowly toward the point of the island where they were to be moored during the joyous festival.

The royal barge of Cleopatra, sailing down the Cydnus, was doubtless infinitely more splendid than the most gorgeous of these Venetian gondo-las; but it may be doubted whether beneath its gold-cloth canopy, beat a happier heart than might be found beneath either of the humbler pavilions.
Agreeably to the custom at that time prevailing in Venice, several betrothed parties, of wealth and high rank, were proceeding to the Cathedral of Santa Maria Formosa, to give public celebration to their espousals.

The blue waters of the Adriatic, who was not yet wedded to her island lord, were sparkling brightly beneath the cloudless sky of Italy, and everything in nature betokened a day of uninterrupted gaiety and love.

'If this be a picture, as some say, of all our after life, what a joyous life it will be, will it not, Bianca?' whispered one of the happy lovers to the fair being at his side.

'Ah! but, Leonardo,— You will call me superstitious, I know; yet I cannot but feel that there is a cloud gathering over us, and that the noonday will find me in tears.'

'Tears of joy they shall be, then, sweet Bianca, unless, indeed, thou art about taking upon thee irksome bonds.'

'Thou well knowest, Leonardo, that no woman ever went more willingly to the altar than I go there with thee. It is not this, believe me, which makes me sad; but I do assure you, some undefined misfortune is approaching us. My heart is like a barometer, Leonardo; it instantly detects the coming of a storm.'

'Thou art a timid bird, fit only for the shelter of the cage. There thou canst sing most sweetly, as I can testify, having often, in our luxurious summer evenings, steered my little barque beneath thy lattice, and lingered there to hear thee warble thy plaintive lays,—Ah! they melted my heart, Bianca!'

'And who was it that touched the soft strings of his guitar in response, and tempted me out upon the balcony, notwithstanding my good nurse's cautions against the evening damps? Those were happy times, were they not, Leonardo?'

'Indeed they were; and is not the present time also happy?'

'Yes, were it not for the shadow of some approaching misfortune.'

'Fie on these apprehensions, Bianca. They are but the illusions of thy deep sensibilities. Certainly, nothing can happen to disturb the joy of our bridal. Are we not in the midst of friends, with a cloudless sky over our heads? And surely all the angels in heaven would league themselves in thy defence, were any danger to threaten us. Drive away these dark fancies, and be thine own gay self again.'

As Leonardo finished these words, the gondolier sprang lightly upon the quay, while the friends that were awaiting them upon the island, crowded around with music and congratulations. One gondola after another continued to arrive, until the whole company was collected upon the shore. Preceded by bands of music, and ranks of kindred, bearing in their hands a profusion of jewels and other bridal gifts, the lovers, two by two, promenaded toward the Cathedral.

It was a brilliant and beautiful procession. Youth, and loveliness, and gay attire; the strains of joyous melody, the glitter of overflowing caskets, the bloom of freshly gathered flowers, all united to present one of the most dazzling scenes that had ever enlivened that desolate retreat.

They entered the beautiful church of Sta. Maria; and as gradually the numerous assembly retired to the galleries, the bridal parties approached the altar. Beside the patriarch, who was to perform the holy functions of his office in uniting so many young and loving hearts in the only ties that were now wanting to complete their happiness, sat the kind old Doge, Candiano, who had come out from his palace to witness and sanction the ceremony. As his eye scanned the youthful group, on no countenance did it rest with a milder benignity than on that of the fair and gentle Bianca. She was the daughter of his only sister, and dearly loved by him for her tender and amiable disposition. He observed the extreme paleness of her cheeks, where usually the blush mantled in the hour of excitement; and saw also that the veil which fell upon her bosom shook with the violent beating of her heart. But he attributed her emotion to the solemnity of the ceremony, and the deep feeling which he was well aware lay concealed in her breast.

The Patriarch arose—so also did the Doge—for at that moment, just while the solemn vows were about bursting from the lips of those loving and beloved ones, a loud tumult was heard at the gates of the Cathedral, and almost before the citizens had time to turn their heads to learn the cause of the disturbance, a crowd of ferocious beings had penetrated the very sanctuary.

With screams of terror the young brides clung to their lovers, who, unarmed, and taken by surprise, could only shield them upon their bosoms, while the rest of the citizens huddled together in alarm, leaving the pirates to seize the costly ornaments which had tempted them to this rude assault. But not content with this, no sooner had they made sure of their more sordid prize, than they wrested from the arms of their grooms the fainting and terrified brides. With his arms clasped firmly about the form of the gentle Bianca, and his head bowed so closely above her that his cheek rested upon hers, stood the brave and resolute Leonardo.

'Yield the lady, or die!' fiercely exclaimed one of the rudest of the robbers, seizing Bianca by the arm that clung to the neck of her betrothed. 'Yield her, Sir; for we are no drivellers, and remember, you are unarmed.'

'Villain, harm her not. Take thy trinkets, and away!'

'Oh spare him, spare him, I beseech you!' cried Bianca, seeing the club of the pirate aimed at Leonardo's head, 'I will go with you—take me—kill me—but oh, spare my lord!'

Her prayer was unavailing. A blow from the ruffian felled him to the floor, while she was borne off in triumph to the vessels that were awaiting their prizes.

Within the Cathedral the strife had now ceased; but not the tumult. The rage and despair of the bridegrooms was unlimited. Mothers, too, shrieked in agony over the fate of their children, and none seemed to preserve the presence of mind necessary to reflect on any course calculated to recover them; none save the compassionate Doge. Rushing from the Cathedral he lifted the cry, 'To arms! to arms!' and the citizens within, animated by his example, followed him out of the gates, and dispersing themselves over the island, echoed and re-echoed the cry, 'To arms! to arms!'

The inhabitants, most of them mechanics, hurried together their weapons, and sallying forth from their shops, hastily assembled such galleys as were in the harbor, and put off in pursuit. A favorable wind swept them on toward the vessels of the pirates, who were obstructed in a neighboring lagoon. Candiano led the attack, and a desperate fight soon ensued. The pirates, although better armed, were not equal in numbers and valor. The Venetians fought with the strength of a good cause; they fought with fury, with desperation, with madness. It was not long that they struggled. The pirates were overpowered, but not without severe resistance. They fought till the last man fell; and when the conflict ceased, not a single ruffian was left to report the fate of his comrades.

Foremost in the terrible fight had been the lover of Bianca. Though stricken down by the blow he had received, he soon recovered, and borrowing arms from some of the inhabitants of the island, had entered the galley with the Doge, and hurried on the attack. A slight flesh wound, which he received in the arm, did not prevent him, when the contest was over, from lifting the insensible Bianca, whom he found lying on the deck of one of the vessels, and bearing her to one of the smaller galleys, where he succeeded, after many efforts, in resuscitating her.

'The cloud has burst, Bianca, dearest,—and thank heaven! the danger is past. Look up—do you not see the sunshine?'

She answered only by hiding her face upon his bosom; and the vessel danced gaily on, with its precious burden, while at her side sped the other barks, containing the rescued brides and their gallant deliverers. The evening of the same day the interrupted ceremony was resumed with renewed splendor, and doubtless with a joy heightened by the dangers which had so nearly given it a fatal termination.

This incident was long kept in remembrance by an annual procession of the Venetian ladies to the church of Sta. Maria, to offer up thanks for the preservation of the brides.

The Cathedral and the Hermitage Bells.

WITHIN an old Cathedral hung
A mighty bell,
Which never, save at Easter, swung
One solemn knell;
And then so sturdy all around,
Its echoes fell,
The peasants trembled at the sound
Of that big bell.

Not far from the Cathedral stood
A hermit's cell,
And in its belfry tower of wood,
A little bell;
Whose daily tinklings through the year
So faintly fell,
The peasants hardly gave an ear
To that small bell.

The hermit—he who owned the same,
And loved it well,
Resolved that it should share the fame
Of the big bell;
So, tolling it but once a year,
With one brief knell,
He taught the peasants to revere
His little bell.

And there are fools in vast repute,
Who, strange to tell,
Acquire their fame by being mute,
Like that small bell;
These would-be-sages rarely speak,
For they know well
That frequent utterance would break
The solemn spell.

Sketches from Real Life. No. 3.

BY MRS. J. R. SPOONER.

A TRIP ON LAKE CHAMPLAIN.

I LEFT D—— on Thursday, in one of the splendid and well regulated steamboats that run daily between that place and Whitehall, touching at the different stopping places on the Lake. It was early in October, and one of autumn's brightest days. The sun shone out cheerfully from a clear and cloudless sky, and the thick woods on either side of the water wore a variegated mantle of the richest dyes. For some time I paid but little attention to the scenery or to my fellow travellers, for my thoughts were divided between the dear friends from whom I had just parted, and those to whom I was returning, and I abandoned myself to the mingled emotions of pleasure and pain that took possession of my mind, and had I then been asked, 'can a fountain send forth at the same time, both sweet and bitter waters?' I should have answered in the affirmative. I was roused from my meditations by a notice that we were approaching Isle Aux Noix; this island is twelve miles from D—, and about the same distance from the States, and although only a mile in length and half as wide, is considered from its situation, as an important possession by the British, to whom it belongs, and it has been very strongly fortified at an immense expense. The sun was reflected with a dazzling brightness from the tin roofs of the buildings within the fort, which was all that was visible of them, and the sloping glacis was yet verdant and smooth as velvet, and here and there might be seen a sentinel keeping his solitary watch by drawbridge or arsenal. Some years since, I was wont to pass many pleasant days at this place, where many a friendly hand and many a warm heart welcomed me to their hospitable homes. But where are they—where are 'the old familiar faces'? Alas! not one of that social circle now remains, and I gaze only upon strangers. Many are gone the way of all the earth, others are beyond the wide sea, whom I shall probably not see again, until we meet on the shores of eternity. Dear kind Mrs. H., the life and soul of that once happy band—the benefactress and friend of the poor—in whom was blended charity, meekness, elegance and refinement of mind and manners, with a great measure of cheerfulness—whose mansion was the favorite resort of all both far and near, who had the pleasure of her acquaintance—she too is gone.

'The hearth, the hearth is desolate,
The fire quenched and gone,
That into happy childrens' eyes
Once brightly, laughing shone.'

Soon after the death of Mrs. H., the health of her husband became impaired, and in the anticipation that he was destined ere long to follow his beloved companion to the grave, he embarked with his children for his native country, intending to place them under the care of his only surviving brother, an eminent physician in London. He lived just long enough to accomplish this object, and I heard nothing further relating to my friend's family for a long time, until two years ago, when on a visit to D—, a gentleman called at my father's, and was shown into the study where I happened to be sitting alone. I accosted him as a stranger, and was not a little surprised at the very warm greeting I received from him, not having the slightest remembrance of having seen him before, which I observed, suggesting that he had probably mistaken me for some one else. 'O no!' said he, 'you are altered, but I know the voice of my mother's friend, but I do not wonder that you have forgotten me—I am Willy H—.' And no wonder that I did not recognize in the tall, handsome young man who stood before me, my ci-devant little friend, who was little more than twelve years of age when I had last seen him. He told me he had a short time before finished his medical studies, to which he had been for some years closely confined in England's great metropolis, and that previous to entering into partnership with his uncle, he had determined to devote a few months to travel, and had just come to Canada to look once more on the scenes of his childhood, and to visit his mother's grave. We spent a pleasant morning in talking over the little occurrences of days of 'lang syne,' when I was wont to join my young friend in many of his youthful sports; often risking my precious life (so others said) by letting him drive me on the ice with his wild Canadian pony, or in summer give me a row or a sail in his canoe—and then the fishing, and walks on snow shoes that we enjoyed. Sub rosa! Could this ever have been me? Yes, for my wrist even now aches at the remembrance of a severe sprain consequent upon a lesson in archery, into which the young gentleman had beguiled me. Of all these, it must be confessed, rather unfeminine amusements, the only one which makes me really conscience stricken to think of, is fishing—it is a cruel occupation, and more so still when followed as a sport—old Izaak Walton's logic, and the good Paley's example to the contrary. Before we parted my friend informed me of another partnership that awaited him on his return to England, and if the influence of the blind god had not very much obscured his judgment, he certainly had cause to expect this at least would prove a good thing. But I have quite run away from Lake Champlain—Where was I? O, passing Isle Aux Noix. Well I will say no more now of the friends who were, although the sight of this place has brought up scenes and thoughts that would fill a volume. But there on the north end of the island yet stands the little knoll of trees, that once shaded a summer house, built in the style of an East Indian Bungalow—what a delightful resort was that on a warm summer's day; it was almost the only retired spot on the island. There

I would sometimes steal away with a novel carefully secreted under my apron, and never shall I forget when mine host came upon me one day unawares, and found me poring over Scott's Kenilworth. He was a very humorous man, and assuming a severe look and tone, said, 'What! you a clergyman's daughter, and reading novels!' and how heartily he laughed at seeing the distress exhibited by my countenance, at the implied reproof.

After passing Isle Aux Noix the Lake gradually becomes wider, and the outlines of the Green Mountains become distinctly visible, and as we progressed on our course, the scenery increased in beauty—the broad waters, the range of the distant hills, the bright autumnal foliage, and the neat villages scattered here and there along the shore, presented a combination, that when gilded by the bright rays of the setting sun, would have lent inspiration to the mind of poet or painter. But when the shades of night came on, and the pale moon shone out, majestic in her brightness, and myriads of dazzling stars gemmed the dark azure canopy above us—

'The scene was more beautiful far to my eye,
Than when day in its pride had arrayed it.'

Most of the passengers were on deck, enjoying the beauty of the evening; among them was a bridal party from New York—the newly married couple were young, gay, and happy—life seemed to them all colour de rose—little heeded they of its changeful hues, which must sooner or later be experienced by all. In strong contrast to this merry group, sat at a retired distance alone, an elderly lady dressed in deep mourning, apparently suffering under some recent affliction; she seemed quite absorbed by her feelings, and wept almost incessantly. Respect for her grief, and a fear of intruding, for some time prevented any one from addressing her. At length a person approached the mourner, when the following conversation took place.

'I perceive you are alone, and in distress, I too, have drank deeply of the cup of sorrow, and though a stranger to you personally, I feel sympathy in your affliction, whatever it may be.'

'I am indeed suffering a severe trial, the hand of God has been heavily laid upon me. I had two sons, the support and comfort of their widowed mother, and but a few days since, the eldest, a young man of thirty, was drowned in this Lake.'

'This is truly a severe trial, but let us remember that afflictions do not rise from the dust—God in his all-wise and benevolent Providence, has permitted this to fall upon you, and although he does not see fit to reveal his purpose in thus dealing with you, yet we have the assurance that all his chastenings are for the good of those who are exercised thereby. Had your son lived, you must sooner or later have been separated from him, and the time and manner of this painful circumstance has been appointed by one who cannot err, and however dark and mysterious this providence may appear to you now, the time may come, when you may clearly see that God "did it for good." You have still one son left, and this surely demands your gratitude—you have not lost your all.'

'I hope I do feel thankful for this—the hand of God was apparent in his being spared the fate of his brother; they had been in the habit of going out on the water together, and both left me for this purpose, when the youngest feeling rather unwell, returned home before they reached the boat, and had he not done so, in all probability he too would have been drowned; but it is not the death of the body that I so much deplore, as I fear the destruction of my child's soul. Had he only died on a sick bed, I might have talked to him, prayed with him, and perhaps succeeded in leading him to his Savior, but he has been suddenly called into eternity, without having experienced a change! And yet there never was any wickedness in him—if you only knew what a kind and affectionate son he was, and so mild and gentle, he was loved by all who knew him. Oh! I cannot make myself believe he will really be lost; but it is this fear, kind stranger, that robs me of my peace and rest, and that will send my grey hairs in sorrow to the grave.'

'Your feelings must indeed be harrowing if you entertain such fears; but there are three little words in this blessed book, which if you sincerely believe, will change your mourning to joy—"God is love." Can you faithfully believe this, and still suppose that such a Being will suffer any of his creatures to exist in an eternity of misery? You know he has compared his love to that of a mother, and he says, "yea she may forget, yet will not I." You would not have doomed your son (or indeed any one else, over whom you had power) to undergo any punishment for the term of his life, even had he been guilty of great crimes; and according to your account, he was a most amiable and excellent young man—how then can you do your Maker the injustice to believe him less benevolent and humane than yourself?

'I have thought of all this, but there is so much said in the Gospel to cause me to fear.'

'The Gospel means glad tidings, and do you think it would have been so named, if it was designed to pierce the heart of the mourner with additional anguish, and to mingle the bitterest dreg in the cup of sorrow?' The conversation continued for some time, with much apparent earnestness and interest on both sides, and if the mourning parent was not thoroughly convinced, yet her countenance brightened, her manner became more composed, and we hope that she went on her way rejoicing.

Consoling truth! the only hope and stay,
That cheers the mourner's heart from day to day—
The only anchor of life's stormy sea,
The brightest star, the mental eye doth see.
Success attend thee! blessed faith thou art,
That 'works by love,' and frees the human heart
From the forc'd service of a slavish fear,
That long has caused to flow the gushing tear.
O may we all, who own this precious creed,
Strive to attain the 'wisdom which we need,'
To let our 'light' before the world so shine,
That all must own the doctrine is divine.

Spring.

I FEEL the breath of the warm, bright Spring,
As she fans my brow with her dewy wing,
And the earth grows green, and the mists rise up
Like beautiful clouds from the censer cup;
And I think of the spirits wafted away
On the wings of this bright and beautiful day;
And I ask if they meet no changing power
That gives to the soul a heavenly dower,
To float on in glory in worlds above,
All robed in the garments of light and love?

I list to the tones of the stream burst free,
And the pleasant hum of the insects' glee,
And the far-off voice of the mighty deep,—
And for the unbound soul, I dare not weep!

An Oriental Gem.

THE inspiration of God is not confined to one people or nation. It has given to many a lip to utter sacred and everlasting truths, out of the circle of those whose wisdom is recorded in our holy book. These truths are found, like the evidences of the wisdom and goodness of the Supreme, among all tribes of men, and redeem from utter condemnation the works of wild speculators and mystics. They make us, as we discover them, think better of man, and hold out to us a great hope for our race, unfolding the capability of mind to rise to the sublimest thoughts of the Deity, under all circumstances and from amid the dreariest ruins.

Moslem literature has many of these gems of thought, that glitter and sparkle in the clear light of christianized mind. They are worthy of being steadily gazed upon by those to whom Orientalism is but another name for sensuality, and who also believe that in the East, apart from christianity, there is no good. Rich lessons are read to the christian by beautiful strains from that land of loveliness, and he should listen to hear them, for they will teach the universal moral of history and actual life—that all the glory of man, in all ages, has been and is, what Christianity requires, and to achieve which it would discipline the human soul.

These remarks have been called out by a beautiful gem of poetry put into my hand by one who has a deep insight into the Beautiful. The sentiment is kindred with the apostle James' assurance that God gives wisdom to all in his own way, and also with that of the apostle Paul, that unspoken and unspeakable desires are understood and answered of God. Here it is:

'Allah! was all night long the cry
Of one oppressed with care,
Till softened was his heart and sweet
Became his lips with prayer.
Then near the subtle tempter stole,
And spake, 'Fond babbler, cease,
For not one Here I am, has God
Ere sent to give thee peace.'

With sorrow sank the suppliant's heart,
And all his senses fled,
But, lo! at midnight, Chiser* came,
And gently spake and said,—
'What ails thee now, my child, and whence
Art thou afraid to pray,
And why dost thou thy former love
Repent, declare and say.'

Ah! cries he, Never once to me
Spoke God, Here am I, son;
Cast off, methinks I am, and warned
Far from his gracious throne.
To him Elias said, 'My son,
The word of God I bear,
Go tell, he said, yon mourner sunk
In sorrow and despair,

'Each Lord appear! thy lips pronounce,
Contains my Here am I,
A special messenger I send Beneath thine every sigh.
Thy love is but a girdle of
The love I bear to thee,
And sleeping in thy Come, O Lord,
There lies, Here son, from me.'

* Name of Elias, whom the Easterns described as the Counsellor of men.

This is a gospel sentiment, but many christians do not recognize it, else they would not so perpetually look to the outward for the reward of prayer. The great reward of prayer lies in the emotions and feelings created by the awakening of slumbering thoughts, as the soul seeks to commune with God. The breath of prayer steals over the chords of feeling, and the thrilling harmonies linger around the spirit like voices of heaven, to soothe, to quiet, and to encourage. There must be the breathing ere the chords will move, and therefore slumbering in the breath is the response. Pray, and thou shalt be blest 'in the deed;' the sighings of thy soul shall be answered, and 'sleeping in thy Come, O Lord! will lie Here, son!' from God.

I cannot but annex to this article the beautiful poem of Leigh Hunt, entitled, 'Ben Adhem and the Angel,' because of its congeniality of spirit, and its important teaching:

'Abou Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase!)
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw, within the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich, and like a lily bloom,
An angel writing in a book of gold.
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the presence in the room he said:
"What writest thou?" The vision raised its head,
And with a look made of all sweet accord,
Answered: "The names of those who love the Lord."
"And is mine one?" said Abou. "Nay, not so,"
Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low,
But cheerily still, and said: "I pray thee, then,
Write me as one that loves his fellow-men."
The angel wrote and vanished. The next night
It came again, with a great wakening light,
And showed the names whom love of God had blessed,
And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest."

Questions to Job. JOB, CHAP. 38.

WHEN earth's foundations strong and deep were laid,
Where wert thou mortal? If thou canst, declare!
By whose hand was that mighty structure made?
Who stretched the line? Who placed the chief stone there?

And when the morning stars together sang—
Swelled then that heavenly music on thine ear,
Didst thou the shout which through the glad sky rang,
Sent forth by God's rejoicing children, hear?

Who raised a barrier to the rushing sea,
When into being powerful it burst?
Who made the cloud and darkness thick to be
Its covering? Its limit, who defined at first?

Since thy few days the morning hast thou swayed?
The day-spring hast thou caused to know his place?
The sea's deep source hast thou beheld displayed?
Its utmost depths by searching couldst thou trace?

Have death's strong gates been opened unto thee?
Or hast thou e'er perceived the earth's extent?
Where dwelleth light and darkness? Didst thou see
The path they took when to their home they went?

Who for the waters doth a course prepare
When they o'erflow? And who the lightning's way Directs? Who makes the wilderness to share Refreshing rain, where man doth never stray? S. E. S.

The Contrast; or the Real and the Unreal.

'My soul! can it be that any thoughtful and considerate man can believe so? The chief glory of God would depart from my vision did my spirit respond to such an idea.'

'Why Mary! what is now the startling theme that gives such moisture to your eye and earnestness to your voice?'

'It is, Ellinor, a new developement of the tendency of Partialism to "take away the heart," contained in the close of an Essay by an Andover professor—Stuart. He allows that the sensibilities and social affections of some teachers in the Calvinistic church, disturb their faith in the doctrine that shows in the distance the separation of the dearest connections—the one exalted to light and glory, the other condemned to darkness and ruin; and he strives to calm those agitated minds by asserting that "all will be clear in the light of heaven." If parents, husbands, wives, brothers, and sisters, must see those dear as their own life, perish at last, while they themselves are saved, heaven in mercy will either extinguish their social susceptibilities, or else give them such a sweet and overpowering sense of the justice and goodness of God, as shall not permit the joys of the blessed to be marred, nor the songs of the redeemed to be interrupted with sighs of sympathetic sorrow.'" O, Ellinor, my blood runs cold as the wintry chillness of such ideas comes over me! Heaven cannot be enjoyed by the redeemed, unless the social susceptibilities are destroyed, or all sympathy be taken away from the sinful! What would Jesus Christ, or Fenelon, or Oberlin, or Howard be in such a heaven! They could have no existence there, for all would be destroyed that made them glorious among the good of the earth. They could no longer be the benefactors of mankind; nor can I see how they could enjoy the society of heaven itself. And'—

'Do pause, dear Mary, for you are excited—and we should be calm in investigating matters like these.'

'Calm, Ellinor, calm! you yourself cannot be calm, and it is only your anxiety for me that keeps away overpowering emotions. But we will calmly investigate this matter, and reveal its deformity to the full. And first, you must recall how much you have read and heard of abuse and ridicule against Universalists because they have maintained that the superior light of eternity, the influences of God's grace in the resurrection, will destroy or completely subjugate the sinful propensities, so that all the impulses of our being shall prompt to the adoration of God in obeying his holy will.'

'That I can do very easily, for I well remember our reading together a sermon on the "Evils of Sin," in which we saw much sophistry where the author treats of this subject. He argues, that to take off the hands of a thief, did not take away the stealing propensity, as though that met the whole question; but he should have remembered that Universalists, if I understand them, maintain that in the resurrection world, man will not be surrounded by a world like this, and consequently his body in that world is spoken of as 'spiritual.' They believe in a moral and mental change through the resurrection, or through God's power in the resurrection, do they not?'

'They do, Ellinor, for every increase of intellectual light which gives to the spirit demonstrations of the perfections of God, must work a moral change. The best saint desires it and trusts in it. So does the reverend professor, for he says "all will be clear in the light of heaven," while he acknowledges that it is the darkness of mind that makes some Calvinistic teachers to err from what he deems truth and duty. Must not that light which makes "all clear," be an intellectual light, and must that not work a moral change to keep them true to duty? And if all will be clear in the light of heaven, so that all which makes the mind dark to the real knowledge of God will be taken away, why not be willing that this light should shine on all—on the evil as well as on the good, and renovate all mind! O, glorious the sight! every human being an unspotted mirror of the brightness of God's glory, filling the universe with the radiations of reflected beams of the Sun of Righteousness!'

'O that mine eyes were anointed to behold its glory! that I could see as you see!'

'Think on, Ellinor, and truth will come—Truth, the sanctifier and comforter. Remember, you said we must be calm and not excited, and so we must continue our criticism. You know, as you have allowed, the ridicule which is cast on Universalists for believing in the destruction, or complete subjugation of the sinful propensities; and now for a contrast. I wish you to contrast the answers of three questions with the answers of three others, and decide where ridicule should be bestowed, if any where—though I own ridicule is a fool's weapon. First, I wish you to consider what the sinful propensities are; what they produce; and what will result from their entire destruction or subjugation.'

'Those queries are easily answered, though they open a vast field for thought. The sinful propensities are the sources of all moral evil, and they produce untold miseries—all the oppressions that now bow millions to the dust, and retard the great work of progress, are the products of the activity of these propensities. Every defilement of the beauty of humanity and the glory of mind, has there its origin. In short, it is too terrible to inquire long—What hath sin done? the array is startling, and may well cause us to feel with good old Herbert,

"If apparitions make us sad,
By sight of sin, we should grow mad;
Yet, as in sleep we see foul death, and live;
So devils are our sins in perspective."

'Well quoted, sister-friend; and now ask, What would be the effect of the complete subjugation of these propensities in all rational beings?'

'What would be the effect! Why, it would be the consummation so devoutly wished for by all true lovers of our race—an eternal Millenium would dawn! the lion would indeed lie down with the lamb, and the gentlest of the affections would have sway over the strongest and fiercest passions. God would be all in all.'

'True, solemnly true, Ellinor; and yet for trustingly looking forward to such issues of the successful workings of Divine Grace, Universalists are mocked! That which alone can possibly gratify the most enlarged affections, is ridiculed, and ridiculed too by those who profess great anxiety for the complete triumph of "holiness unto the Lord." You see clearly that the change to which Universalists look forward with adoring gaze, takes nothing from the essentials of progress and blessedness—dims no attribute of mind, and takes no glory from a loving spirit. It does not detract from the beauty of heaven and the attractions of the society of the redeemed. Now for the contrast. Consider, What are the social susceptibilities? What do they produce? and What would result from the destruction, or "extinguishing," of these prompters?'

'O Mary, you give me a sadder task than before; for then I commenced in darkness and ended in light ineffable; but now darkness gathers upon darkness till the whole universe is dark, and there is no vision of God!'

'But we must look on the gathering clouds, that we may praise God for the truth that they "are shadows, not substantial things." We must ask what are the social susceptibilities and sympathies that incline us to feel for others' sorrows; and we know that all that there is of benevolent effort—all that inclines man to love his neighbor as himself—all that lessens the sufferings of the poor, the sick, the imprisoned, the bound,—shows forth what these sympathies are—their loveliness, strength, and activity; and to destroy them, or overpower their action, would take from the good all that makes them good, and extinguish philanthropy and benevolence from God's universe. It would wrap heaven in funeral robes, and blast every flower of love. The harps of the seraphim could never more ring out the glorious strain—'God is Love,' for there would be no interpreter of its mystery—the oracle of the heart that once unravelled its meaning, would be silent—dead. Millions on millions of beings in utter misery, and not one "sympathetic sigh" is heard in all heaven! A strange heaven is that where sympathy for the suffering lives not,—it is not the heaven of our God—it is not the home of Him "who went about doing good," and who is "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever."'

My heart, Mary, does not yearn towards such a heaven; and surely I was not aware what dreadful visions the Professor's ideas would lead to. Certainly, those who are of his faith believe in a moral change in eternity dishonorable to the Deity, while, to my mind, the Universalists trust in a change honorable to God and infinitely beneficial to man.'

'True, and this will be seen the clearer the more their real principles are understood. They trust in the final bestowment "of such a sweet and overpowering sense of the justice and goodness of God, as shall not permit the joys of the blessed, nor the songs of the redeemed to be interrupted," with the sighs of misery and groans of sin; for life, light and glory shall fill the Universe, and God "will rest in his love."'

Melodia.

BY AMELIA.

I MET once, in my girlish hours,
A creature soft and warm—
Her cottage bonnet filled with flowers
Hung swinging on her arm;
Her voice was sweet as the voice of love,
And her teeth were pure as pearls;
While her forehead lay like a snow-white dove
In a nest of nut-brown curls;
She was a thing unknown to fame—
Melodia was her strange sweet name.

I never saw an eye so bright
And yet so soft as hers:
It sometimes swam in liquid light,
And sometimes swam in tears;
It seemed a beauty set apart
For softness and for sighs;
But oh! Melodia's melting heart
Was softer than her eyes;
For they were only formed to spread
The softness from her spirit shed.

The Major and the Farmer.

ABOUT three miles west of our little village, there was a sheltered valley, through which passed the road to the next town. The land was uncommonly rich, and this had induced several cultivators at an early period of the settlements in this part of the country, to take possession of it and lay out farms. By the time I was old enough to stray so far from home, it had become a beautiful place; the rough looking huts first erected had in most instances been replaced by neat white cottages, and the large barns and out-houses gave it the appearance of being inhabited by industrious and thriving people. Though not more than a dozen families dwelt in the valley, they had taxed themselves to build a good brick school house, where the children for the greater part of the year enjoyed those advantages which make the people of New England the most intelligent and happy of any on earth. To arrive here, you had to ascend the hills which rose gradually to a considerable height from the shore of the river where the principal village lay, and when you had attained the ridge where the hills began to dip down towards the west to form the valley, you might turn and gaze upon a scene which to me was delightful, for it was the little world which had hemmed me since the days of infancy. There was the blue crooked line of the river, spotted here and there with a vessel, the sails of which appeared at this distance only like a white dot on its azure surface; beyond was the abrupt and broken shore, mostly covered with a fringe of green forest trees; in some places the bank was steep and worn into gullies, presenting the brown earth all crumbling and barren; at intervals towered up the trunk of a bare old pine, exalting itself even above the line of the hills so as to pierce like a tall slender spire into the dark azure sky. Farther on were smooth green fields, chequered with a few farm-houses and stretching away into the distance until lost in the dim outline of untrodden forests and nameless hills. Nearer at hand, through an opening in the trees, was to be seen the little village on the river's brink, like a spot of embroidery on a rich green carpet. Pursuing your walk, you looked down on a sweet rural spot. The fields were smooth and verdant, intersected by long straight walls of stone, the rudeness of which was relieved by the light green of the raspberry bushes allowed to grow in rows by their sides. There were ranges of orchard trees as regular in their lines as soldiers on a parade, and the white walls of the houses alternately glanced and disappeared between them as you advanced. A thick forest environed the whole valley, like the broken waters of the ocean surrounding a lovely island. At a distance lay a calm sheet of water, and when the declining sun glanced over the pond, the reflection was so dazzling that you could scarcely discern the red walls of a large factory near it, though you might hear the hoarse roar of the waterfall that turned the wheels, and perhaps the faint tinkling of its little bell spreading over the waters and echoed back from the forest.

The place being a part of the same town of which the chief settlement was at the river, had no separate name, but to distinguish it, it was called by the title of the principal resident; thus any one dwelling there was said to live 'out at the Major's.' Of late years, however, upon the same principle, the valley was called 'out at the farmer's.' With the two persons from whom these appellations were taken and the cause of the change, the reader is about to be acquainted, and though the narrative may contain but little incident, and is designed only to show the contrast between a worthy, and a mismanaging family, it may be interesting to those who love to see industry and virtue rewarded and improper conduct punished.

Major Corby had served in the Revolution, and though history has not recorded his name and exploits, they were both well known among the Tories of North River, and there was one who was never tired of relating the consummate prudence and heroic daring he had displayed in every battle and almost every skirmish that happened during the war. In other words, the Major was his own chronicler, and who will deny that a man can best relate his own deeds? No one dared or thought it worth while to challenge his boasting tales, and it passed current that, next to Washington, the freedom of the United States was owing to Major Corby. A few supposed, however, that he had been more familiar with the midnight plundering of Tories, than with the sight of the British bayonet in open day. At least, it was known that he joined the army with nothing, and though one of the loudest declaimers against the injustice of Congress, had retired from it far from poor. It had also been spoken openly in the streets of the village, though by no higher accuser than a half-drunk old soldier, that he knew the color of Gen. Clinton's guineas.

A few years after the termination of the war, the Major settled in the valley and cleared a farm, or rather had it cleared by his workmen. He was full of money, disdained to labor himself, and assumed that air of importance which distinguishes the little great man, and as he was rich, and according to his own account, a hero, his claims were admitted. The story of his cheating a poor widow was only whispered, while his unsolicited gift towards some projected improvement was loudly circulated far and wide, and contributed largely to gain him the high station in society he had assumed. Thus the Major came to be of great repute and his opinions much regarded. No one dared in his presence to advance a sentiment contrary to what he had expressed, for there was something intimidating in his plump method of laying down an assertion that prevented controversy. At the least sign of opposition to his dictum, whether in town meeting or the bar-room, the Major began to thunder and lighten; his little grey eyes twinkled sharper from under the shaggy eyebrows, his three-cornered hat was hitched furiously to one side of his head, the long flaps of his coat were agitated by his impatient wriggling, and then his opinion was repeated with extreme energy in the very same words, always ending by way of emphasis with a sturdy stamp of his silver-headed cane on the floor, and a 'd—me, that's what I think.' The glance of defiance which he threw in every body's face, and the heightened radiance of his brandy-burnt nose, effectually quelled any disposition to reply. Certainly the Major was more feared than loved, but this he cared not for so long as he exacted a show of respect. To do him justice, he was the cause of much good in the village, because he saw that to favor the improvements in the town was the readiest way of keeping the high ascendancy in public estimation which he was determined to maintain. Hence he was liberal, and his public generosity cloaked much private injustice and meanness by which only individuals suffered.

At the time when I was just big enough to ramble on a Saturday afternoon 'out to the Major's,' that gentleman's belly was waxing greater, while his shanks and the glory of his name were both waning away. His silver-headed cane was no longer a useless symbol of importance, but was necessary to assist his tottering steps. His little cocked hat looked as fierce as ever, and his countenance ten times more formidable—it was 'all bubukles, and whelks, and knobs, and flames of fire.' No teeth were left in either jaw, except two or three tobacco-stained snags that his sunken lips could scarcely ever wholly conceal; the lips appeared to be drawn down by the weight of a huge mass of fat which at every step quivered like a quagmire under his chin. Above, however, his embroidered cheeks stood prominent in all their pristine glory, and a halo of red skin surrounding his sharp eyes, like the ignited edge of a piece of paper, was a vast improvement to their natural fiery aspect. His attire, never remarkable for its neatness, was hardly whole, but wholly dirty. A tremor had invaded his hands, and was extending to his head and affecting the voice, but the old man possessed a sovereign remedy for this—the cause and the cure were the same; he had only to empty four glasses of brandy, and his hand became as steady as one of his old sharp-shooter's in the army. The Major was never a favorite among the boys, and his appearance was now truly forbidding. Yet sometimes the old fellow attempted to play the agreeable, be kind and chatty, and when wishing to display his consequence before other persons, would throw some urchin a half crown, which was received with more dread than thankfulness. One little fellow I knew, retained the money in his hand till out of the Major's sight, and then with an execration upon 'old Corby,' chucked it into the river.

The principal event which led to this degeneracy of the Major was the death of his wife, a faithful old slave, whose existence was worn out by hard labor and harder treatment. After her departure, every comfort and convenience seemed departing too. The three sons and five daughters began, sometimes conjointly but most often separately and severally, a process of exaction upon their father, which drained his purse and increased his irritability and fondness for brandy. The paternal mansion, a prodigy in its day, assumed a rueful aspect of neglect; the gay coating of red paint all disappeared, except in a few fantastic patches, the clap-boards were dropping off, a carpet of green moss covered the roof, mud puddles stagnated before the door, the fences and part of the out-houses and fruit trees were burnt for fuel, and the door-way was carelessly hacked to pieces with the axe. While all was desolation without, there was contention, wrangling, or obstreperous mirth within. The children had all been bred in idleness and ignorance, and had acquired their consequent vices. The oldest son was a lazy, contented lout, who liked fine clothes and good living while they were to be had with no exertion, but would accommodate himself to any state that did not call for labor. Jacob, the second son, was a miser, and was willing to drudge night and day for money, and he had extorted wages from his father for carrying on the farm, hoarding away the money and getting his living as the rest did, out of the common stock. When age and brandy stopped the old man's profitable speculations and money grew a stranger to his purse, Jacob still labored on, determined to make up an account which should ultimately bring the whole property into his own hands, when the rest might take care of themselves. Sam, the youngest, was horse-jockey, gambler, and rake, and as he was the favorite, had spent more money than all the other children. The girls were all alike, lazy, careless and extravagant, and earnestly bent on getting husbands. This object prompted all their dreams by night and plans by day. To attain it they had no means but through the medium of dress and affectation, and accordingly they were dressy and affected. Constantly vexing and harassing the old Major for money to buy finery, which became them as a pearl necklace would swine, they had no peace themselves and kept their father in perpetual torment. He frequently averred that a hundred bugles screaming in his ear was tolerable melody compared with the incessant din of his daughters' tongues.

It was on a fine summer afternoon when I determined upon a walk 'out to the Farmer's,' as my favorite valley was now usually called. The weather was too sultry for such a ramble, but my desire to be there outweighed all prudential considerations, and unable to obtain companions I set off alone. Very soon the oppressive heat made the road seem longer than I had ever before known it, and I began to think my attempt not a very wise one; but I was resolved not to turn back and encounter the jeers of my playmates, who had declined the jaunt only on account of the heat, assuring me that I should repent before reaching half way to the valley. Toiling on, therefore, half spent with fatigue and wholly covered with dust, at length I reached the Major's house, where I intended, notwithstanding my dread of his red face and spiteful cocked hat, to beg a glass of water. But coming nearer, there issued such a variety of angry voices from the mansion, and the Major's cane was thumped so frequently and energetically on the floor, I dared not enter. The girls were all scolding, the father swearing, Sam raving, and a young child that called one of the Miss Corbys mother, was yelling most lustily. At a short distance was the Farmer's, and I proceeded on, concluding it better to bear thirst than run the risk of getting a broken head.

How different was the scene at Farmer Gilbert's. Every thing was not only neat about his residence, but there was a great degree of rural elegance. The one storied house was white as the snow that lay about it in winter, and the glare of the white paint, which the strong sunshine might otherwise have rendered uncomfortable to the eye, was beautifully shaded and contrasted by the many fruit trees which arose close to the walls. There was nothing ostentatious—no useless display of wealth, though the Farmer was now one of the richest men in town; a neat white fence enclosed a large yard, in which there were flower beds, rose trees, and lilacs, all kept in the finest condition. A piazza ran the whole length of the house on the eastern side, and besides the fruit trees, one majestic oak had escaped the axe, and now, as if grateful for its preservation when all its wildwood brethren had been prostrated, threw its huge boughs and shady foliage over the habitation;—it was like the arm of power stretched fondly and protectingly above feeble innocence. Standing at the gate, parched with thirst, overcome with heat, and begrimed with dust, I thought no scene ever so much resembled paradise as that I contemplated. The good Farmer, whose hair, indeed, had been blanched by time and toil, but who still retained all the vigor, health and uprightness of manhood, was sitting on the piazza reading to his three unmarried daughters as they plied the needle. There was that air of affectionate attention, and the grace of innocence, and love for each other, in the face of each sister, which no one could look on without pronouncing features so lit up to be lovely. The sun was now shining on the other side of the house, allowing the piazza and the pots of flowering plants to enjoy the shade; the gravelled walk had just been sprinkled with water; a robin, whose home for many summers had been on the oak, was throwing forth at intervals a feeble gush of melody as a prelude to its evening strain; a parrot, cherished because it had been brought home by a brother who afterwards perished at sea, was fluttering and whistling and screaming at a distance in its cage, as if no dreary winter were coming to chill its mirth; the fruit trees loaded with green promises, extended their branches even into the piazza, and all around the scene had that appearance which would almost tempt one to say that he saw its coolness.

Reluctant was I in my dirty plight to intrude upon such an audience, to whom I was known only as a boy from the 'River,' but as I hesitated, one of the young ladies saw me, and throwing down her work, came forward and opened the gate with such an encouraging smile, that I wondered how I could ever have thought Rachel Gilbert otherwise than a beautiful girl. I soon made known my want, and was not only cheerfully supplied with a glass of cool water, but a wash basin and napkin were brought, affording me the greatest luxury a travel-tired pedestrian can enjoy. Then the old gentleman seated me on a stool close by his side, and asked my name and other questions, such as a good-natured man puts to a boy of eleven. Gently but without the least tone of reproach, he told me how imprudent it was to come such a distance in a hot day when nothing demanded the exertion. His daughters playfully defended me, and never did the voice of woman sound so sweet. But I must not dwell on these simple recollections, though every word, look and smile is treasured in memory, and often when a cloud comes over, darkening the mind and shutting out all that is graceful, tender and lovely in this heterogeneous world, do I recall that scene and soon grow reconciled to this chequered existence. This was not the last visit I paid the Farmer; shortly I became a favorite, and was as welcome to pluck the finest fruit in its season, as if I had been his own child. On every one of my numerous visits he had a tale for me, principally concerning the events of his early days, for, like the Major, 'he had been a soldier in his youth,' and though the same story was sometimes repeated, I was never tired of hearing about his good old General, George Washington. The girls were soon to me as older sisters, and it was pleasure to gaze on their quiet, amiable features, till I fancied them the handsomest in town. In good truth, the Farmer's daughters were but plain in their appearance; theirs was the beauty of the heart, which will always shine out in the countenance more and more as you become familiar with it, till at last you think there is no charm that is wanting. Some years before while people respected them, the Major's daughters attracted much the most attention. When they came late of a Sunday, flaunting, and tossing their heads, and shaking their gaudy plumes and ribbons, mincing and rustling along into the meeting-house, every head was turned, and every eye stared at them as the wonders of the village; but even then the modest looks and appropriate dress of the Gilbert girls, as they walked softly and unobtrusively to their seats, drew much regard, and every heart except those filled with vanity, acknowledged their superior worth. But these reminiscences are treacherous leaders, and I must hasten to a brief memoir of Farmer Gilbert; and thus accomplish the object of this narrative by presenting a contrast to his military neighbor. If I can gain some information relating to a particular event, which it is impossible now for me to describe, this article will be resumed.

Frank Gilbert was a young laborer on his uncle's farm in a village of New Hampshire, when the whole country was electrified by the explosion at Lexington. All the young men in a moment rushed to arms, and the next morning a company, under their leader, Capt. Corby,—our old acquaintance, the Major—was on a rapid march towards Boston. Frank fought bravely at Breed's Hill, and afterwards with half his townsmen enlisted into a new formed regiment; but it was observed that only a few chose to remain under the command of Corby, who had received a commission and was beating up for recruits. These he readily obtained at such a season of excitement, but it was among those who knew him least. Through the whole of the war Frank was the bravest among the brave, and the most patient of the suffering. He rose to be a sergeant, and in consequence of a hazardous and daring piece of service, might have received a commission, had not distrust of his own abilities prevented; so he merely said he had done no more than his duty, and refused. A boy knocked about on an uncle's farm, and who had been at school only six months in his life, he thought, would be presumptuous to assume the responsibilities of an officer, and thus his philosophy or his patriotism debarred his advance. He often said that his declining the offer of a commission was the happiest event of his life, for it showed Washington, at a time of gloom, that there were some of his private soldiers, who, like himself, were actuated by a spirit of freedom without the least view to personal advantage. Such a circumstance, the good Farmer reasoned, could not fail to come like a ray of sunshine across the dark clouds of perplexity, care, and distress, which often hovered over his beloved General; and indeed, it was well calculated so to do; but if the old soldier did attribute more than due importance to his refusal, I know none rude enough to tell him so. Several times he showed me his discharge in Washington's own hand-writing, and containing a deserved compliment on his valor and fidelity. He said the General knew him personally, and frequently spoke—but I am becoming as garrulous as the Farmer himself.

When the war was over, he begged his way to his uncle's, and discovered there was no longer a home for him. Shouldering an axe he undauntedly strode away, for he was yet a young man, and having walked the whole distance to what was then, with the exception of two or three families at the river, a complete wilderness, the trees of the valley soon felt the vigor of his arm. A log hut arose, fields were cleared, the seed sown, the harvest succeeded, and Frank was no longer a beggar. Very soon he returned to New Hampshire and persuaded a certain hearty, hardy damsel to accompany him to his lodge in the desert. Industry, temperance, economy, and upright dealings accomplished the rest. Farmer Gilbert was soon a rich man, and as at his few leisure hours he assiduously applied himself to books, there was not for some years a person with a better fund of useful knowledge in the country.

It did not greatly please the Farmer to have his old officer, the Major, move into his neighborhood, for he knew him to be an unprincipled, overbearing man, but he had no remedy, and though he often extended acts of kindness to him, and before the world the two soldiers were on excellent terms, the Farmer shunned all familiarity. Many a painful effort it cost him to refrain from confuting the grand stories of the Major, especially when he heard the characters of brave and honorable officers vilely aspersed that the speaker might shine in a more brilliant light. He kept silent, however, not from any fear of his neighbor, but to avoid contention; besides, he perceived the gentleman had a treacherous memory, and his story of to-day rendered that of yesterday null and void; so he thought it not worth while to wrangle for the honor of the dead and absent against detraction which no one heeded. Once only did the Farmer, at a celebration of independence, when gently warmed with wine, enter his veto against the Major's vile insinuations. It was the first and only time in his life he had ever heard one dare to hint any thing derogatory to his adored Washington, and the good Farmer fired in a moment. Though the Major bristled like a porcupine, exhibited most magnanimous wrath, and poured a torrent of abuse upon the poor private who dared to gainsay his former officer, the Farmer was not so easily put down. Deliberately as his excitement allowed, he brought forward an historical fact, familiar to all present, which proved the utter falsehood of the Major's statement, and that worthy began to quail. Here the Farmer should have stopped, but he had in some measure lost command of himself and added a little sentence, chiefly of names and places, not clearly understood by the company, but which was perfectly plain to a man who had fingered British gold at the expense of his country. The effect on the Major was most astounding; for once in his life his face assumed a muddy paleness, and seizing his well known triangular hat, he set it humbly on his head, and in short sneaked off, while his retreat was hailed by the boys, who had crept into the hall to snatch, if possible, a glass of wine, with a shout of exultation, which extended to the guests, and resulted in a universal hurra. It was a month before the Major again put his ugly nose over the hills which separated the valley from the river. From this period, as if by accident and certainly without previous concert, the valley began to lose the title of 'out to the Major's,' and take that of 'out to the Farmer's.' The old name was long retained, and probably is to the present day, by a certain class of bibulous fellows, whom the Major had always treated on his visits to the river, but all others now agree to call the valley after the Farmer.

As the Major went down hill in public estimation, the Farmer mounted, and chiefly by his own merits, though I will not conceal the fact that the inheritance of his uncle's property assisted to gain lower bows from sundry lucre-loving men, whose respect he cared but little for. His children grew like young, vigorous plants around him, shading and softening his old age, and relieving the cares of business. Two sons purchased farms in the valley and followed in their father's steps; another remained at home charged with the affairs of the paternal farm, and the youngest, restless and ambitious, had preferred the life of a mariner. He was a generous, warm-hearted youth, and his death at sea had spread a shade over the whole family, which remained for years, softening down their feelings, and drawing closer the bonds of affection among the survivors. The mother bustled about the house till infirmity confined her most of the year to her room, but cheerful and industrious as when in her youth inhabiting a log hut in the wilderness, she still managed most of the household affairs. The daughters were sought in marriage by the most respectable young men at the river, and the minister, lawyer and doctor each blessed the day when they took a wife from the valley.

These 'short and simple annals' may have but little interest for any but the writer; but for me, I could fondly dwell longer—much longer, on the beautiful picture of family affection I have so often witnessed. What can come more tenderly and delightfully to the heart than the sight of a veteran surrounded in his old age with virtuous and lovely children, who look up to him as their pride and their example through life—enjoying the reward of his bloody and his peaceful toil, and marching with the fearless and unfaltering tread of a christian soldier to the home where so many of his early companions were already gathered? Farmer Gilbert is now at rest, and though tears were showered by his descendants over his grave, they were not tears of bitterness or regret—they fell as a tender tribute to departed excellence. Gentle should be the moan for those who have fulfilled the years of man, crowding existence with good deeds, and leaving a fragrance of memory behind that charms away the vehemence of grief. And thus it was.

Many years have passed since I, a stripling, sat on the good man's knee; 'the boy had grown to manhood,' and the relation between me and his family became different. Among the changes and revolutions which are ever occurring in life, opportunities have not been wanting to testify to those once dear to him, the grateful remembrance his goodness had left on my mind. A connection next in tenderness and confidence to kindred ties, has been formed by circumstances between us, and it was sweet in long after years, by unfeigned interest and more than common assiduities in my intercourse with them, to show the reverence I entertained for their parent, and to pay the debt of gratitude incurred when they received me, a tired, dirty, runaway boy, with kindness into the shady coolness of their dwelling.

The Old Church Bell.

FROM my childhood up, I have loved full well,
To list to the chimes of that old church-bell;
And they come to my ear most richly fraught
With treasures from memory's store-house brought.
They speak to my heart with a solemn tone
Of the loved and lost, who have left me lone;
And spirit-voices come floating by,
And forms that are veiled from the mortal eye.

When burdened with grief, and oppressed with care,
It summoned my steps to the house of prayer,
Where the balm of Gilead was softly shed,
And the soul was with heavenly manna fed.
In the season of health, I have loved its sound;
And when to the couch of sickness bound,
I have lain for hours, amused right well
In counting the strokes of that old church-bell.

I remember well how its gladsome chime
Pealed merrily out at Christmas time;
And how, when that joyous season came,
We sat at the feet of the dear grandame,
And heard the tale of the Savior's birth,
Who brought good tidings of joy to earth;
And much we wondered to hear her say
That the Prince of Peace in a manger lay!

Since then, I have wandered in distant climes,
Where my ear was greeted with loftier chimes,
That proudly swelled through each pillared dome,
Like a peal to welcome a monarch home.
I have heard the sound of the Alpine horn,
At the sun-set hour and the early dawn;
But tuneless and sad, the echoes fell,
When I thought of home, and our old church-bell.

I have dwelt in the fairest lands of earth,
In the peasant's cot, at the noble's hearth;

I have sat entranced, and listened, mute,
To the strains of Italian voice and lute.
I have knelt at the vesper hour of prayer,
When the ave of thousands filled the air;
But my heart was away in our woody dell,
And I yearned for the sound of the old church-bell.

O when our childhood has past away,
And the bright romance of our youthful day
Has been shaded by sorrow, and chilled by care,
And our fairest dreams have proved empty air;
When all have vanished, how fondly we sigh
For some sight or sound of the days gone by.
Ah! they who have felt this, will know the spell
That lies in the sound of the old church-bell!

I'm an old man now, and my wanderings done,
I can sit in peace by my own hearth-stone;
And list to the chimes that are still as dear,
As when first they fell on my youthful ear.
Right gaily they pealed for my bridal morn—
They tolled when the forms that I loved, were borne
To the silent grave; and I pray that my knell
May be sounded at length by that old church-bell.

A Plea for the Communion.

1 COR. ii. 28: 'But let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup.'

THE spirit is infinitely better than the body. The body passes away, while the spirit lives. It is so with the spirit of all worship and religious rites, in comparison with the externals of devotional services. Rites and ceremonies have no worth unless they possess a power to appeal to something beyond the senses, to awaken thought, to kindle feeling, and bring out to the service of the divine the deepest and strongest affections of the inner being. It is such a power that makes the universe a magnificent volume of revelation, and all things to speak of God. It is this power that can clothe materiality with the robes of the spirit, and cause the humblest flower to call up feelings 'too deep for tears.' It is this power that creates a language of sympathy, and nerves the pinions of thought so that the soul flies at will amid the beautiful of a better world. It is this power that makes the simple emblems of the communion 'show the Lord's death.' And such a power is felt and gratefully owned by every sincere communicant—begetting in the soul new and more elevated ideas of christian excellence and duty, more knowledge of the angel might of the soul, and more strength to resist the enemies of a true, living, operative, and purifying faith.

Believing and knowing this, we proceed to the unfolding of our ideas of the nature, utility, and persuasives to observance, of the rite of Communion. We wish every one to examine himself and for himself. He must examine himself who would know what religious aids he needs; and must examine for himself whatever aids are presented, that he may know whether they are adapted to his wants or not.

And first, when a man examines himself, he finds that forms are natural to him. Trace back the history of sacrifices, and we shall see this fact clearly in connection with religion; trace back the history of society, and we shall see clearly this fact in connection with man as a social being; and wherever we find and look upon man, we see him a creature of forms, and cannot but admit that they are adapted to his present intellectual organization. What is more universal than the language of symbols? What is more expressive than this language refined by intellectual and religious advancement? It is this that makes the stars the poetry of heaven—the flowers the poetry of earth, and gives a language to the rain, the bow in the clouds, and the sunshine. And while we possess our present intellectual organization—while the spiritual is connected with the material—we shall as much need the assistance of forms as the earlier ages. They are adapted to the law of mental association; that law which made Rosseau weep when he met with a violet, as Peter wept when he met the glance of his Master. Association is the language of things; and all that we see and hear affects us according to the inward associations with the outward. If the soul have sympathy with the pure spirit of christianity, it will go forth as with a magic mirror, throwing out a new and spiritual light upon nature, and encircling the beautiful with a halo of glory; while if it be dead to Christ, it cannot be made to feel the rapture that thrills the other; the flowers may bloom, but there is none to speak of faith; the birds may float around in beauty, but none will speak of trust; and amid the glittering orbs of night, there will be no star of Bethlehem.

We see all this exhibited in the history of the chosen people. Rites were established for them through Moses, to be the outward expression of inward feeling—sensible symbols of invisible mind. They were taught thus to regard them, and while they did thus regard them, they were rich aids to fix the mind upon the purposes of worship and devotion. But when the people grew more corrupt, they ceased to bear in mind the true nature or character of forms, and made them substitutes for inward sentiment, instead of outward expressions of indwelling thought. Hence we find the voice of the Holy One exclaiming—‘To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto me? I am full of the burnt-offerings of rams, and the fat of fed beasts; and I delight not in the blood of bullocks, or of lambs, or of he-goats. Bring no more vain oblations; incense is an abomination unto me; the new moons and sabbaths, the calling of assemblies, I cannot away with; it is iniquity, even the solemn meeting. Your new moons and your appointed feasts my soul hateth; they are a trouble unto me; I am weary to bear them.’

What stronger language could be used to show that it is in vain that rites are observed if they are not the symbolical language of a pious and devotional soul? God required sacrifice, but he required also the remembrance that the mere outward act was nothing, if true spiritual feeling were dead; and therefore the voice went forth—‘I will have mercy, and not sacrifice!’ However much man may be inclined to make rites and ceremonies substitutes for true religious thought, feeling and action, God requires pureness of heart, or purity of motive or intention, to make any rite acceptable to him.

All the minute directions in reference to the building and adornment of the tabernacle, had reference to this same law of mental or religious association; and the pious and thoughtful Jew wherever he went abroad amid the beautiful of outward nature, found much to awaken recollections that gave rich and strengthening food to the spirit. That same law rules in our mental being. It makes us—and we cannot prevent it—creatures of forms. It is a blessed thing for the good—it is a fearful scourge to the evil. The eye may rest upon an object, and a rush of thoughts send through our whole being a thrilling sensation, as when at the voice of Jesus the blood of the leper coursed ‘with a delicious coolness’ through his whole frame, imparting new and joyous life; or as the startling shock that made Ananias fall dead, when Peter pronounced him a liar unto God.

‘And slight indeed may be the things which bring,
Back on the heart, the weight which it would fling
Aside forever; it may be a sound—
A tone of music—summer’s eve—or spring,
A flower—the wind—the ocean—which shall wound,
Striking the electric chain wherewith we are darkly bound.’

And as slight may be the things that shall strike
the electric chain of joy—call up the sweetest

thoughts, and cause the dearest scenes of the past and the forms of the loved to be visible to the mental eye. A single feature of a countenance, bearing a slight resemblance to what was prominent in the countenance of a departed friend, will fix intensely our attention, and concentrate our thoughts, so that impressions of the most lasting character are made on the heart. We all know that such things are common, and therefore we all know that forms are natural to man—that we are creatures of forms, and while we have the power of sight, of hearing, or touch, forms will be symbolical language, understood and felt.

But, says one, Christianity has done away with forms—rites and ceremonies. Thou art mistaken. Has christianity done away with vocal prayer—praise, and social worship? All these, in all their variety, are forms, and they may be but forms. Christianity deprecates them when they are but forms, but does not deny them as aids to the spirit of devotion. They are what the artist's pencils, colors and canvas, are to him—to his genius. They are not essential to the existence of spiritual beauty—to forms of grace and beauty within, but they are essential to give an outward expression, and to make more distinct the images of loveliness, even as exercise is a law connected with every mental power. Deny the true devotional the aids of vocal prayer and praise, and the various forms of worship, and you take from him that which to him is what the pen is to the poet, or the instruments of work to the sculptor.—Christianity in abolishing the rituals of Judaism, did, by no means, set aside all forms. When Christ came, and his kingdom became fully established, it was not meet that the rites and ceremonies which were types of these things, and intended, by divine appointment, to continue only till the reality came, and others should take their place,—it was not meet that these superceded rites and ceremonies should be continued. A different symbolical language was required. The history of Jesus was more eventful than the history of the chosen people, and the wonders of his mission were now rather to be commemorated than any effected by other messengers of God. The prayer of the saint breathes not now of the ancient deliverance of the chosen from Egypt, and the wonders wrought for the fathers; but of the gift of a greater than Moses, the more wondrous works wrought by Jesus, and the prospects of an heavenly Canaan. The forms under christianity differ in character from the Mosaic, because the relations of Christ to man are different; but to deny the utility of all forms, is to do violence to one of the chief laws of our mental being—the law of association. And when the Apostle asserted that 'bodily exercise profiteth little,' he referred to the performance of rites and ceremonies when this law was not felt or obeyed—when the devotee was satisfied with the outward act alone, without making it an expression of inward sentiment. Thus a man may daily, and many times daily, perform religious services, and be profited little;

'For God abhors the sacrifice
Where not the heart is found.'

Because a machine might be constructed to do it all, as we have read of mountaineer travellers who could not spare the time to say a prayer at a particular point in their journey, and so turn a swivel, prepared there for the purpose, which is made to mean it all!

Let this then be understood—That we give no efficacy to forms and ceremonies in themselves considered. The divine power of religion does not reside in them, for that power enters the soul and touches the affections invisibly, even as the wind is not seen, though it is felt, and its might is confessed. But though such is the fact, still those means which act as outward aids to fix the mind—to concentrate thought and feeling—to aid meditation—are to be esteemed and regarded as of great value. Hence the worth—the spiritual value of a house set apart by solemnities for the purposes of devotion. Imagination is assisted; a pleasing awe is awakened; and the heart is involuntarily disposed to meditate on God and heaven. Thus the temple becomes the house of God and the very gate of heaven, so creative is that power of the mind which by association hallows times and places.

Let us yield to this principle of our nature when we consider the nature and utility of the rite of Communion, called by the apostle Paul, 'the Lord's Supper.' It has no meaning, if the heart does not attach one to it; it has no power, if the soul has not the right sympathy for it. Thus, and thus only can it be made a religious rite; and this our Savior taught when he bade his own to attend to it in remembrance of him. It cannot appeal to pride, for it is simplicity's self. It cannot appeal to man's love of the marvellous, for it has no mystic ceremony or hidden charm. It cannot appeal to ambition, for it is symbolical of no exertion of selfish energy, but of the utmost love of man. So unostentatious, so plain, so simple, it can appeal only to our religious affections, and be only an outward mean to dispose us to meditate seriously on spiritual truth, that we may be more impressed with invisible realities.

That a christian church was not in the primitive days of the Gospel a promiscuous congregation is evident, to my mind, from the direction in reference to an offending brother—'Tell it unto the church'—not to a promiscuous assembly. Refer to Matt. xviii. 17; Acts ii. 42. As many believers wish to observe the memorial rite, believing in its perpetuity and usefulness, how can they do this unless they associate together for the purpose? They thus connect themselves for mutual improvement in the christian graces, without arrogating to themselves any peculiar claims to sanctity.

There are many tender associations that serve to unite and happify the union of members of a family. By this union they are led to take deep interest in each others welfare—the social spirit is preserved, and love makes them charitable and forbearing. They guard from abuse and destruction whatever mementos of love may have been left by departed friends, and they keep them sacred as the great mass of the world never would. How often is the portrait of a virtuous and noble brother thus preserved through generations, and many hearts are incited to gain a like excellence of character. So with churches. They serve to unite believers more closely together, to form a common interest, to preserve the social spirit, and afford means of spiritual improvement that cannot be had without this association. They preserve the sacred memento of our Elder Brother's love—they guard it as sacred to his holy memory, and honor it as the great mass of the world, or of usual assemblies, never would. The great moral of his death—the hallowed associations that linger around the close of his career on earth, are brought at seasons very forcibly to mind, and good is done, and great good promised.

But, says one, I can take my bible and in the solitude of my chamber find the same aid. Do you attempt thus to find it? Do you succeed? And is there nothing in being surrounded with kindred hearts, beating in sympathy with yours, and swelling with like holy and heavenly thoughts? And do you think it but a slight thing that your Master hath asked you in this manner—by this rite, to fix your thoughts on him—his character, his life, and the purposes of his death? Is your way better than his?

'But,' say you, 'there is an awful solemnity thrown around it.' Friend, hast thou not a mind to separate the associations of man from the simplicity of truth? Man has made death most awful and revolting—is thy heart given to man, or to scripture when death is contemplated? Considered in itself, the rite is no more solemn or sacred than the evangelical records of the same event the rite is intended to commemorate. Intense thought and deep feeling will give to those records a peculiar sanctity—but it makes the heart the fonder cling to them, rather than to fly from them. The Communion is a solemn thing. We would not lessen in the least its solemnity. It is designed to bear us in spirit to Mount Calvary, and who would not be solemn there! It would aid imagination, and cause thought to kindle thought, till the mental picture is complete! O what a picture! It makes sad the countenance, but it is a sadness that makes the heart better—better to feel a Savior's love, to be impressed with his divine instructions, and to realize the glory of following in his footsteps. It is a solemn thing to attend the rite of burial when a dear one lies in death; but who is kept away by the solemnity? What depth is there in the love that would not meet and feel all the solemnity of the last service, but rest contented with a voluntary privacy at home and a mental burial service in honor of the beloved! Nay, nay, we should wish to be amid the hearts that feel like ours, and with them to mingle feelings and tears. Should it not be so with the christian rite?

'But I fear to take upon myself the new obligations!' continues the wavering. New obligations! What, has any rite a creative power to make new duties—to form new moral obligations! It cannot be. Jesus never declared that any such creative power was given to this ordinance; and every duty devolving on the holiest saint, is binding upon the humblest. Duties are not made by us. Our assent is not required. They are all of God, independent of man's will; and as much as we come short of obedience, we lessen the happiness it is our privilege to enjoy. These duties are not to be put away; and we should use every aid afforded us to bring their reasonableness more near and distinct, and by awakening thought and feeling to incline us to do them. By professing a desire to be more like our Master, and remembering him in deep feeling and earnest thought by attending his rite, we do not—we cannot, add to the commandments. We cannot write a new precept on the sacred page. The record is full. We are as much under obligation, deep and sacred obligation, to obey the precepts of Christ before we ever came to the table, as after. We were before, as now, bound to place on our lips a guard, to keep our desires pure, to walk honestly with man and humbly before God, and live in all things blameless. If our new connection or association has a tendency or an effect to cause us to feel more these duties—if our sacred hours awaken new and vigorous impulses to duty—if then the spirit registers new and holy vows, and we find strength to make us true in dwelling on Jesus, God be praised! let the association be valued, let our hearts fondly cherish its worth and sacredness.

‘I dread to incur some mysterious guilt,’ continues the objector. If your mind has been exercised on what the Apostle has said of eating and drinking unworthily, permit me to say, that he explains in the expression—‘not discerning the Lord’s body’—what he meant by partaking unworthily; i. e. improperly. The persons rebuked put no difference between the rite and a common meal—the parts of the rite were not symbolical to them. He that eats and drinks as a memorial or remembrance of Christ, eats and drinks in a worthy manner; but he who attends thereupon without considering the ends for which it was designed, and without grateful remembrances of what Christ has been, what he has done, and what he is, eats and drinks unworthily—with feelings not worthy of the occasion, because not in sympathy with its design. He that has a real dread of incurring guilt, must have a heart fully disposed to the right, and the fellowship of Christ will bless such a soul at the Communion.

‘But a public profession of religion will require abstinence from innocent pleasures in which I can now indulge,’ continues an undecided one. Thou art mistaken, for however men may have looked upon religion or understood its requirements, it nevertheless is true that

To make our pleasures less.’

What innocent pleasure is there that the genius of Christianity frowns upon? None. Her instructions can alone keep from the mirth that in the end hath heaviness, and she alone can guide to the best enjoyment of life. For we have religious capacities for partaking of spiritual joy, and if we clog the avenues of spiritual delight, we shut out from the soul its truest and purest cheerfulness.

‘But some strange state of mind is requisite, and I do not feel that disposition now.’ Who taught thee this, or of what singular conceit was it born? But one thing is requisite to the believer, and that is required in order to be profited by any religious service, or any prepared enjoyment, and that is—Sympathy therewith. Without this, we may be in the house of God, but it will not be the gate of heaven to the soul; without this, the professor may sit at the table of the emblems, but it will not be the table of Communion. Sympathy is the communicating spirit—the interpreter of the symbols—the mystic recorder of the sacred lessons of the holy hour. If thou hast a love of Jesus—if thy heart responds to his teachings of Invisible, Ever-operating, and Boundless Love, and if thou hast feelings that can be awakened to deep and melting pathos by thoughts of Calvary, the Risen Spirit, and Ascended Christ, and the glory of heaven, come thou to the Lord’s Table and Jesus will meet thee there, and thou shalt see his blessed features, as did the disciple that leaned on his breast at the Supper.

‘But there is great respect expressed for the rite by upright and good persons who do not attend, and this intimidates me,’ says a wavering one. I mourn the cause of your objection, but I mourn more that you are thus made timid. No where are you in the holy Word required to copy man, or to follow man, but to copy and follow Christ. The conduct of the upright and good will affect us, and I rejoice in all its righteous influences. But in this matter the divine record and the heart are to be consulted; self is to be examined, and we are to act according to individual conviction.

‘But I am told the rite was intended to be done away with at the coming of Christ.’ Who told you this? I opine you did not learn it in the sacred records. Once and once only is the coming of Christ alluded to in connection with a mention of the rite, and then there is no intimation that it was to be done away with after the coming. To Jew and Gentile the circumstances of Christ’s death—the crucifixion—were a subject of mockery and scorn; and so prominent did the enemies of Jesus keep the manner of Christ’s death before the people, that the Apostle was forced to say much respecting it; Christ crucified was often his theme, and his manly declaration was—"God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of Christ!" He anxiously desired the disciples to keep the cross in view, and wait for the coming of the Master when the testimony would be full and complete that the crucified Jesus was the risen and exalted Christ. If the early christians, dwelling under a miraculous age and blessed with the ministry of the Apostles, needed this rite, how much more do we? Why was the rite continued in the church, if it was only to be continued till the second coming of Christ? Was not the church under divine guidance when led from the slaughter house of Judea, and why was the celebration of the Communion renewed? There is nothing in the nature or design of the rite that intimates that it was to pass away at the coming of Christ, save at that coming when he meets the risen spirit in the resurrection world.

We have the record of its continuation in the church in the age next succeeding that of the Apostles, and abused as it has been, its history is valuable as an historical evidence of the existence and death of Jesus Christ.

'The eyes of the world will be upon me.' The eyes of God are already upon thee, and if this consciousness is thine, the gaze of man will not be feared. Moreover, if the watchfulness over your conduct by the world will be a control upon any evil habit, then the excuse you offer is a good reason for associating with the church.

'But many disgrace their profession.' Well, it is so—lamentable as is the fact. But hast thou a deep and heartfelt fear that thou shalt be like them? If so, come with us, we will trust in the power of that fear of wrong and reverence of the right, to keep thee true, by the grace of God.

'But I am not good enough.' O my brother or sister, do not talk of goodness as a distinctive badge; for the Lord's Table is not the place, if there is any, for a man or woman to boast of goodness. Your excuse would seem to say that those who do associate claim a peculiar goodness;—do not wrong them so. They associate to get good—to improve a mean of increasing their desires and efforts to be good; and they know by experience that great benefits have ensued to many a soul therefrom. Yes, many a communicant, whose heart has been warmed with a new love at those sacred seasons, fondly cherishes the memory of the holy interviews with the spirit of his Lord! his soul's eye has looked steadily on the spiritual and all benignant face of Jesus, and he has felt himself in love with all things good. Long years may obscure the record of them, but Memory, like Old Mortality, will move among the monuments of the past and revive the inscriptions, and holy thoughts thereupon will bless. Religious affections are the strongest, for they are the most divine; and beautifully has an illustration been given in a record of one of the faithful servants of Christ, who lingered long in service at the altar. 'By the fireside of his only son, he sat in peaceful dignity, and the children of another generation loved his silver locks. In that quiet recess, memory was lulled to sleep. The names of even familiar things, and the images held most indelible, faded as a dream. Still he lived on—cheered by that reverence which is due to the 'hoary head, when found in the way of righteousness.' At length, his vigor failed. The staff could no longer support his tottering steps, and nature tendered her last repose.

'It was attempted, by the repetition of his own name, to awaken the torpor of memory. But he replied, "I know not the man." Mention was made of his only son, the idol of his early years, whose filial gratitude had taken every form and office of affection: "I have no son." The tender epithet by which he had designated his favorite grandchild was repeated. "I have no little darling." Among the group of friends who surrounded his bed, there was one who spoke of the Redeemer of man. The aged man suddenly raised himself upon his pillow. His eye kindled, as when from the pulpit, in the vigor of his days, he had addressed an audience whom he loved. "I remember that Savior. Yes—I do remember the Lord Jesus Christ."'

We come then again to the simplicity of the ordinance—as a memorial of Christ. We do not fence it round with creeds or mysteries; we do not desire to throw around it any repulsive sanctity; we do not wish to make attendance upon it a distinctive badge of any peculiar merit; but believing that it is useful in fixing the mind so that deep and hallowed feelings are awakened, we plead for its observance. It has proved, and it may prove, to be an additional motive to be virtuous, to cultivate the holy and blessed spirit of our divine religion; and O surely we are not strong enough—we are not spiritual enough—we are not heavenly minded enough—to put away any available means to advance us in christian excellence.

'Some,' it has been truly said, 'are in as much bondage to the dread of forms, as others have been in bondage to the admiration of them. They are as superstitious in the rejection, as others have been in the observance of them.' Let us seek to be free from the power of both extremes, and look with calmness and thoughtfulness on the ordinance as a memorial of Christ and adapted to our present intellectual organization, as creatures of association.

And in order to profit by attendance upon the rite, we should remember that we are not to regard the rite as a mere act of homage—we are not to rest satisfied with a mechanical observance, but look upon it as a mean to obtain good. We must be careful to prepare our mind and feelings for a proper attendance, so that we may come with lively sympathy and sensibility. We must seek when attending the ordinance, to concentrate our thoughts and feelings, with fixedness of purpose, to realize the true nature of the occasion. We should be careful to carry with us from the house of Communion and preserve the sacred impressions made on our hearts while we communed together, and cause them to influence for good our character. Thus we shall partake worthily or properly, and Jesus will be present with us; lasting good will result to us, and, through our example, to others.

We do need to feel more our religion, that our example may be more that of the practical Universalist, which is but another name for the practical Christian. We have feelings whose strength we have not yet known, and we need to have a deeper interest in the things of the spirit awakened. We need oftener to visit Calvary—to enter the garden of the Sepulchre—with the disciples to meet the risen Lord. We give too much thought and affection to the outward world—to the world that changeth and passeth away, and too little to the imperishable things of the spirit and heaven. We need more of Christ within—the Christ of consciousness, that he may be with us every where and always, sanctifying every relation and duty of life, and causing us to joy in his joy. It is at the Communion where and when we can gain aid, strength, and encouragement, that are essential to christian progress; there the many purposes of Christ's death will be recalled—each of them powerful to affect the heart; by the application of the spiritual lessons there given, new sympathy with his self-sacrifice will be awakened, and the full purpose of the soul will be a willingness to meet and bear any and all trials that test the strength of our love to Christ.

Installation Hymns.

THE following Hymns were sung at the Installation of the Editor as Pastor of the First Universalist Society in Providence, R. I., March 17th.

O THOU, enthroned in Light and Love,
The sceptre of thy grace extend!
While here we lift our hearts above,
And as adoring spirits bend.

By solemn thought and fervent prayer,
We consecrate this union-day;
Do Thou our earnest hearts prepare,
To seek the Life, the Truth, the Way.

The Life by which the spirit lives
To God and Christ, and Man and Heaven;
The Truth which brightest visions gives,
As by her hand dark veils are riven;

The Way of virtue, bright and free,
Illumined by the smiles of God!
Where walk glad spirits, owned of Thee,
With willing steps, as Jesus trod.

Lord! we are thine! O bless this hour!
Thy servants and thy people guide;
May we confess thy glorious power,
And with thy holy Son abide.

AGAIN the choral song
We raise, great God, to Thee!
In union with the throng
Of spirits pure and free,
Who chant the glories of thy name,
And wide thy endless love proclaim.

We bless Thee that our hearts
Have known the joyous sound,—
The peace thy truth imparts,
The hope in Jesus found;
O may we e'er thy grace confess,
And live, as Jesus lived, to bless.

Now may we feel that Thou
Wilt smile on him, who here
Renews his solemn vow
To win souls to thy fear;
To comfort hearts oppressed with grief,
And give to anguished minds relief.

O may he bow and drink
Where'er truth's waters run;
From duty never shrink,
Till life's last work is done;
Then may he lay his armor by,
And in faith's triumphs hopeful die.

BETTER is it for true liberty and virtue, that mankind speak freely and act openly; hypocrisy is thereby shunned, and vice checked.

Written for the Repository.

Mrs. Julia H. Scott. Obituary.

ANXIOUSLY cherished hopes are broken and scattered, and the melancholy task is ours to announce the departure of MRS. SCOTT—one whose amiability endeared her to all who were privileged with her acquaintance and friendship, and whose writings were rich in elevating and refining thought and in the unction that interests the heart and bids the feelings flow. We cannot but weep as the conviction is forced upon us—that we shall no more receive treasures from the abundant wealth of her mind and spiritual affections, and that she has written her last for the eyes of mortals. But the thought is not entirely of a depressing nature, as new assurances of immortality rush in upon the soul while we dwell on the departure of so much excellence, and think of its new and better home. The attractions of heaven are indeed increasing every day, and the eye of the spirit more fondly than ever looks up and on, stretching its vision and rejoicing in its power to bear more light.

Mrs. Scott, previous to the last sleep, was made to know much of sorrow from sickness and bereavement, and the deep sadness of her spirit found utterance at times in the most melting and subduing song. But her faith in God was always firm, and her hope fervent and satisfying; and we cannot but muse on the consolations and enrapturing visions that must have visited such a gifted mind in the hours of self-communion, brought to her by a faith glorious as the perfections of God. She doubtless felt while comforting thoughts of the Redeemer poured their balm into her heart, as did the dying Hemans—'they are the sweetness of my couch.' As we think of her acute sensibilities, her vivid and luxuriant imagination, and her fondness for meditation, we bless God that hers was the faith that satisfies the deep, strong and wide spreading sympathies of a soul desiring good for the race. Her departure was a peaceful one, as we learn from a letter from the bereaved husband to Br. Price of the 'Union;' and it affords us satisfaction to present the following Obituary from a paper published in Towanda,—the place of Mrs. Scott's late residence.

'Died, in this Borough, on Saturday evening, March 5th, MRS. JULIA H., wife of DAVID L. SCOTT, M. D., in the 33d year of her age.'

The death of a lady so estimable as was MRS. SCOTT, has caused a deep lamentation among her relatives and numerous friends. We wish it was in our power to delineate the virtues of one so excellent in those qualities of mind and heart, which made her truly useful in the world. We shall attempt no eulogy of this kind, as we could add nothing to her faithful eulogy, found in the recollections of her friends.

Mrs. Scott was possessed of a strong discriminating and imaginative mind. In early life she manifested an inclination to avoid that incredulity which reasons out of reason, and that credulity which reasons not at all. She sought an intellectual life, and perhaps was never more truly in her element, when unscathed by disease, than in storing her mind with useful knowledge, and in giving form and creation to it, by the power of her poetic genius.

The fruit of her intellectual labor, was often given to the world. Her poetry was acquiring unusual celebrity, for one so little practised, and so remote from intercourse with the literary world, when her progress was arrested by domestic afflictions, and finally by the insidious disease which terminated her life. Her eminence would have been, that of one of the best female writers of the country.

At the period of her first affliction, her trouble was the burden of her song, which breathed the rapture of a heavenly faith. Who can doubt that she has awoke to immortal life, a minstrel of the spirit world, chanting the triumphs of redeeming love, with that cherub that made her first a mother.

In all the departments of life, she studied to fill the measure of her duty. She devoted much time to the subject of religion. In her faith she was firm and consistent; sometimes enthusiastic; which could not be otherwise in one of such generous sympathies. Her illness was very protracted, and often very distressing. She suffered with patience, lingered in hope, and died with full confidence in Him who suffers not a sparrow to fall to the ground without his notice.'

We hope that her very dear and sympathising friend and sister—Miss Edgerton, will be induced to make a collection or selection of Mrs. Scott's writings, not only as a memento of her talents and piety, but also because of their intrinsic beauty and value. One of the richest volumes ever sent forth from our press might be prepared from what she has left, and who can perform the task of editing so appropriately as the one named?

May the Gospel which so enriched and blessed the departed, yield needed consolations unto the bereaved partner, and sanctify the memories of the past. B.

'Pictorial Illustrations.' No. 2.

BY MISS M. A. DODD.

'WELL, cousin Mary, shall we have any more pictures to add to our collection? I think we cannot do anything better than employ our time just now in sketching. How smiling and still is the afternoon! how delicious and dreamy! if you do not paint, I shall certainly go to sleep. Do you see that soft white cloud away there in the South? I wish I had it for a pillow, and one of those farther up in the sky, that are fringed with the sunbeams, would make an elegant covering for this couch of green velvet; and with such a bed, pillow, and drapery, what a nice nap I might have: but what book is that which seems to claim your undivided attention?'

'It is Mrs. Adams' letters. I was looking at her portrait here, and thinking whether I could see her character in her face. How odd the hair is dressed; but I suppose that was the height of fashion in those days; the days of the Revolution; "the days that tried men's souls." Perhaps if I had not read the letters, her face would not show me her strong mind and firm affections. You give all praise to her devoted and unchanging love for her husband, which is so often and so beautifully expressed; but I admire most her piety and patriotism. Any woman will love her husband if she has a spark of tenderness in her soul; but you could not kindle up in the heart of every female, such a patriotic fire as burned in the breast of Mrs. Adams. But what were you saying about making bed-quilts, and pillow-cases, of the clouds, with the green grass beneath them to repose on? Why, my dear, you would freeze to death with such a sleeping apparatus, it sets me a shivering only to think of it; but I am not very much surprised that a young lady who is "getting ready" to be married should indulge in such a fanciful idea, and seek to unite the utile with the dulce—or the useful with the agreeable, to speak in plain English, for I abominate using any other language than my mother tongue—when furnishing articles necessary for comfortable housekeeping. Speaking about household furniture brings to my mind a suggestion that Fanny—not you, I mean our other Fanny—made last winter. Said I, "we keep two fires in our great room at home, one in the stove and one on the hearth." "What do you have two for?" asked Fanny. "O, that in the stove is to warm the room, and that on the hearth is to look at, for our folks want a fire that they can see." "Why then," said she, "you must get a skilful artist to paint a good rousing fire on a fire-board, and I should think that would do as well to look at." "O," said I, laughing, "that is a bright idea, surely, and you might call the device when completed a pictorial illustration."'

I shall be obliged to give up 'portrait-painting,' it don't agree with me; or to speak more properly, I have no genius for that branch of art. I have seen some pictures which so far outdo my humble efforts, as to cause me to throw away the pencil, and hide my diminished head in the shade. There are two, especially, which have haunted my memory ever since I looked upon them; they are so perfect, so life-like; their production was a triumph of art, and nothing but life itself could excel them. One would almost be led to think that the artist, like Prometheus, had stolen fire from heaven to breathe into his pictures; or, as the Indians thought when they saw the portraits of Catlin, that the life in the copy was taken from the original, and that in consequence their days would be shortened if they submitted themselves to the hands of the painter.

What a sweet spot this is upon the sunny hill-side! See those old moss grown stones above us! How many centuries, think you, have they lain there undisturbed? Look down now on the little village of R., is not that a picture? There are broad mountains in the back-ground, wooded to the very top, and at their base is a sparkling river singing and winding on its way. A white church is in the centre, standing on a gentle elevation, and there too is the grave-yard with its melancholy memorials of mortality. My heart swells as I gaze on that sacred spot; though its tenants were all to me unheeded; for my thoughts are with one who sleeps beneath the turf of another burial ground which is far away. The winding roads and the scattered dwellings; some white and pretty, others brown and ill looking; fill up the landscape, which is similar, in nearly all its features, to many others which you see in reality and on the canvass. Here are fairies, or some other light-footed gentry, coming up from the brook! Ah 'Lib'! is that you racing at such a rate? and 'Chubb' too, hurrying after? Who said you might have on your 'Sunday-go-to-meetin' frock, and that pretty white ruffled apron? and where are you going this Saturday afternoon, my beauties? oh, going a visiting, are you? well that's right; fetch me home some beech nuts, if you find any on the way, and I will draw a picture for you. Lib, you are a bright child, stop a moment and let me look at you! high forehead, black eyes, long lashes, pouting lips, and auburn hair—yes, it is decidedly auburn, and if any body is so odiously vulgar as to call it red, tell them if it is red it is admired. Chubb, you poppet! I wonder how your mother can bear to have you go away out of her sight; I should think she would be afraid somebody would steal you, such a sweet, modest looking little creature; if you was my child, I believe I should keep you tied tight to my apron-string. And now let me see you tripping it over the ground, my darlings. Ah Lib, you are like that queer Davy man, you always 'go a-head.' See the white apron and auburn curls flying in advance! I wonder if those two children will love each other as well when they grow up to womanhood!

'Yes, Mary, I think they will. There was a time when you and I frolicked away the hours as they do now, and our love has lasted through years of separation, through sorrow and through joy, and time only strengthens the affection which we gave to each other in our early years. No coldness, distrust, or any evil feeling, has ever come between us, and while we live our love must be still the same.'

'You speak the truth dearest, and I think there is more real friendship in the world than some would fain have us believe. Friends may prove false; but I have never been deceived by any that I loved; and when, after the storm of sorrow, my soul goes forth, like the dove from the ark, in search of sympathy; it finds sunshine and rest, and joyfully returns bearing fresh tokens of promise and hope. But we are growing sentimental when we ought to be filling our portfolio.'

I am thinking what exquisite enjoyment it must be for a real artist, one whose whole soul is in his profession, to go off on a sketching tour in summer weather, over our own delightful country. To wander at will, with an eye and heart that take in every beauty, over mountains and through valleys; across green forest dells, along the margin of winding rivers, and by the shore of silver lakes; sitting for hours upon the hill-side watching the gentle motion of the fleecy clouds, and listening with tranced soul to all the harmonies of nature. How much such light and silvery clouds as those above us add to the variety of a living landscape, or the charm and beauty of a picture. We seldom, if ever, find a picture with cloudless skies, and I have seen it somewhere humorously remarked, that though the painter may find it difficult to 'raise the wind,' he has studied his art to but little purpose if he cannot raise clouds at pleasure. Do you remember our second visit to Ben Ann? You have no names for the mountains about here, and I shall take the liberty to christen them. There were clouds which would do a painter's heart good to see that day. How they rolled up and darkened above our heads! How they changed from black to purple, to crimson and to gold! How they spread themselves over the sky turning out their fiery lining and trailing their gorgeous fringe along the celestial canopy; and how they grew brighter, and brighter, ere they passed away, till we could almost fancy that a band of angel visitants in their etherial robes were traversing the blue fields above.

What a nice little female party we were to go a cloud-gazing, ten of us, without a single 'Squire of Dames.' Did the young men of the village open their eyes with wonder, when they saw us set out thus unattended? and did we do it to bother them? 'oh no, I guess not, not by any means!' I cannot but laugh when I think of our 'order of march.' M., went forward as captain, and what need had she of mate or lieutenant? she was a 'whole team' by herself. Did she not sit her horse gracefully? and canter back and forth in fine style to see that order and decorum were preserved throughout the ranks? Two or three more, came next, managing their ponys handsomely, and the rest of us followed after in wagons with donkeys that wouldn't go; and Fan, I think your office as driver, that day, could not be called a sinecure. How the people stared in that farm-house at the foot of the mountain! I guess they thought a 'protracted meeting' had come, when they saw us all alight and fasten our horses to the fence. How the wind roared in the trees as we footed our way up the long ascent; and how a sudden shower overtook us to the detriment of shawls and bonnets; but we were well repaid for our toil, and m^oil, by a scene which some of us had viewed under a different aspect; by the fragment of a rainbow which rested in beauty and promise on a distant height; and by the dazzling clouds that displayed their splendor above us. That changing scene is all before me now, but it was one which the painter's art might vainly seek to imitate. I remember we had good appetites for our supper that night, and how we made the circle around the tea table laugh at the relation of our adventures.

But come cousin, let us go home now, for we have idled away the whole afternoon, and where are our 'pictures.'

Hartford, Ct.

Hideousness of Sin.

POETS have not always aimed to set forth sin in its true hideousness—in its plague spotted robes; but by the lights of imagination, they have thrown around it, too often, a false and treacherous beauty, like the sparkle of the wine-cup, or the purple wreath round the golden sceptre of the poisonous night-shade. And thus they have been false to their divine art, and dealt treacherously with an angel of God. Yet there have been those, who have studied the world of imagery to delineate the loveliness of virtue, and the hideousness of sin. One of these was the good and pious Herbert, whose poetry, like the chiming of bells, is full of silver music, and wakes none but hallowing associations in the echo-chambers of the soul. The remembrance of sin, with him, always exalts the grace of God; and that grace ever exhorts to deeper gratitude and stronger efforts to advance in the divine life. His poetry is exceedingly rich in ideas, and is peculiarly pleasing from the continual turning of familiar things to point a sacred moral. I will not cite quotations at present, but only copy one poem.

SIN.

'Oh, that I could a sin once see!
We paint the devil foul; yet he Hath some good in him, all agree.
Sin is flat opposite to th' Almighty, seeing
It wants the good of virtue and of being.

But God of us more care hath had,
If apparitions make us sad,
By sight of sin we should grow mad.
Yet, as in sleep we see foul death, and live;
So devils are our sins in perspective.'

It were well for us all if we gazed on these apparitions till sadness worked 'a godly sorrow.' They are the shades of evil deeds and thoughts, and they will follow and sadden us so long as we think and do evil. Beauty is the shadow of virtue, and the sight always gladdens. B.

Our Book and Memoranda Table.

TO AGENTS, &c. It is a matter of the first importance that all accounts should be settled as far as possible immediately, and we ask of our Agents to make returns without delay. Letters have been received from several individuals who were considered delinquents, stating that they have paid our Agents, and supposed that our Books bore witness of the same; to such we offer as an apology for troubling them with a reminder, the fact that no returns have been made in reference to them, and it may be in some cases that the Agent is desirous of closing the accounts of all subscribers in his region ere he sends in. We hope, however, that all our Agents will immediately send as good returns as they may be able to, that we may balance as many accounts as possible at the close of the volume.

NAMES STRICKEN OFF. Those delinquents who take no notice whatever of our letters to them, may be assured that their names will be stricken from the list of subscribers at the close of this volume. We must resort to this method of ridding ourselves of many who receive our work as if it were a pension due them—like the man who said he received a certain paper because he was a patron of it, but never thought of paying for it! Such patrons we do not desire, and we shall soon know who they are, and strike them from our list of names.

'PRO AND CON OF UNIVERSALISM.' By George Rogers. Mr. Tompkins has issued a very neat edition of this excellent and popular work. It is a discussion of the arguments proposed for and against Universalism, conducted in a somewhat novel manner, highly interesting, and full of sound sense, scriptural knowledge, with apt and forcible illustrations. It is not a continuous essay, neither is it a series of chapters, but a very pleasing variety of modes of presenting the subject and argument has been adopted that gives it unusual interest and engrosses attention to the matter unfolded. We need not repeat what we have said in a previous number, but ask our readers to refer to the work and examine it for themselves. It will be found to be a good work for Sabbath School teachers, and Society Libraries; and we hope it will have a wide circulation; 382 pages, duodecimo size, price $1, neatly and strongly bound.

Those who hold prospectuses with subscribers names, will please make immediate returns.

THE ANCIENT HISTORY OF UNIVERSALISM: From the time of the Apostles, to its condemnation in the Fifth General Council, A. D., 553. With an Appendix, tracing the doctrine down to the era of the Reformation. By Hosea Ballou 2d. This very valuable work has long been out of print, and no copies were to be had 'for love or money.' We are glad that this want no longer exists, as a very neat edition has been issued by Br. Z. Baker, Providence, R. I. He has done himself credit by the style in which the new edition has been sent forth, and we have no doubt of the speedy sale of the whole. The work is one of the most interesting of histories, while for purity and perspicuity of style, it is worthy of becoming a model to those who would write with elegance and simplicity. There is not an individual, we will venture to say, who owns and has read the work, who will be willing to part with it, if his heart is interested in the progress of the great Hope, and his mind has any sympathy with historical records. Those of 'the household of faith' who have not perused it, have a rich treat in store, and we strongly commend it to them as a work of rare interest and worth. All our Society, Teachers', and Sabbath School Libraries, should each secure one or more copies immediately, as it will not only be valuable as a history, but will be found to be of great value in showing the variety of forms in which the Great Idea has been developed, and how variously the human mind has travelled to the hill of most glorious prospect.

The edition issued by Br. Baker is printed on good paper, with clear and good type, and handsome impression. It is strongly and neatly bound in sheep; and can be had at this office. Price $1.

TYPOGRAPHICAL ERRORS. If errors frequently occur where an Editor has direct supervision of the press, and can give verbal directions to the corrector, it cannot be expected that our work should be perfect, situated as we always have been and are, at a distance from the place of publication. All our corrections, &c. must necessarily be done by writing, and delays sometimes occur, which require haste in making up the forms, so that errors are overlooked that otherwise might be corrected. We prepare all copy with care, and read the proof with attention,—though generally this task comes upon us after the weariness of the day and evening create a distaste for any such labor,—and yet errors occur. Let them be candidly passed over, for we believe that, notwithstanding the difficulties under which we labor, our work is more free from blunders of this kind than the generality of publications.

We regret several errors which have occurred in the articles by Mrs. Broughton, but the fact is, that her ideas are so brilliant, that we are dazzled at times, and mistakes of a word are easily passed over. In the first line of the noble poem on the Sea, in the January No., 'surrounding' is printed for 'ever-sounding,' which certainly makes the emphasis and measure smoother, and therefore let it be corrected. In the October No. is an article entitled 'Night Musings,' in the eleventh line of which the word 'alas' should be 'afar.' Mrs. B. speaks of another mistake, but in what article we know not, where 'bowed rose' occurs for 'loved rose,' wishing the restoration of an invalid to 'truth' instead of 'health.' We promise her more strict care in the future, for we are not willing that she should charge to her hand-writing what belongs to us to bear. Her penmanship is plain enough.

FOUR PROSPECTUS. We send out a Prospectus for the new volume—commencing July 1st.—and we hope our friends will not be indifferent to our actual and serious wants. Let a trial be made to see what can be done. Speak of the work in the social circle and at the Teachers' meeting, and cheer us by returns of good and true names. The new volume will be a great improvement upon its predecessors, and centre in itself more of the true qualities of a permanently useful magazine. It is not, and will not be a work specially devoted to any particular section of the country, but will be designed to promote the general interests of the cause of Truth everywhere. It will be found, we trust, to be an acceptable family magazine wherever it shall be received, and will exert a healthy influence upon minds that commune with it. With the increase of paying subscribers will be an increase of means to improve the work, and we shall promptly do all we are encouraged to do. Let us not be discouraged. Read the Prospectus.

LETTERS ON REVIVALS. The new work by Br. O. A. Skinner, has met with a good reception from the public, and quite an extensive circulation has already been given to it. We hope the edition will be completely exhausted, and that wherever it goes, it will fall into the hands of readers and thinkers, aiding in forming rational and scriptural judgments concerning revivals, distinguishing between clerical trickery and calm and serious effort to develop a right religious sentiment, with a proper respect for the office of reason. Br. Skinner's work is written in a good style, plain and pungent; and one of the best critics in our denomination writes us, that he thinks Br. S. has done honor to himself and justice to his subject in this work. A. Tompkins is the publisher; price 50 cts. per copy.

DETACH THE PROSPECTUS. As a matter of convenience, the Prospectus is pasted to this No. Let it be detached and faithfully used. We hope to receive many copies again well adorned with good and true names, as a testimonial of the real interest many of our friends take in the circulation and usefulness of our work.

OFFERS OF BOOKS. We ask attention to the offers of Books enumerated in the Prospectus. A large list is presented, embracing the best works issued from the denominational press, and by a little exertion many of our friends can very cheaply possess some valuable books.

NEW WORK IN PRESS. A. Tompkins has in press and will soon publish a volume of Sermons by Br. O. A. Skinner. The Sermons are on doctrinal subjects, and the work will comprise a series which the author has just finished, and which have been quite popular.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS. A writer in the 'Trumpet' comments in an offensive manner on our style of noticing the favors of correspondents, which notices are no more subjects of general criticism than private letters are, as they are intended only for the individuals to whom they are severally directed, and frequently contain allusions which cannot be understood by any others. A notice is cited by the writer which is meaningless without a previous one to which it alluded, and in which a passage of scripture was introduced. We should not have noticed the matter at all, were it not that we are accused of preparing and 'lavishly' pouring out 'a dose' of 'mawkish sentimentality' and 'soft-sayings' for one whom it is supposed we do not know to be 'a woman of sterling sense.' We trust that it will need more than one critic to induce Mrs. Case to believe that we were ever guilty of offering 'soft-sayings' to any woman, and especially to one whom we so highly and sincerely esteem as L. J. B. C. We take not to ourselves one single commendation of the writer, for to us the praise is but the 'sweetening' of the 'ipeccac-uanna.'

Foster in his Essay on the application of the epithet Romantic, treats in the opening of the great convenience of having a number of words that will answer the purposes of ridicule or reprobation without having any precise meaning, and we are often reminded of this when we hear members of a certain class talking about 'sentimentality.' This is a very convenient word to those whose element is a frigid indifference to all warmth of feeling, or a cold intellectuality; but these cynical critics must be content with simply criticising, as they will never be able to prune the exuberance of sentiment in hearts full of feeling, or clothe nature in a Quaker suit. This has no reference to the critic alluded to above.

We regret that we did not receive in season for this No. the continuation of the very acceptable series of sketches of life and character by Charlotte. 'Grace Esdale' shall appear in our next. We may here remark, that it was the intention of the writer of the series alluded to, to style them 'Lights and Shades of Woman's Life,' which would have conveyed to the reader one idea of their author in penning them. We solicit a continuance.

We acknowledge with pleasure the receipt of two articles from Mrs. Broughton, which we shall give in our next. She will answer our urgent request, we hope, for a favor for the opening No. of the new volume.

We have in reserve several poems by Julia 'The Offering' in our next.

Ione's very acceptable favors in our next.

The Worth of Sympathy.

WHAT more does man need to prompt to deeds of charity and compassion, and all the gentle offices of domestic and social life, than full sympathy with the spirit of the Savior's words: 'Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation: the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak.' We shall be indeed kind and considerate if in our hearts is the same tender forbearance, gentle patience, and excusing kindness, that in the breast of Jesus had full sway when he uttered those words. Such a sympathy is alone needed; and a gushing, living fountain does not more naturally throw out its sparkling and beautiful waters, than does such a man of charity distribute of his plenty for the benefit of the needy; and as that fountain seems glad and musical as its streams flow out to bathe the perishing flowers and plants, and scatter its moisture to give cheerfulness to the spots where blight has been, so does that man manifest a delight that he has the power to bless the sorrowing and desolate; and they who receive the ministrations of his charity know how well he has received the apostolic exhortation: 'Let him that giveth, do it with simplicity; he that sheweth mercy, with cheerfulness. Let love be without dissimulation.'

If then, such a true and needful spirit is embodied in the words of our Lord to which we have alluded, it cannot but promise good to attempt to unfold and apply the fact and its teachings.

The reader doubtless readily recalls the associations of those expressions by the Master. The solemn shades of night were around him, and in his soul was the consciousness of what the morrow would bring. He took with him some favored disciples to the depths of the sacred Mount, as the sorrow of his spirit caused him to feel the need of hearts of sympathy near him. But they had not yet learned to know him; they saw not into the coming day, and knew not why he should need more than ordinarily the companionship of the wakeful eye and ready lip for converse. He told them of his sorrow—of his anguish of spirit—and bade them watch with him, be ready to cheer, while he withdrew a little distance to pray. He prayed, and the grief of his burdened soul was eased by utterance. He returned to his chosen ones—and they were asleep. Even the enthusiastic and fervid Peter had yielded to weariness and was slumbering, unconscious of the sorrows that were oppressing the heart of him he professed to love. 'What! could ye not watch with me one hour?' said the Son of Man to him. 'Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation: the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak.'

Again he withdrew—prayed—and returned, and they were asleep again. He uttered nothing, but again sought the spot sanctified by prayer, and when he had again prayed, he came back to the sleeping disciples and said: 'Sleep on now and take your rest.' He had been strengthened for the perils and terrors approaching, and he knew they would need all the rest and strength they could gain that night to fit them for the anxiety and cares of the morrow; and remembering human nature, how the comfort of the physical should be regarded while the spiritual was revered, his compassion and forbearance found utterance in the exclamation: 'Sleep on now, and take your rest.'

What divine considerateness, tenderness, and charity, are here exhibited! His spirit almost crushed by the weight of impending horror and agony—his heart bleeding over the cruelty of those he came to bless—and his delicate sensitiveness demanding the sympathy of true affection, he comes to his chosen ones—those who seemed ever most anxious to be honored by him and whom he had selected for the tender office of sympathy and bade watch with him—and finds them asleep! negligent of duty—unconscious of their relation to him. But he did not rebuke them harshly, nor spurn them from him. He found an apology for their neglect, and blessed them with the counsel of wisdom;—‘Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation: the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak.’ Counsel that should ever linger by us—that should be a part of our consciousness—and into the spirit of which our whole being should be baptized. It tells us to watch and pray that we enter not into the temptations that often throng around us, to keep us from the full and free exercise of sympathetic feeling, to make us forget the sorrows of others, and be unmindful of the wants of the needy near us, and to excuse ourselves in our narrow love for man by ungenerous judgments and views of others. How great—how successful, are these temptations over many! else why are their hands so slow to open, and why is there so little in them when opened? why are they so ready to tell of the vices of the poor—of the want of prudence and foresight, and the guilt thereof—of the impostures so often practised, and the uncertainty of doing real good? Ay, and why do they show so little evidence of having deeply thought of what would be the judgment of Him who looketh from the throne of heaven down into the lowest depths and the farthest retreat of guilt in our being, if he were to judge them by the rules by which they judge others?

Selfishness is the most subtle enemy of the spirit. It assumes a thousand forms, and sometimes can so adroitly deck itself, that it is mistaken for generosity, and its victim flatters himself with the visit of the hypocrite as quite an honor. You see selfishness almost every day stalking along in this borrowed garb, as the usurer tells how he helped the perplexed out of difficulty, but says nothing of the per cent rate of his benevolence; as the ambitious politician boasts of his love of the public good, and says nothing of his conscious unfitness for the office he covets; as the trader, with piteous looks, describes how he was touched with pity by the sight of a sad case of poverty and want, and gave the mother some work to do he did not at the time want, and adds nothing about the mean and despicable low price she must do it for, nor how the present work must be done now for a future want; and we often see this benevolent selfishness as men decline proffering the least aid to a struggling family lest they should not feel enough the necessity of self-exertion; or in depriving a family of former assistance soon as the least appearance of the father's recovery is seen, lest he be encouraged in idleness. O we do need to watch and pray that we enter not into temptation—that we be not seduced to contract our sympathies, to send the warm blood back cold and icy, and avert our face from suffering lest we feel too much. Let christianity enlighten and control reason, and we cannot feel too much—we need not fear to bless with charity the needy, nor to be free and generous; and we shall feel that it is better to give to ten unworthy and reckless objects of charity, than that by too rigid carefulness we be deprived of the benediction of one true heart, who has a soul to appreciate a gift, and a mind to use it rightly.

As we consider the Savior's apology for his disciples and his charge to them, let us heed the lessons of our subject:—

1. Watch and pray to be guarded from the outer influences that would oppose the exercise of true and free sympathy. Had the disciples but possessed more of true and deep-felt sympathy, they would doubtless have longer resisted the charm of sleep, and watched with their Master. It is the power of sympathy that makes the tender mother forget that the human constitution requires sleep, as she moves around the sick and suffering child. To her there is no night, save that of death, and her devotion to the sick one would seem to say that she has power by her love to keep the shadows of that night away. It is the might of sympathy that nerves the arm and fills the whole frame with unwonted strength, in the time of outward calamity, and leads to the risk of self for the safety of others. Sympathy will change toil to pleasure, night to day, and give joy even to grief. It is the heart of all true zeal for human good, and sends through the whole spiritual man the life blood of goodness. It is the soul of all true greatness, and keeps ambition from those heights where man must live alone. The shadowy glory of those stations is dearly bought by the sacrifice of human sympathy, whereby the soul forgets that God fashioneth all hearts alike, and is kept from being moved to generous and noble impulses to benefit mankind. Ay, there have been monarchs who would have given their crowns to have thrown themselves into the arms of their humblest subject, could they be assured that in the breast of such beat for them a true heart of warm sympathy. To outlive sympathy, is to outlive life's best good. It is to shut the eye by which the sweetest poetry of humanity is read, to close the ear to the most delicious harmonies, and still the heart to the most joyous pulsations. In health we need it; in sickness we must have it; and if in death it is not ours toward angels and heaven, how dark will be the tomb! how sad our departure! and oh, how unlike him whose chief gladness during mortal existence hath been—the assurance of the life of eternal and purest sympathy with Christ and God!

Should we not then watch and pray, lest we be betrayed by the temptations to selfishness, which will lessen our active sympathies and make us unmindful of the happiness of others! Indeed we should, so long as we are preserved social beings, and the law of love is the law of God and our whole nature. And these temptations are many—they easily beset us, and come around us in a thousand forms. When the wounding jest is upon our lips, we are tempted to sacrifice sympathy to wit, and how frequent is this temptation! Watch and pray against it! for it is a tempter that has wounded many a gentle spirit, and oft in social life crushed the joy of many a sensitive heart. Does affection's voice plead with us to forego some hurtful indulgence, and do we pause in indecision? Then are we tempted to sacrifice love to appetite, and turn away from the voice of God in human sympathy. And why is it that so many are betrayed while abroad, who when in their homes with their loves, are bowed with remorse because of slighted and wounded affection? Simply because they do not carry with them into the world the awakened sympathies of home. The noise and din of the world, drowns the gentle whisperings of love; the praying Savior in the distance is forgotten; they forget to watch, they cease to pray, and ere they are aware the disciple of goodness sleeps! Watch and pray, lest ye enter into temptation—lest the Lord of glory in you be betrayed while ye slumber, and when ye awake, it be but to confusion and remorse.

O indeed, life's chief happiness flows from the right exercise of the gentle charities, from lively sensibility, from patient nurturing of home piety, and watching and praying against all that shuts the avenues of the heart to the entrance of the angels of christian sympathy. And while we are faithful to this lesson, do not let us ask too much of sympathy, lest our own become selfish, and we become misanthropic in our feelings. Sweet as it is to receive, yet greater blessedness rests upon the giving, for from this came the joy of Jesus. And from this comes the joy of the angels, with whom there is rejoicing over the sight of the penitent, and who wait in patient trust the time when they shall sing the anthem of universal purity and bliss. O the sympathy of heaven for man! how little known, and how much less is it felt! Without it, what were we? With it, what may we not hope? It pleads with us; it moves our hearts as we listen to the song of praise, the earnest breathings of prayer, and the warm utterance of gospel truth. It comes to us when silent admiration chains our attention to the beautiful and grand in nature, in the floating clouds, the verdant earth, the towering rock and mountain, the ever free, magnificent and glorious sea. It visits us when we look upon the stars, and feel the silent loveliness of night; when we gaze on infant innocence, the pure sports of childhood, and on the calmness and sanctity of death. Every thought that bears us back to the past by love of the pureness of early days, or forward to the realms of immortal life and blessedness, is a visitation of the sympathy of Heaven. Every aspiration after christian excellence, every longing for progress, every sigh for unshadowed love, every desire for the end of sin, every wish for the reconciliation of a lapsed world to the Author of being, is a whispering of the sympathy of God. It is the divine within, holding communion with the Unsearchable; the voice of the spirit speaking out its wants; and we are wise only as we obey the holy teachings thereof.

We were made for God and Heaven. The elements of our immortal life are wrapt up in our present being. We may follow Christ and have his blessedness here, ere the voice of God's power in the resurrection shall call us forth to the fruition of our hopes. Watch and pray! is our Leader's command. Watch against the triumph of the earthly and sensual; pray for strength equal to our day; and when sleep comes, may the Savior be near in his compassion; and when we awake, may it be to see, not the Lord betrayed into wicked hands, but glorified as our Redeemer, and imparting unto us that perfect sympathy for man by which he will draw all to himself. God, the great Spirit, is willing; he cannot be tempted; the interests of humanity are secure in the Love that never slumbers or sleeps. Let us be thankful—thankful in spirit and action through life; and through sympathy with the divine and perfect, 'the spirit of glory and of God' shall rest upon us. Even so, Father, let it be.

An Elegy.

BY MRS. SARAH BROUGHTON.

To the memory of one who left us in all the pride of youth and loveliness, only to rest in a stranger's grave.

A STAR of loveliest light has left our sky,
An orb whose radiant path we loved to trace;
Its kindling lustre faded from the eye,
Ere the meridian of its shining race.

And art thou gone? thou of the noble brow,
Where smil'd the impress of immortal thought!
Has envious death forever veil'd the glow
Of thy rich glance, with kindest feeling fraught?

O many a weary head and aching heart
Sigh for the shadow of death's folding wings;
They would not shrink from his uplifted dart,
Or grieve to bid farewell to earthly things.

But thou so loved and good, so fondly shrined
In many a noble bosom's deep recess;
So many clustering virtues round thee twined,
So brightly beamed thy spirit's loveliness;—

How could we deem, when thou hadst sought the bloom
Of fragrant bowers beneath a milder sky,
Thy form so soon should rest within the tomb,
Thy spirit seek the fairer realms on high.

But Hope her taper lights amid the gloom
That shrouds our spirits in the mourning hour;
Her radiance gilds the valley of the tomb,
Revealing light beyond the clouds that lower.

And Faith, the eagle-pinioned seraph, wings
Her flight triumphant o'er the gloomy grave,
She plants her banner by the eternal springs
O'er which the flowers of bliss perennial wave.

There mid the ranks of flaming Seraphim,
Who tune their lyres beside the crystal streams;
Life's vale o'erpast, thou'st join'd the angel's hymn,
And bath'd thy soul in glory's living beams.

Farewell, farewell, thy memory is a light
Relieving many a tint on life's dark scroll,
While musing on thy path so purely bright,
We half forget the coffin and the pall.

Green be the verdure o'er thine early grave,
Gentle the gales that sigh above thy head,
Brightly the blossoms of the spring-time wave,
And cast their dewy incense on thy bed.

Grace Esdale.

'Oh, never despair! for our hopes oftentimes,
Spring as swiftly as flowers in the tropical climes,
Where the spot that was barren and herbless at night,
Is waving with bloom, in the morn's rosy light.'

LOVER.

AFTER all the heterogeneous compounds, which pass current under the astounding titles of life-invigorators and health-restorers, there is nothing which will cure so many fancied diseases as that simple recipe—Cheerfulness! 'Laugh and grow fat' is a vulgar old adage, but there is nevertheless much of truth and philosophy in it. How many a miserable hypochondriac, who dies daily an imaginary death, might walk forth into the sunshine a happy and useful man, could he be persuaded to adopt this sovereign remedy of activity and cheerfulness. It is of no use to find fault with, or grumble at the world; 'tis a good world, for God made it, and the evil is always equally balanced with the good; 'There's beauty all around our paths,'—mercy has an abiding place in every dwelling, and a cheerful and contented spirit will make a paradise of the most desert spot.

I have, in my mind's eye, at this moment, a picture of one, whose daily life is a beautiful illustration of this principle; I would you could see her, but as you cannot, I must content myself with giving you a simple and very imperfect sketch. 'She is certainly the happiest woman in the world!' I exclaimed to a friend, as we left the pleasant dwelling of Miss Grace Esdale, or, as she was familiarly called in the village, Aunt Gracey. She belonged to that despised and abused, but truly useful sisterhood—old maids; which constitutes a considerable, and valuable portion of our little community. The villagers have long since placed Miss Grace on the shady side of forty, but I am always rather sceptical on that point, as who would not be that ever saw her. Her figure retains all its roundness and activity, her step its lightness and elasticity; her cheek, though pale, is scarcely furrowed; her large blue eyes beam with benevolence and good humor, and there are but few silver threads mingling with the dark brown tresses, parted with such nice precision on her forehead, and put carefully back under the simple muslin cap, of snowy whiteness and exact plaiting. Her dress is always neat and plain, consisting usually of a black bombazine gown and a white neckerchief, fastened over the bosom with a small brooch containing the blended hair of her parents, the only ornament she ever wears. Such is Miss Esdale, and her dwelling is no less picturesque than its mistress. It is a low, old-fashioned tenement; the roof projects in front, and forms a sort of porch upheld by rustic pillars, which as well as the roof are completely over-run with honey-suckle; in front of the house is a little garden tastefully laid out, and disposed in fanciful shapes, such as stars, diamonds and true-lover's knots, surrounded with the ever verdant box. Beneath the shade of a large old elm-tree is a garden chair, where in the warm summer days, Aunt Gracey sits with her book or work, while at her feet a little brook ripples gently by. The inside of the house is in perfect keeping with the outside. The deep, old-fashioned window seats are filled with pots of flowers, both native and exotic—the little vases on the mantel piece are filled with boquets; her birds sing merrily in their cages, her gold and silver fishes sparkle brightly in their globes, and books and pictures, and above all, the pleasant face and cheerful conversation of Miss Esdale, make that little room seem an earthly Eden.

It was on leaving Daisybank after a call, which her fascinations had lengthened into an unconscionable visit, that I made the enthusiastic exclamation regarding her happiness. My companion smiled at my warmth, but made no reply, and for some time we walked on in silence. At length, as if still pursuing a train of thought she replied—'Yes, Grace Esdale is a happy woman; and yet she has met with many of what the world calls crosses and disappointments, and which would have made the romantic young ladies of the present day "perfectly miserable;" nay, my dear,' she continued, as she met my deprecating looks, 'I am not speaking of that true romance which is inherent in every pure and noble heart, but of that lackadaisical, sentimental nonsense, which is dignified with the name of romance, and tender sensibility. Sorrow, disappointment, and death have often entered Grace Esdale's dwelling, wringing with bitter anguish every fibre of her heart, but they have never chilled it, or laid it waste; for it yet glows with kindly sympathies and warm, generous affections. Time, which brings changes to all, has passed lightly over her; and she has changed gradually from the frolicsome child, to the sprightly girl, and now at the mature age of five-and-forty, for notwithstanding your doubts, Grace Esdale has really reached her ninth lustre, she is a cheerful and happy woman. But when I begin to speak of her, time flies swiftly, and here we are at home; but after tea, if you wish, I will relate to you some of the leading events of her life.'

When the evening meal was concluded, I claimed the performance of my friend's promise, and having settled ourselves comfortably in the broad window-seat, she commenced her narrative. 'Grace Esdale was by many years the youngest of a large family of sons and daughters, the children of a wealthy and eminent merchant, in a large and populous city. As is usually the case with the youngest of a large family circle, Grace was the idol and plaything of the whole; and it was a matter of no small wonder to every one, how or when she became mistress of so many accomplishments, and acquired such a stock of varied information. One by one her sisters married and left the paternal mansion—her brothers engaged in their different professions and pursuits, and at the age of fifteen, Grace alone remained at home to cheer and bless the declining years of her parents, the sunshine of their dwelling and the joy and pride of their hearts. A bonnie creature was she then, as you who are so enthusiastic in your admiration of her now in the autumn of her life, will readily believe. Beauty, in the common acceptance of that word, she did not possess; for her features were cast in no precise mould, and her complexion, though perfectly clear and soft, was pale, and approached far nearer the brunette than the blonde; but then she had a profusion of rich brown hair, which was always neatly and gracefully arranged; full scarlet lips, whose every smile revealed a thousand dimples, large, glorious blue eyes, and such a laugh—oh, I never heard aught like it! It was not the hoydenish mirth of a school-girl, nor the affected simper of a fashionable belle, but a soft, low, delicious laugh, which fell on the ear like a chime of silver bells, or sweet music heard in the still night. Such was Grace Esdale, when at seventeen she made her debut in the fashionable circles of her native city. Admirers soon thronged to her shrine, some attracted by her youthful loveliness, some by the graceful simplicity and naivete of her manners, and others by the knowledge that she was the sole unmarried daughter of a rich millionaire, who, it was well known, had splendidly portioned his elder children; while a small annuity, the bequest of a god-mother whose name she bore, was magnified into a considerable fortune. Had Grace been born the daughter of a farmer or mechanic, she would probably have passed through the aristocratic circles as a pretty girl, and nothing more; but as Miss Esdale, with the magic word heiress appended thereto, she was instantly enthroned Queen of Fashion, a beauty and a belle. She was followed and flattered; her eyes were likened to the hue of heaven, her smile to its sunshine, her lips were rubies, and her teeth pearls, her portrait graced the exhibitions, while numberless 'Sonnets to Grace,' perpetrated by some sentimental lovers, made their appearance in the periodicals. The only wonder was, that poor Grace's head was not turned; but for a whole year she remained proof against all attacks upon her heart, to the great surprise of the fashionable gossips; and even Grace herself, at length began to think it rather strange that among so goodly a set of beaux, none had as yet captivated her fancy.

'The next season the fashionable current set towards Saratoga, and thither went Grace with her attendant satellites. It was during her stay at the Springs, that another was added to her list of admirers, who bade fair to eclipse his predecessors, and bear off the prize. This competitor was no other than Maurice Fletcher, Esq. a handsome, dashing, and high spirited southerner. Soon after her arrival, he procured an introduction to Miss Esdale, and was thenceforward her most devoted servant; her attendant in every ride or drive that was projected, her companion in the promenade, her partner in the dance. Many a fair belle to whom his attentions had been paid, now found herself thrown in the background, and Miss Esdale's numerous admirers were obliged to give way to this new and all-conquering aspirant. Grace was completely fascinated; it was in vain that the loud tongue of rumor proclaimed the graceful, elegant Fletcher an unprincipled roué, who had come northward to patch up a ruined fortune with the gold of some heiress, who could be persuaded to barter her wealth for a handsome, worthless husband. Grace was deaf to all but the impassioned eloquence of her lover; blind to all but his devotion—and when after an acquaintance of four weeks, he made her a tender of his heart and hand, she who had refused the most eligible matches in her native city, accepted it with a single reservation—her parents' consent! Fletcher accompanied her on her return home, and though he failed to please or dazzle the sober minds and imaginations of Mr. and Mrs. Esdale, they could not withstand the earnest pleadings of their child, and with many misgivings they consented. They could not long entertain feelings of dislike towards him, for Grace's happiness was infectious; but they did stipulate that six months should elapse ere the engagement was fulfilled, that each might have ample opportunity to study the character and disposition of the other. Fletcher's game, however, was too deeply played, to allow any opportunity of exposing its artifices, and the wedding day was at length appointed. Feeling now secure of his prize, and grown weary of the long restraint which had been imposed upon him, he resolved to join a party of young men, who were going on a roystering expedition, and under the pretence of returning home to prepare a residence for his bride, he departed. Three weeks was to be the term of his absence, two had already expired, and Grace was joyously looking forward to his return, when the family received a shock, which for a time completely paralysed them. Mr. Esdale had been persuaded by a friend, to embark his whole fortune in a large and dangerous speculation; it had failed—and the rich millionaire of one week, was the penniless bankrupt of the next! Nursed in the lap of luxury and affluence, and scarcely knowing the value of money, it was no wonder that at first Grace could not comprehend the extent of their misfortune; and when she did, her thoughts instantly reverted to Maurice Fletcher, and the probable effect which this change of fortune would produce upon him. It was possible that he might not have heard of it, and she finally concluded to write him a full account of what had occurred, and request him to hasten his return. The letter was accordingly despatched, breathing all the fervent tenderness and graceful dignity of a trustful and loving woman. Oh how anxiously Grace watched for his coming! for that he would come, she had not the smallest doubt. Never did woman confide more fondly in man's truth and affection, than she did in that of Maurice Fletcher. "He will return," said Grace, "and prove to those who would have made me distrust his motives, that it was myself and not my fortune he sought;" and during the tedious days that must intervene ere he could possibly answer her summons, she beguiled the time with forming plans of future happiness. "I almost rejoice," she would say, as she sat between her parents, with a hand of each clasped in her own, "in our loss of fortune, for I might have felt less reluctance at leaving you, had you remained in affluence; but now, while we live, nothing shall part us; our home may be humble, but we shall not care, so we are all together, and I am sure Maurice will coincide in all our plans."

'The day to which Grace had so hopefully looked forward, arrived and passed, yet Maurice Fletcher came not; but she comforted herself with the idea that he might not have received her letter in season, or that something might have occurred to delay his journey, and she was sure he would come to-morrow. The morning meal was scarcely concluded the ensuing day, when the postman's rap was heard, and a letter was placed in Miss Esdale's hand. She was at first a little disappointed, but she instantly checked the expression, and smiled as she said, she had no doubt the letter would satisfactorily account for his tardiness. She broke it open, and read as follows:—"My dear Miss Esdale,—Your letter conveyed to me the first intelligence of your misfortune. I was extremely shocked, and join with the rest of your friends in condoling with you. Among the many unpleasant consequences that must ensue from it, the most painful is the necessity of breaking our engagement. The small remnant of my own fortune will barely afford me a subsistence, and it would be little better than downright madness for a poor bankrupt devil like myself, to hamper himself with a dowryless wife. You will of course see the propriety of this measure, and I am sure you are far too generous to take advantage of aught I may have said under different circumstances. I have no doubt your views of the subject will entirely coincide with my own;—I shall wait impatiently for your answer, and with many wishes for your happiness, I am your devoted, humble servant,

MAURICE FLETCHER."

'Poor Grace! she sat with her eyes riveted to the letter, while tenderness, indignation, and scorn, were tugging at her heart-strings; till, looking up, she met the anxious gaze of her parents, and placing the letter silently before them, she covered her face with her hands, and burst into a passionate flood of tears. Mr. and Mrs. Esdale were highly incensed at the heartless insolence of Fletcher's conduct, but they restrained the expression for the sake of their child. His letters and some trifling tokens which he had given her, were collected and forwarded to him, with a few lines demanding a similar restoration on his part. It was effected, and thenceforward the name of Maurice Fletcher was never heard in their dwelling. Mr. Esdale's business was at length settled, and after a just liquidation of all his debts, not a vestige of their princely fortune was left to the family. Some of the largest creditors came forward and offered to relinquish a portion of their claims, but Grace would not hear of it. The fortune left by her godmother, though small, would furnish them in a cheap part of the country with the comforts of life, and that was all they could ask. Grace immediately commenced her search for a habitation-suited to her means; Daisybank was then on sale, and charmed with its rustic beauty she became its purchaser, and having fitted it up with her own exquisite taste, thither she removed with her parents. A happy day was it for us all when she became a denizen of our little village; for while the graceful suavity of her manners rendered her society a delightful acquisition to the wealthier and more refined portion, her winning smile, active kindness and unassuming benevolence made her a welcome visitor in the cottages of the poor and at the bedside of the sick and dying. In the new round of duties in which she was now constantly engaged, Grace soon regained her natural cheerfulness and gaiety of manner, and every day her gratitude became stronger to that Providence, which in depriving her of fortune, had opened her eyes to the worthlessness of the one to whom she was about to unite herself by the most indissoluble tie. It was impossible for so pure a heart as Grace Esdale's to retain a sentiment of esteem or affection for one who had proved himself so unworthy, and from the moment when his base desertion broke the spell which his fascinations had cast around her, that wild dream had been gradually but surely fading from her heart. Before she had been six months an inmate of Daisybank, the villagers had with one voice crowned her Queen of Hearts, and prouder and happier was she in her sovereignty, than when she reigned undisputed Queen of Fashion in the halls of the gay and wealthy.

'About two years before the Esdales became proprietors of Daisybank, two great and important events had taken place in the village. The venerable old parson had gone down to the grave amid the tears and blessings of the flock to whom he had been a faithful shepherd, and a young servant of God was appointed in his place to break the bread of life to his people. On each succeeding sabbath for forty years, had the departed proclaimed to us the glad tidings of salvation, and offered our united petitions to the throne of Grace. He had been with us alike in joy and sorrow; his lips had pronounced the solemn benediction when our youths and maidens were joined in happy marriage, and when our children were consecrated to God in holy baptism; he had stood by the death-bed of those we loved, and strengthened the fainting spirit with holy promises, and bade the dim and glazed eye pierce through the shadows of the valley of death, and gaze undazzled on the shining gates of the celestial city,—and he had been with us at the open grave, when the dust was consigned to its kindred earth; and when the clods rattled on the coffin which contained the beloved form, with that dull, hollow sound, which sends such a pang to the heart of the mourner, he pointed us to the blest land of re-union, to the promised Canaan, “where tears shall be wiped from all faces, and death shall be swallowed up in victory.” Such had been the venerable man’s ministry among us, and every member of the long, weeping procession which followed his remains to their last home, felt as if they had lost a near and dear relative.

‘Our pastor on his death bed, had expressed a wish, that Henry Sinclair a young clergyman whom he had met at a religious convention, and admired alike for his fervid eloquence, and unassuming piety, should succeed him; and accordingly by a unanimous vote of the society, he was requested to officiate for three months on trial. The second sabbath after our bereavement, was to be the first of his ministry, and when the church bell sent forth its summons, groups of the villagers might be seen wending their way to the fane, engaged in deep and earnest discourse, concerning the old and new minister; and when the simple chant was concluded, and the pastor rose to prayer, the tear dimmed eyes of the congregation could scarcely discern that he was tall, slender and graceful, or that his countenance was pale, serious, and thoughtful beyond his years. His prayer was short and simple, but it reached the hearts and expressed the wishes of his hearers; and when his clear, rich voice again broke the silence and pronounced the text, every pulse of his auditors seemed hushed. At the close of his first day’s ministry, many a friendly hand was extended to greet him, and many a kindly voice bade the young laborer in Christ’s vineyard, welcome, and long ere his three months had expired, our minister was the theme of every tongue and the pride of every heart in the village.

‘Soon after Henry Sinclair’s arrival, it had been discovered by the ladies that he was a bachelor, and they immediately set to work to supply this deficiency. Their exertions however proved unsuccessful—either the gentleman was too particular, or no lady could be found sufficiently faultless, for at the expiration of two years, our minister was still in a state of single blessedness. At this juncture Grace Esdale arrived at Daisybank, and by the time she was fairly settled there, at a meeting of the “Ladies Sewing Circle,” she was unanimously voted “worthy to be our minister’s wife!” We had good reason to believe that his views coincided with ours, for at the close of service, on the first Sunday of the Esdales’ appearance at church, he joined them on their way home, and when they parted at the cottage gate, responded with heartfelt pleasure to the cordial invitation to join their domestic circle whenever his numerous engagements would permit. His visits to Daisybank soon became long and frequent, and ere many months had passed, to the great delight of the whole village, Henry Sinclair was the accepted lover of Grace Esdale. To this engagement her parents gave their full and free consent; there were no doubts, no misgivings, for they felt that to his care they could joyfully entrust the happiness of their darling child.

‘Weeks and months flew by—Grace’s wedding day was again appointed, and was near at hand, when that fearful scourge, the scarlet fever, made its appearance in the village, and among the first whom it attacked, was Henry Sinclair. The best medical advice was procured, and Grace, who at the first alarm had hastened to his side, was his constant and vigilant nurse; but the physician’s skill, the devoted love of woman, the tears and prayers of his parishioners were unavailing, and after four days of intense suffering, on that which should have been his bridal eve, with humble hope and exalting faith, he resigned his spirit to Him who gave it. There was no loud sound of wailing or lamentation in that chamber of death, though to the few who had entered its precincts, and witnessed the triumphant exit of the young servant of God, Henry Sinclair had been dear even as a brother;

but they had stifled their own grief in pity to the agonised young creature who knelt with bowed head and clasped hands beside the corpse, a widow ere yet a bride! And when the low, sweet voice of Grace first broke the death-like stillness, murmuring 'It is the Lord's will, let him do what seemeth to him good'—every heart dictated the fervent response, Amen;—and then one after another they left the room, that the last offices might be performed for the dead.

'Simple and unostentatious as had been his life, so was the funeral of the young village pastor. Of the little train which followed his remains to the grave, Grace Esdale made not one; she passed that day and night on her knees, in the solitude of her chamber, wrestling with her spirit, and pouring forth earnest supplications to God. When she joined her parents the ensuing morning, every shade of grief and sadness was banished from her face, for the beams of the Sun of Righteousness had brightened and gladdened her spirit; and thenceforward though she rarely displayed her former joyous gaiety, her manner was characterised by a serenity and cheerfulness which no after cares or sorrows have ever had power to disturb. Link after link has been severed from her domestic chain, and one after another added to the attractions of Heaven, but her affections instead of contracting as her circle diminishes, have widely expanded, and her love and sympathies are extended to all around her, and her presence is everywhere hailed with delight, for she carries the sunshine of her smiles into every dwelling.

'Not long since I met Miss Esdale at the house of a mutual friend, and the conversation turned upon the capabilities possessed by different minds, of sustaining misfortunes. "I have often wondered, Grace," said Mrs. —, "at the cheerfulness you display; there is not in the whole circle of my acquaintance, one who is so uniformly lively and delightful as yourself, and I am sure there is none who has had so large a share of afflictions." "Nay, call them not so, my dear friend," replied Grace, "I have learnt to regard them as blessings in disguise; for I know that 'whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth,' and that 'all things will work together for good.' I can trace the hand of a wise and gracious Providence in every event of my life; the loss of wealth, which seemed so great a misfortune, saved me from the worst ill that could betide me, by revealing to me the unworthiness of him, to whose faults my mad passion blinded me. At first his heartless desertion stunned and shocked me, and I felt hopeless and forsaken; but that feeling soon wore off, and I became cheerful and happy as before. But the greatest cross of my life was yet to come. You know well the history of my acquaintance and subsequent engagement with Henry Sinclair, but none save God and my own heart knew the extent of my wild idolatry—my every wish and thought were centred in him—to see him, to be near him, to know that he was mine, and mine only,—this was the height of my earthly ambition. I entered the sanctuary and listened, O how intently, to every word that fell from the preacher's lips, but alas! my thoughts dwelt more on the voice I loved, than on the holy truths he uttered; I joined in his fervent petitions, and breathed forth the song of praise, but it was lip-service to the Creator, for to the creature was given the homage of my heart. But He saw my folly, my madness, and my danger, and His arm was outstretched to save me; in a moment, as it were, the object of my sinful worship was snatched from me, and I sank from the climax of happiness to the abyss of sorrow and despair! In my distress I cried unto the Lord, and he sent his Holy Spirit, the Comforter, and filled my soul with that 'peace which passeth understanding.' Since then, relatives and friends have, one by one, dropped from my side, and left me lonely, but not alone while one human heart throbs in sympathy with my own."

'I have given you but a feeble outline of the misfortunes, resignation, cheerfulness, and christian virtues of Grace Esdale; to appreciate them fully, you must see and know her, for

"None know her but to love her, None name her but to praise;"

and then you will join with me in saying, "she is indeed a happy woman," for true happiness consists less in being blest ourselves, than in the power of making others so.'

My sketch is ended; and if it have the smallest tendency to cure one romance-loving young reader of that morbid sensitiveness to fictitious woes, which blunts the feelings and sympathies to the unadorned but no less acute sufferings of real life—if it teaches that cheerfulness, contentment, and submission to God's will, is the only true Philosopher's Stone, the sure key to temporal felicity, its humble mission will be accomplished.

A Dream.

BY MRS. C. W. HUNT.

'Twas the sultry noon of a summer's day.
Oppressed—on a mossy bank I lay,
Beneath the cool luxuriant shade
A willow's bending branches made.
The flocks were resting on the hills,
The shepherds by the sleepy rills.
No note of bird—or hum of bee,
Disturbed the deep tranquility;
All nature owned the dreamy power,
The holy mystery of that hour.
The trees were thrilling with the sound
Of some ethereal lay around,
As if each leaf were a festal string
Struck by the sunbeam's glittering.
Lulled by the strains that o'er me swept,
My eye-lids faltered—and I slept.

Methought I stood on a lonely strand,
With frowning cliffs on every hand.
Before me rolled a glorious sea,
In grand and solemn majesty.
'Twas yet all calm—such calm as dwells
Upon the tyrant's treacherous brow,
While waves of mad'ning passion swell
Within his vengeful breast; and now,
The threat'ning storm-clouds gathered fast,
The startled birds flew screaming past—
Hoarse thunders rolled along the sky,
Waking the caverned depths' reply.
The wild winds roared—fierce lightnings flashed;
Madly the frantic billows dashed
High up the cliffs, with such wild force
As sent them ebbing to their source,
Like foaming chargers, when they feel
The check and spur of rider's heel.
Appalled—I sunk upon the sands,
And raised to Heaven my trembling hands.

While thus I gazed—on a tow'ring rock,
That seem'd the billow's force to mock,
So firmly was it planted there—
I saw a frail old man appear.
Ill seemed his worn and wasted form
Fitted to struggle with the storm;
His hollow cheeks and silver hairs
Proclaimed the strife of many years.
Unmoved he stood—his lofty brow,
Wore an unearthly calmness now:
Awe-struck—I bowed my passive head,
E'en as before the uprisen dead.
He spoke; high o'er the deaf'ning strife
With which that fearful hour was rife,
His voice fell on my startled ear
In trumpet-tones—yet silvery clear:
'Powerless thy conflicts all, O earth!
To dim that star of heavenly birth,
Whose light divine now gilds my head
Like that which to the Savior led!
I'm old! I'm like a sapless oak,
Whose branches one by one have broke
Beneath the weight and strife of years,
'Till no green spot its loneliness cheers;
Yet tempest's might—nor whirlwind's shock,
Shall hurl me from this steadfast rock:
No force of earth—nor air—nor sea,
Can shake my faith—O God! in thee!

He ceased; I felt my spirit rise—
Upward I turned my wondering eyes—
The scene was changed; a funeral train
Swept past me o'er a sunset plain.
A mother mourned; death's shadowy king,
Had snap'd the golden household-ring;

Her face a deathly paleness wore,
That told of conflicts met—but o'er.
The sunshine of a lofty faith
Triumphant o'er the gloom of death,
Beamed from her eyes—now raised above
With all a mother's earnest love.
'Father!' she cried—'I trust thee still!
Though bitter pangs my bosom fill,
To lose the last—the only one,—
"Thy will, not mine—O God! be done!"'

Again the scene was changed; I stood
Beneath the shadow of a wood,
Amid whose dim and leafy gloom
Arose a monumental stone.
A fair-haired boy with cherub grace
Lay, wreathing garlands at its base.
Sweet child—I cried—why linger here
In this lone spot! dost thou not fear?
'What should I fear?' he smiling said,
'This is my father's grave—he's dead;
And oft his blessed voice I hear,
Saying, "Rejoice! for I am near!"
Though I'm a child—I feel—I know
By this simple flower-cup's glow,
Which was once a feeble grain,
In yon bright Heaven he lives again.'
Oh what, I cried, can be this faith
That triumphs o'er insatiate death?
Such earnest gladness breathes on thee,
And robs the grave of victory!
A voice replied from glen and grove,
'God's! God's illimitable love!'

Shall we know each other in Heaven?

BY MRS. SARAH BROUGHTON.

How MUCH has been written and said upon this one question. How many learned divines have expatiated upon the subject, and whiled away the long hours in endeavoring to prove their respective theories; some contending that friend should recognize friend in the glorious spirit-clime, and rejoice in the blest re-union; others, that the ties of affection are sundered at death, and that our knowledge of, or love for each other, will be unregarded or unremembered; nay that our very identity will be lost, and our present existence utterly forgotten. To me, this last idea seems neither more nor less than total annihilation. For if we lose all remembrance of what we are, or ever have been; if the friends whom we now entwine with our life-cords, shall fade from our recollection, and the pall of unconsciousness shroud our awakened spirits, what is the resurrection to us? We shall be but a new creation of intelligences, remembering nothing of this bright world, its joys and sorrows, its loves and strong affections.

But gentle reader, put the question to your own heart. What saith its yearnings? Shall the strong affections, the lofty aspiring impulses of thy spirit never have a more extended sphere than this shadowy existence? Has the Author of our being given us sympathies that are stronger than the love of life—fond affections, that clasp their twining tendrils around the cherished idols of home, and relinquish not their hold when long, long years have shed their dew upon the grassy mounds that cover their repose; and shall those sympathies and loves be forever lost when the cold hand of death stills the throbbing pulse, congeals the purple current of life in its fountain, and casts the spell of unbroken quiet over the warm heart's quivering cords? When we stand by the silent dead, and gaze upon the marble features from which has faded every expression of life save the last fond smile of tenderness, that still lingers as the signet of the spirit's bliss; when we look upon the half-closed, rayless orbs, where ever beamed love's hallowed radiance, does not the spirit whisper in low, but thrilling tones that we shall meet again? That we shall again hold sweet communion in a clime where doubt and darkness never shade the spirit-vision; where pain, and sorrow, and bitter partings can no more wring the anguished soul, but kindred spirits unite in the glad anthems of bliss, that shall constitute the language of earth's redeemed ones. Brother, hast thou shed the warm incense of love on the grave of thy childhood's playmate, the brother or sister whose heart ever responded to thy call, who listened with thee to the music of the silvery chiming rill, whose babblings seemed the accompaniment of thy juvenile glee; and roamed with thee over hill and dale, to gather the sweet-scented wild-flower, or made the green-wood vocal with merry warblings? Hast thou seen love's radiant lustre fade from the soul-beaming eye, and the brow where gleamed the signet of immortal thought wreathed with the chilling coronal of death, and has not thy spirit assured thee that the separation was but for a time? Trust to the language of thy heart, for its characters were graven with the ever-during pencil of Truth; and though they are but faint and shadowy now, rest assured their prophecy shall be fulfilled in the dawn of the eternal morning. Mother, hast thou seen thy young buds fade as beneath an untimely frost, hast thou strewed the spring flowers over the small graves that hide thy heart's priceless treasures? Can the wand of scepticism darken the images on memory's mystic tablet, by obstructing the sweet glimmerings which faith and hope would shed upon the sacred scroll? Wo, wo to that mother's heart, the yearnings of whose deathless love are crushed by the cheerless hand of infidelity, and its warm aspirations thrown back in curdling torrents upon the seared and breaking heart. There is but one hope that can bring peace to the mourner in the dark hour of bereavement, and that hope has cast its anchor beyond the veil. The storms of time may toss the frail vessel, but cannot undo its fastenings. Let Faith remain at the helm, and Love forever trim the storm-beaten sails, and we can safely outride the wrecking tempests of life's uncertain sea.

When the parent or brother, companion or child, are called from our embrace by that stern messenger who never calls in vain, what can soothe or support us in the trying hour, but the thought of a blissful and perfect re-union in realms of light and knowledge, where the dark pall of mystery which gathered around our earthly path, shall be withdrawn; and we shall read aright the painful dispensations of providence, and learn to bless the Father of our spirits for the chastisements by which he led us to look upward, and put our whole trust in him.

It is in accordance with the popular theology of the day to represent the death of a person as a sort of judgment upon the living. What idea can be more absurd, or more bitter? Shall the orphan maiden, as she bends in uncontrollable agony above the clay-cold features that her infant eyes first greeted with delight, be told that the terrible pangs of disease that have tortured that revered form for months or years, have been inflicted as a judgment upon her for her juvenile wickedness? When the young heart first awakes to the fearful consciousness that she is bereft of the shield of a mother's love to guide and protect her in the intricacies and dangers of life's thorny way; when she is bowed almost to the grave by her constant care, her prolonged midnight vigils, and the overpowering agony that rends the heart as affection's grasp is sundered, and the cherished one is straitened, and robed in the habiliments of the tomb; shall she be told that this is a dispensation of divine vengeance? That sickness and pain are the penalty for the transgression of some law of nature, no one will pretend to deny. But that disease and death are inflicted upon one person for the punishment of another's sins, is contrary to every principle of justice which man is taught to revere. And can Infinite Mercy act in accordance with principles that would be wholly unjust if acted upon by the frail creature man? In other words, shall we dare accuse the all-wise Jehovah of doing that, which would stamp the brow of an earthly judge with cruelty and infamy?

Resurrection of the Wicked.

THE excitement of the day and evening deprived me of the power to compose myself to rest after I had retired to my chamber. Being wakeful, I took up a book near me—it proved to be 'Barnes' Notes on the Gospels.' I opened it, hoping some thought there expressed would give me a new theme for reflection, in pondering which I might calm my nerves and woo sleep. I opened, and these words first attracted my attention: 'Those who have done evil shall be raised up to be condemned, or damned. This shall be the object of raising them up; this the sole design. It is elsewhere said that they then shall be condemned to everlasting punishment.'

I re-read the words, and my soul spontaneously exclaimed—Almighty and Most Merciful God! what a thought is that! Can it be that any rational mind does sincerely believe that the Deity will exercise his omnipotence in the resurrection to raise up millions for the sole purpose of tormenting them? This is said by this new school Presbyterian to be the object of raising them up; and lest there might be any doubt of the emphasis of his language, he adds more strongly that such will be the sole design of raising the wicked. Is it not plain that endless misery would be perfectly useless, for the wicked are not to be raised as an example to any other of the retributions of Justice, for the sole object or design of bringing them into the eternal state is that they may suffer!

What a character is here ascribed to God! How awfully are his excellences profaned! Millions are slumbering in the unconsciousness of death, and he, it is said, will speak the word that shall call them into life that knows no end. Why does he speak that omnific word? Why does he break those chains of slumber? He speaks with the sole design to make those millions unutterably and eternally miserable! How different is such a blasphemous idea from the apostle Paul's description of God's power in the resurrection.

He declares it to be—'the glory of the Father.' When the sole design of an exercise of power is to produce unmitigated evil, can it be said to have any of the attributes of parental glory?

But we need not continue remarks, as the awfulness of the partialist doctrine is set forth in sufficient prominence by the assertion of Mr. Barnes. Thanks be to God that we can ascribe 'the glory due unto his name,' by attributing to him a merciful design in every exercise of power, in this and all other worlds, and towards each and all of his creatures. Sin is abhorrent to him, and he will, in his own time, blot it from the universe. He will call no being into existence without a benevolent purpose towards him, and all shall find cause to be thankful for an endless perpetuity of existence. All the ends of the earth shall remember and turn unto the Lord; all the kindreds of the people shall come and worship before him, and shall glorify his name. As we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly. B.

To a Friend.

I KNOW thou art not beautiful, nor art thou fortune's child,
Yet beameth ever from thine eye a spirit undefiled!
I know that genius never shed its radiance on thy brow,
Yet wert thou ever truthful, good, and kind as thou art now.

I know thy form was never cast in fashion's graceful mould,
Nor do I wish in fashion's throng thy presence to behold;
So long as nature's nobleness has marked thee for her own,
I would not give thy soul-lit smile to share a monarch's throne!

I know thou hast not eloquence to sway a mighty throng,
Nor canst thou pour in warbling notes the thrilling tide of song;
Yet while thy voice of tenderness hath music for my soul,
'Tis dearer than a nation's wealth which queenly hands control!

Give me thy calm and fervent love which shuns a vain display,
The only homage which a heart as true as thine can pay!
Thy strength to arm my feebleness amid the storms of life,
Thy smile to shed its heavenly ray upon the waves of strife;—

Give these, and life hath little more of value to bestow,
And by thy side through rugged paths, undaunted I will go!
And friendship thus begun on earth, shall, in the spirit land,
Receive the sanction of our God from his all gracious hand!

Duty of promoting Christianity by the circulation of Books.

WE cannot but yield to an inclination to present to our readers some extracts from a discourse on the subject denoted by the heading of this article, by Rev. Henry Ware, jr., so just are the positions taken and so well are they sustained. The author pleads for the press as a great auxiliary to the pulpit in advancing the truths of christianity, and he would awaken zeal as a requirement of Duty—not as a mere dictate of policy or expediency. He treats of the duty of promoting christianity by the circulation of books, and let this be kept in view as his eloquent plea is attended to. We would that all our patrons and readers might feel the force of his ideas, and be more animated in this department of religious activity.

B.

‘If our religion be a religion of records and books,—taught and spread by reading as well as by hearing,—then it must be the duty of its friends, to labor for its promotion by the one method as well as the other; and while they associate themselves to support the gospel as it is preached, they should do so none the less to diffuse it as it is printed. To this position I ask your attention. I claim for it the protection of the wise man in the text: “In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand;”—if you would secure a great object, employ every season, avail yourself of every method; labor for the harvest of everlasting life in season and out of season; morning and evening; by the pulpit and by the press; “for thou knowest not which shall prosper, this, or that;” they are coadjutors,—both efficient, both powerful; and in any given emergency you cannot tell which may prove best; one may succeed when the other fails, one may reach where the other cannot go;—or though both alike be good, nothing is lost by the united effort; your chances of success and your strength to achieve it, are doubled.’

‘The position I have here stated is grounded on the obligation lying on christians to do the utmost in their power for the cause of religion. This obligation I do not now argue. I take it for granted. It is not devotedly acted upon in practical life;—would to God that it was! but it is universally recognized. Christians are bound to do all which lies in their power for the support and spread of their religion. The question then is, how? by what methods? The original and authoritative method was by preaching. To that work Christ commissioned his Apostles, and they ordained teachers in every city, and the church was thereby organized, and it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save those that believed. Books at that age were rare and costly; few were able to read and still fewer to buy them. Preaching, “publicly and from house to house,” was the great appointed method of making known the faith;—faith came by hearing; and how could they hear without a preacher? And thus the instituted ministry of Christ was the one universal religious educator.

‘Thus arose the Great Institution of Christendom. To render it an efficient institution, was the great care of christendom. In order to this its whole territory was speedily divided into parishes; every village and hamlet was made an association for the support of religion; every family and individual was connected with some organized society of christian worshipers; and through the channels thus cut into every region of the land, the waters of life were conveyed with their fertilizing power, till they irrigated every spot and shed greenness and beauty around every man’s dwelling. What an illustrious provision for the moral well being of mankind! Still it exists, venerable and permanent. Multitudes of more pretending and ostentatious institutions have been shaken down in the convulsions of the ages, but this humble ministry survives, and in the vigor of perpetual youth, still pours out the blessing of the Lord upon the human race. Let it live and reign—beneficent—life-giving! Never let New England,—alas, that any signs of the times should make the prayer an anxious one!—never let New England forget that this has been the fountain of her honor, and must be the rock of her trust. If this stand, New England stands; if this fall, New England falls; and if New England fall, who shall provide salt for the corrupting Republic?

‘But since the day when this great institution was first organized, in the infancy of christianity and the poverty of letters, a great change has come over the face of society. Books are no longer the costly and infrequent possession they were. Then, the few only could own or peruse them; now, it is only the few that cannot both read and possess. When God reformed his church, he summoned into existence the press; and the question, "By what method shall we diffuse Christianity?" is no longer to receive one answer,—“by sending abroad its preachers;” it requires another,—“by sending abroad its books.” Once, christians did the utmost for their faith when they provided for its preaching; now they have done their utmost, only when they have made as thorough and systematic use of the press as they do of the pulpit.

‘Is this an unreasonable proposition? Here is that work of ineffable grandeur and worth to be done by christians,—in which the growth and welfare of the human race is bound up,—the diffusion and influence of the Christian Religion. Is there any possible means of effecting this, which they are at liberty to omit? If there be any powerful engine in existence adapted to this end, have they a right to refuse it? If Providence has put in their hands any instrument of efficiency, no matter what, whereby the beneficent plans of Christ can be forwarded, have they a choice whether they may despise them? May they rest always satisfied with the one method of the ancients, if another of equal efficiency is at hand to be added to it? And therefore, when this wonderful engine the press, at so significant a crisis in the history of christianity, offers itself to her service; formed to echo with a thousand repetitions, every voice that is uttered in the pulpit, and capable of sending the truth into a thousand places which the uttered voice never reaches;—it cannot be a question whether they should employ it; they are not at liberty to doubt whether they must do so to the utmost; and how can they employ it to the utmost, excepting by universal concert and an instituted system? It seems to fall short of the occasion to say, that this would be desirable, advisable, useful, perhaps expedient; are we not warranted in choosing a sterner term, and insisting on the obligation? Why not divide all christendom into societies for distributing the printed gospel, as it is already so divided for the support of the preached gospel? Why not every individual bind himself to do something for the diffusion of books and pamphlets, just as he does for the regular maintenance of public worship? To the pulpit give thine aid, and from the press withhold not thine hand; for thou knowest not whether shall prosper this or that, or whether both alike shall be good.

‘If it be said, “the one is a divine institution, set up from the beginning, and therefore possessing a peculiar obligation”—this may be allowed to be an independent and peculiar reason for sustaining it. But so far as the duty to unite for the support of the gospel arises from the worth of the gospel, so far the obligation is the same in both cases. Because of its worth, every instrument must be pressed into its service, and the utmost possible done in its behalf,—the utmost with every instrument; if with the pulpit, so also with the press. Is the press a weaker instrument? then the more urgently must it be plied, in order that its utmost may be worth something. Is it a more powerful instrument? then, in God’s name, drive it all the harder; for the more it can be made to do, the better for God’s glory. If religion triumphs and men are saved, it will not be jealously inquired at the last day by which of the two instruments it was effected.

‘Which of the two is, in fact, the more powerful, or whether both be alike good, is a question impossible now to be discussed; and which happily is not at all necessary to determine. The opinion which has been sometimes expressed, that the spread of education and the multiplication of books will by and by cause the pulpit to sink to an inferior place,—that everybody will be so much more easily taught and improved by private reading, as that none will need the public instruction or exhortation of God’s house;—this notion is certainly an idle one. Writing, make the best of it, is but a poor substitute for speech. Speech is the natural and perfect mode of communication, bestowed on man by the Creator. Writing is a mechanical and artificial instrument of human contrivance. Who will believe, that the human machine shall ever supersede the divine gift? The one is born with us, is part of ourselves, is interwoven with all the early faculties, functions, associations, affections of our being; the other is an acquisition of later life, won by pains and toil. To no man does the written book become what the living speaker is. By long habit and retired study, an abstracted scholar here and there may approach such an unnatural state, and a book be to him a man;—but never can it be so with the majority of men. The form, the eye, the hand, the voice, the action of a living, breathing, thinking, excited fellow-being,—who touches nerve and fibre with his bare soul, as it were,—have and must have, an attraction and authority with men, which paper and printing ink never can attain. Yonder volume is accounted dull, and few can be induced to turn over its pages;—but when Whitefield uttered its contents in the churches and on the hill-sides of Old England and New England, the two continents were shaken, and thousands who heard him are still living in old age to have their hearts throb at its memory. And so the pulse of religious life is kept beating, sabbath after sabbath, by discourses eagerly and devoutly attended, which no one would bear to read, if they were printed; nay, multitudes throng to hear, and are saved by hearing the living preacher, who could not be persuaded to open for habitual instruction the most eloquent religious works that earth has ever produced.

‘But let us not waste words; the pulpit never can lose its place of power,—it answers too essentially to a vital want of society and man. Still, however, it must be considered, that the reading of books has its place of power also, and our argument requires us to go on and show, that, in some respects, it possesses peculiar advantages as a method of diffusing religious influence. Let me hastily glance at some of these.

‘First, It is an aid to the pulpit. If Christ designed that as the master institution, yet it would need its servants in the temple, as the high-priest required the Levites; and what assistant so able as this? When the lesson has been given, and the impression made in the public audience, then this, in subsequent retirement, deepens and strengthens it. What is there, asks some one, that is essential to a man’s salvation? Nothing, he replies, but a retired apartment and a bible. How true is this! And he who comes from that apartment to sit in the congregation, how is he prepared to join in the prayer and be edified by the word! How assuredly would the graces of christendom flourish, if all that were edified by the preacher on the seventh day, took equal care to edify themselves by moral and religious reading on the other six! Let but our hearers be daily serious readers, and they will no more retire from church like the man that beholdeth his natural face in the glass, straightway forgetting what manner of persons they are.

‘In another way it aids the preacher, namely, by bringing to public worship some who might else have never come within sound of his voice. Unhappily there are some, who, from divers untoward circumstances of education, or situation, or accident, are as much aliens to the house of God as if they were heathen. How are they to be saved? Not by preaching, for they never hear. Their case is hopeless, excepting for some unusual event which shall turn their feet to the holy place. Nothing is more likely to do this than the perusal, under favorable circumstances, of some book or tract, which shall touch the feelings, rouse the sleeping conscience, and excite an anxious curiosity which shall urge them to go for satisfaction and peace to the house of prayer. Often has this very thing taken place. Therefore scatter your tracts; lay your holy books in the path of all thoughtless way-farers; send the truth to seek out and arrest those who would fain flee from it; you thus multiply the hearers of the word, and augment the influence of the pulpit.

‘Another view. There is a great variety of subjects necessary to be considered by a well informed christian, on which it is impossible for the stated ministry to enlighten him. He must have acquaintance with the laws of scriptural interpretation, with doctrinal exposition, with church history; but such topics could not be discussed for the edification of a common assembly on the sabbath; they must be learned from books. If we would have believers well instructed in them, we must furnish books for this very end. The stated ministry takes charge of the spiritual life of all,—the least gifted and the most highly endowed; it has one teaching of morality and religious truth which all alike are to apply, and by which their souls are to be redeemed and sanctified. Happy if, by the grace of God, it be equal to this one momentous charge! But there are those who are seeking, and must have much besides this. They want knowledge. They want to be able to give a reason of the hope that is in them to whomsoever asks:—whether the inquiry be of the inward experience of the heart, or the outward testimony of history, or the primitive philosophy of nature, or the doctrinal controversies of the church; they must therefore be instructed in all these. But in these the pulpit can do almost nothing. To instruct in these is the office of books. They ought to be within reach of every man. The church ought to see that they are provided for him. No man should be left to stumble in the error and darkness of an ignorant, doubting, confused, or sceptical mind, for want of the light which such volumes could throw around him. Why should it be left to chance whether he fall in with them or not? Why not a systematic plan be devised, which should place them before him, as obtrusively as are now placed before him the venerable buildings in which he is invited to worship and find peace?

‘Another view still. It is imperatively necessary by a religious use of the press, to erect a counteraction to its secular use. Think of its fearful activity in behalf of idle and wasteful tastes! Think of the untold multitude of books that are crowded upon the world with anything but an wholesome influence;—attractive, seductive, lying in every man’s way, suited to bewilder, mislead, corrupt, debauch the judgment, heart, life, soul of the unwary and young. The influences thus let loose upon christendom are tremendous. We gaze on them with paleness and alarm, and pray for some counteracting agency. Where is it to be found, but in the press itself? That which yielded the poison must furnish the antidote. Pains must be taken to displace the ill and the doubtful by the pure and the safe. Virtue and piety must be ensured their fair chance in the great encounter with false philosophy and unholy pleasure. If the world seizes on the press for its own ends; if all its good and all its evil purposes are carried to their consummation by the help of paper and books; let religion do the same; let christianity be as wise in its generation; let zealous care be taken to create a perpetual influence, by faithful instruction and earnest appeals, widely spread and urgently sustained; which shall counteract the ten thousand deleterious influences that are flowing from other sources.—Look then at the particulars which have been mentioned; that the circulation of books tends to increase both the number and the edification of those who attend public worship; that it furnishes instruction which the preacher never could provide; and that there is a necessity to multiply religious and moral books in order to counteract the influence of the secular and injurious; and then say, whether the duty to do something can be well overstated.’

* * * * *

‘Would we sow the land thick with religion and salvation? The seed is ripe and ready; let us not withhold our hand, but scatter it abroad freely. It cannot fail to prosper. Let us do it for the sake of our common christianity, which demands the succor of all her children, of whatever diversity of opinion, to carry her through the perils with which a worldly and speculative generation has encompassed her, and to ensure her rightful supremacy amidst the contending interests of an excited and struggling community.

Let us do it for the sake of those peculiar views of our religion, which are venerable and dear to us, but despised and rejected by others, and which demand to be manfully asserted and solemnly promulgated in order that they may receive the honor which is their due. Let us do it for the sake of our fellow-men. The mind of the country is awake, inquiry is active; our books and pamphlets are eagerly read by many to whom they are new, and to whom they unfold a new page of the religious life.

‘Yet with all this encouragement to active exertion, how slight the efforts that have been made! how few of us make it any part of our concern to circulate, or to promote the circulation of our theological publications, to carry them with us, to lend them, to recommend them, to have them lying on our tables, to scatter them when we travel, to send them to a distance. A few do thus, and, considering how few, it is remarkable how great are the effects. If all did likewise, what might not be hoped! Let us ask, whether we ought not. Let us reflect whether there be not a special obligation on us, because of our peculiar relation to the christian community—cut off as we are, and denounced, and the truth we love every where decried? Being defamed, should we not entreat? Being misrepresented, should we not appeal? When every method is used to prevent our gaining a fair hearing for the word which God has entrusted to us, should we not use every method to win, or even extort, a fair hearing? Is it not a duty to press more and more urgently the means of light and truth; to diffuse yet more and more actively those works which shall disabuse men of their false impressions, and substitute knowledge for error? So let it be. Send out more light! the dark world waits for it. Make the day dawn and the day-star arise! In the morning sow your seed, in the evening withhold not; the hungry world waits for the harvest. Send forth your messengers to the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in. Multiply your witnesses. Let them fly upon every wind; in such numbers that they cannot be annihilated; and for each that is destroyed, let two take its place. Let it be seen that we are engaged in earnest in our share of the work of enlightening society by a pure doctrine; that we are bound to it as christians, as patriots, as reformers; that we mean to do it, come what may; that the truth which God has entrusted to us, shall not die in our hands; its blood shall not stain our garments; if the reformation does not go on, and christendom still holds back deceived and darkened, the blame shall be on other heads than ours.'

'Comfort ye my People.'

BREATHE comfort and peace in my people's ear;
Let the far off nations awake, and hear!
Bid the humbled soul from the dust arise,
And tears be dried from all weeping eyes!

Say to the weary, with grief oppress,
Cast all thy cares on the Savior's breast;
And come to the waters that freely flow,
To allay thy thirst, and assuage thy woe!

Say to the sinful and erring, come!
There are mansions for you in your Father's home;
And great shall the joy of the angels be,
O'er a contrite soul, from its bonds set free.

And oh, to the meek and the pure in heart,
The glorious tidings of joy impart;
And bid them look through the storms of time,
To a haven of peace, in yon blessed clime!

There's a home for all, on that heavenly shore—
There sickness and pain shall assail no more—
Death has no passport to that bright land,
And grief is unknown to the seraph band!

There, the River of Life doth unceasing flow,
And deathless flowers on its borders grow;
The sapphire floors are by angels trod,
And its light and sun, is the smile of God!

The loved and lost, who have gone before,
Shall greet you there on the spirit-shore,
Ransomed from sin, by redeeming grace,
God's own free gift to a fallen race!

There, dissension and discord are never heard,
And the wrath of God is an unknown word;
But Heaven's broad arches with triumph ring,
When myriad tongues of salvation sing.

There, doubts and fears shall no more molest—
Hope shall be lost in fruition blest;
And radiant Faith shall resume her stand
With Justice and Mercy at God's right hand.

And over all, in that bright domain,
Shall one fair spirit triumphant reign;
All—all shall bow at the glorious shrine
Of LOVE universal—LOVE divine!

ARAB WOMEN. The traveler Wellsted, in his account of the hospitality of the Arab women, says: 'Let me here add my humble testimonial in their favor to that of so many travelers who had gone before me. However wretchedly clad or poverty-stricken, never did I in the tones of supplication address a female for assistance, but my tale was listened to with patience, and commiserated, or relieved, to the best their means afforded. My breast swells with gratitude, when I recollect the numerous touching instances which I, a stranger, received from them.'

Letters to Elizabeth. No. 4.

PHILADELPHIA PENITENTIARY.

I WILL now 'resume my task, and write to thee again,' dear Elizabeth, for I would fain thou shouldst share in the busy thoughts which were awakened by a visit to the Penitentiary. Yes, tell it not in Lancaster, but I have indeed been to the Penitentiary! I think that this institution has made a deeper impression upon my mind than anything that I have seen in Philadelphia. There is something so irresistibly appalling in the thought of so many of our fellow beings, creatures of like feelings and emotions as ourselves, moved by the same passions, and only subject to the same frailties, wearing out the tedious hours in a fearful solitude,—the solitude of sin. How terrible,—to be alone with guilt! Alone with the heart that we have made the dwelling place of crime, with the thoughts which we have poisoned at their fountain! Far from the sound of human voice, or the light of human eye, to list the tone which we so long have hushed amid the clamor of worldly thoughts and passions! To drink the fearful cup, and know that our own guilt hath filled it!

This building is formed after the model of the Bastile, and is, I believe, the largest in the United States. As the massy gates were closed upon us, shutting us out from sight or sound of the busy world without, and introducing us to the death-like stillness of the world within, there came a sensation of dreariness upon my soul which I never before experienced, and never can forget. I could feel the ice gathering around my heart. We passed through the yard which was large and filled with grass and flowers, and entered a circular apartment which commanded a view of the long galleries extending on every side. Here seats were kindly offered, which the rest of the party were willing to accept after their walk, but to my excited feelings the thought of sitting calmly down within the walls of a prison, was impossible, and I gladly escaped from the oft-repeated entreaty, to examine the flowers which were arranged in every window.

We passed along the 'galleried aisles' containing a double row of cells both above and below, and which although the abiding place of so many living beings, echoed no sound save that of our own footsteps. Yet within those silent cells were beating hearts which once were sinless, which even now are not all sin. There were busy minds which perhaps even then were weaving plans of future crime, and guilty souls which God alone could render pure.

A cell was shown us as a specimen of the whole. It was small, but it had a look of quiet neatness, and was well lighted from above. A plentiful supply of fresh water could be obtained in a moment by turning a spout. A small table, upon which a few books were laid, attracted my attention. The Bible, a work on the beauty of female piety, the Young Christian, and a sectarian tract, probably left there by some inmate of the cell, completed the list. The walls were covered with pin-cushions, pictures and toys, the work of the last occupant. Such was the room in which an intelligent young female had spent three years of life's morning. A small looking-glass hung upon the wall; had it been joy to her to see reflected therein the eye which should have beamed with truth's own light, the brow which should have worn the stamp of innocence, the lip which should have breathed in prayer and praise, now dimmed and shaded, and faltering with the consciousness of guilt? And it was for earthly treasure that she had dimmed her spirit's light, and cast away the priceless wealth of an innocent heart.

Thou wilt say it is too great a partiality for my own sex, yet I will frankly confess that it is with difficulty that I can teach my mind to unite the idea of guilt and woman. That man, who goeth out into the world to wrestle with sin as with a giant, and who meeteth temptation at every step, should be often vanquished in the strife, and become, perhaps, the willing slave of crime, may not be a subject of surprise; but gentle woman, she whose smile 'should only make the loveliness of home,' whose heart should ever be the shrine of purity and love, is it not a fearful thing that she should forget her God, and bow her spirit's pinion to the slavery of sin?

I was startled from my reverie by the observation of our conductor, 'Perhaps this young lady would like to remain here.' With an undefinable sensation of horror I sprang from the cell, and was followed by the rest of the party, congratulating each other upon the difference between entering it, because we willed so to do, and entering it should the stern law of justice compel our detention therein. We felt that it was indeed a privilege to be able to decline his invitation.

The food is conveyed to the door of each cell by a car propelled along a small railway. The cells of the females we were told consisted of two rooms, a parlor and kitchen, the one we had seen being the parlor, the kitchen we were not allowed to enter, it being occupied at the time. The reason given for this arrangement was that they were not allowed the privilege of a yard wherein they might walk guarded by a sentinel at a certain hour of the day, as were the other prisoners, and that in case of the prison being crowded they could easily be converted into separate cells by barring the door. No one knows who is his neighbor, for the prisoners are seen neither by each other, nor by visitors.

In the court above we found a great many flowers, geraniums looking as lovely as though their home were in a fairer bower, roses which might have done credit to the care of lady bright, and orange trees which we were told had produced very fine fruit. Surely their presence was the poetry of a prison. I think God hath implanted the love of flowers in every human heart, even as he has placed the rainbow in the cloud, as a token of his presence.

We recorded our names in the book kept for this purpose, amid some laughter caused by the entreaties of one of my friends that it might not be made known in my native state that I had done so, which we were politely promised should be kept a secret. It is as a secret that I whisper it to you.

Soon, however, were we recalled from this mirthful mood, by a serious conversation upon the subject of the prison discipline. We inquired with much interest respecting the effects of solitary imprisonment. To the question whether upon the whole any moral benefit appeared to result from it, we were answered, very little if any, the prisoners frequently returned again and again; sometimes those who had been with them for years returned to them in a few weeks after liberation. Plans formed in the solitude of their cells, were put into operation upon regaining their freedom, and the kindness with which they were treated was not repaid with gratitude. This gave rise to an animated discussion, my friends contending that this was sufficient to overthrow my opinion that the law of love can subdue all hearts, and I in turn urging that the love which was shown the prisoner was not the active, ever-living principle which wearieeth not with efforts to reclaim the erring one. It is not that fulness of sympathy which cometh from the heart, and reacheth every heart.

We hate their sinfulness, and for this too frequently hate the sinner, but would we read the depths of our own souls, and feel how many dark passions have struggled for the mastery therein, with what humbled hearts should we listen to the voice, 'Forgive, and thou shalt be forgiven.' I have not space to relate the long conversation which followed, but it set me busily to musing. I imagined myself a convict in one of these solitary cells, with the crushing weight of guilt upon my spirit. Secluded from the world without, to brave the terrors of the warring world of thought, I felt the bitterness of despair which sought not heavenly aid, the utter loneliness which dreaded companionship with itself. I had never before imagined a sorrow which could not be hushed in prayer, but as I fancied myself shut out from the sight of the glorious sky 'which bent above, my childhood like a dream of love,' when I thought that for long, long weary years, the blessed breeze might never fan my cheek, and that never, no never more might I repay the hearts that loved me with the trusting love of a pure and innocent heart, then I felt how guilt might steel the heart to every gentle emotion, and how deep, how disinterested, how devoted must be the love which could win it from so dark a dream. I felt that my own language would be, 'at this shrine I have sacrificed all that I ever prized, why should I turn from it now.'

Apostrophe to Thought.

A FRAGMENT.

YE floating visions of the beautiful,
Come gather round my spirit like a crown
Of living light! The incense-flame is dull
Within its shrine, and weeds have overgrown
The mouldering altar where bright flowers were strewn
In life's unclouded morn. Oh leave me not
With the wild tempest of my grief alone!
Make in my desert-heart one verdant spot
Where love may rest in peace, its wanderings forgot.

Bright clouds of glory! rising from my soul
Like mists from fountains open to the day,
Forth o'er life's rugged heights serenely roll,
And trail rich music all along your way;—
Music that like the wind with clouds at play,
Murmurs and trembles through the vaulted sky,
Or sinks with wearied wing upon the spray
Of some new fountain, leaping gaily by,
And filling all the wood with its wild melody!

Thought, thought, the solemn and the deep, is here;
And dreams of richer beauty than is known
To this fair earth. Oh let the starting tear Go back and curdle in the heart! The tone
Of Love's sweet voice its thrill should not have thrown
So far through the unsounded depths of want
That lie within the soul. Too deep the moan
Of Life's mysterious shell for its bright haunt
In Heaven's deep sea of Love, for this cold world to grant!

Oh Thought! Thou art eternity! I feel
The swell of thy omniscience in my brain!
It is as though seas swept there, and the peal
Of lofty thunders grappled with the main!
Before the birth of Time commenced thy reign,
And it shall hold its empire till the sway
Of earth is all forgotten, and the vain
And gaudy pageantry of Life with clay
Its elements hath mixed, and swiftly passed away.

The beautiful gradations of thy power
Link me, though distantly, to Heaven—to God!
And thro' thee I can glory in my dower
Of immortality, which from the clod
Wherewith my dust shall mingle, by the rod
Of vivifying grace shall bring me forth,
As flowers spring up from the deserted sod,
When the warm rain unbinds the fettered earth,
And calls them forth to new and brighter birth. s. c. r.

A Difficulty Solved.

I WOULD ask the reader's attention to the following scripture in connection with an important subject. 'And they were haughty and committed abominations before me; therefore I took them away as I saw good.*'

The people of God had lost their love of his pure service, and degraded themselves by follies of the most debasing character; and therefore the Deity, by his prophet, addressed them as those, who though they had not copied the vices of Sodom, yet had become even more corrupt, as they had more multiplied abominations, and were deserving of greater punishment. And they were assured that their punishment would be greater than that of Sodom, and the sacred history describes how this was effected. We read in Lam. iv. 6. what the punishment of Sodom's sin was, as we are there told—that Sodom was overthrown as in a moment, and no hand stayed on her; whereas Jerusalem's punishment was the calamities of protracted wars, famines, and many attendant evils, and was thus greater than the punishment of Sodom. This is the scripture account, and we are authorized to go no farther.

But we would ask attention to the peculiar language of the last clause of the scripture cited;—therefore 'I took them away as I saw good.' This relates to the destruction of the Sodomites

* Ezk. xvi. 50.

—and is the language of Deity after he had described the sins of Sodom as pride, fulness of bread, idleness, and the not strengthening of the hands of the poor and needy—sins which tend to the destruction of all the good of society, and the influence of which it was a mercy in the Almighty to stop by any means. He did stop their influence by a terrible judgment, which must forever be a testimonial of the Deity's abhorrence of sin—of pride, sensuality, idleness, and want of humanity; and the Deity himself condescends to tell us why he did thus—to give us the cause and the reason, and to make us see a divinity in his act that will insure our reverence. 'They were haughty and committed abominations before me; therefore,' or because of this, 'I took them away as I saw good.'

Here then is the important enquiry—As God took away the Sodomites from the scenes of their abominations, as he saw good, what does the good relate to? Good for, or to what? This is a serious question, and should be met seriously.

The good of the destroyed could not have been consulted, if the doctrines of Endless Misery are true. This we all must allow; and we must feel compelled, also, to admit, that the endless misery of the destroyed could do no good to God, or to the angels, or the saints in heaven; for we cannot conceive of any feeling as being possessed by Deity, or the hosts of heaven, which can be gratified by such an exhibition of misery.

What good then could the Deity have in view? Must it not have had sympathy with that perfect benevolence by which he is good unto all, and extendeth his tender mercies over all his works? It must—for all God's ways are harmonious, and he from everlasting to everlasting walketh in love.

We feel compelled then to opine that he took them away as he saw their good and the good of mankind required. They had become so corrupt—so selfish and slothful, that they were unfitted to enjoy the world, appreciate their Maker's presence and goodness, or to improve mankind, and in mercy he took them from the world they could no longer benefit;—in mercy, we say, though to man there was an exhibition of wrath and terror; but if there were not mercy in this wrath, who could acknowledge God's perfection in it? And that there was mercy, seems evident in the fact that the Deity declares that he accomplished the work in goodness. With their corrupt hearts and debased minds, they could experience nothing but evil in the judgment, and as they were incapable of benefiting themselves or the world, there was, in taking them away, great mercy manifested. They had suffered enough from the absence of the good which they might have enjoyed, and the evils they endured were sufficient punishment—living as they did without the vivifying presence of God, and bearing about with them dead affections. And christians of all sects allow this, when they are not engaged in combatting our faith, for they say and say justly, that outward prosperity is not happiness, and that the humble cottager has in religion a treasure, which it would be folly for him to part with in exchange for wealth untold.

But to assert the future happiness of the Sodomites swept away by a terrible judgment, appears to some to be a horrible doctrine; and it would seem that it was a very unpleasant thing to some to entertain the idea that those guilty souls met with mercy—a Father's forgiving goodness, instead of a doom to endless woe. We would not liken them to the elder brother in the parable, but they always remind us of him; and they seem to utter a similar plea against entering heaven, as he did against entering his father's house. God has humbled the heart of many such, in taking away from them, while unregenerated, a beloved friend or child; and at these times he has made the sorrowing to pray and plead that mercy might sanctify and save the departed and grant them to meet again. In the sunny days of joy, the young maiden may toss her head in pride and decline the wish to enter heaven if the wicked here on earth are ever to be admitted there. But let her have a care. Life brings us into strange relationships. Years roll by, and we find ourselves by the side of those who once were to us strangers, but now our dearest loves. The world may deal treacherously with them. The fine gold of their excellences may become dim—hidden under earthliness and vice. We may weep, but our tears cannot wash away the earthy, and they die in their iniquity. Then is the hour to try the soul. Then the selfish pride of the heart is taken away, and the young maiden changed to the weeping widow, with her fatherless little ones around her, feels the instincts of her patient love prompting her to hope in a mercy that can cleanse and purify the vilest. O death! thou teachest humility, when all other messengers of God have been unminded.

We come now to notice the objection frequently proposed against our faith on this wise;—If all men are saved after death, then those who were destroyed by the flood, went to heaven, while righteous Noah was suffered to live exposed to all the evils of this world, and obliged for many years to struggle on against its trials and woes. And the objectors seem ready, on the supposition of the truth of Universalism, to take up a lamentation for Noah's fate. So also in the case of Lot.

This is deemed an unanswerable argument, as it is asserted that the punishment was inflicted on the heads of Noah and Lot, instead of the destroyed. Let us look into this matter, and perhaps we may learn something to benefit us.

And first, it is allowed that the deliverance of Noah and Lot was a marked favor for their righteousness. But how is this, as it is believed by all that they would have been received to glory had they died, so righteous and godly were they? Let care be exercised here, as considerable importance must be attached to the answer. For if, as is so often asserted, there was no mercy in being left in this evil world, as Noah and Lot were left, how can we affirm that their deliverance from the flood and storm of fire, was a special favor of the Deity towards them? These favorites of God would doubtless have been translated to bliss, had they died with the rest, all allow; where then was the favor of God in delivering them from death?

We here give one difficulty in payment for the one thrust upon us, not however designing to render evil for evil, but contrariwise, good for evil.

Here then we would premise, that it can hardly be believed that the flood and the storm of fire came, merely to manifest divine vengeance, or to show forth favor to Noah and Lot. God acts upon individuals as parts of a great whole, and one event with him has relation to many others; and in these judgments, the Almighty had reference not only to those who were on the earth at the times, but to those who should come after them.

So far as Noah and Lot were personally concerned, it would have been better for them to have been taken away; even as the Apostle Paul said of himself,—‘For I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart and be with Christ which is far better; nevertheless to abide in the flesh is more needful for you.’ Phil. i. 23, 24. In one sense, he was on earth with Christ, but this being with Christ to which he referred, could only be brought about by a departing from the flesh, which he said was far better than to abide on the earth; yet so to abide was needful for the interests of the Church. And this was the reason why he was kept from that condition which was far better than the earthly, and so it was with Noah and Lot. Had they had no work to do—no relations to sustain, they would have been taken away; but as they had, as Paul had, work to do, and important relations to sustain, they were continued on the earth; and doubtless the sentiment of each heart was that of a pious servant of God who said—‘When I have done enough, lie me down to sleep; and when I have slept long enough, wake me.’

There are some who can be willing to live and labor for God and humanity, even though trials and sorrows surround them; and who, too, would never dream of looking for an eternal reward therefor, inasmuch as in the enjoyment of God's presence on earth, the consciousness of being engaged in his work, and the elevating and joyous thoughts and feelings consequent therefrom, they find reward enough.

We rejoice to be able to cite as proof the case of the devoted wife of Mr. Judson, missionary to Burmah, who in her journal of August 5, 1806, says,—‘Were it left to my choice, whether to follow the vanities of the world and go to heaven at last, or to live a religious life, have trials with sin and temptations, and sometimes enjoy the light of God's reconciled countenance, I should not hesitate a moment in choosing the latter, for there is no real satisfaction in the enjoyment of time and sense.’

To regard Noah and Lot, as cherishing a feeling like this, is to attribute to them the highest honor; and we cannot but believe that they so held communion with God, as to be willing to abide by whatsoever disposition the Deity was pleased to make of their times and seasons, and which caused them to say as Job did—‘All the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come.’ Wait for what? for the operations of God to take him away as he saw good. Noah and Lot were delivered or protected from death, not simply for their own happiness, but for the good and benefit of their fellows and the people that should come after them. The wicked were cut off as the Deity saw good, in reference to themselves and those who would be affected by their conduct and precepts; and thus he restrained the wrath of man to his own praise and glory. It was for the good of future generations that the Antediluvians and the Sodomites were destroyed; and while the terrors of the times were fearful—and the storm and fire were awful, and the most heart rending misery was consequent, yet we believe in all this there was mercy—the mercy of an infinitely wise and powerful God. Indeed, so elevated and amiable are our ideas of God, that we cannot believe that evil is ever permitted unattended with some good to those affected by the evil.

The wicked, whom we have dwelt upon, had cast off the garments of righteousness and were left exposed to many evils, only to be warded off by those vestments of God. Every moment they lived, they endured the reward of error and moral blindness. They were as the slave exulting in his chains, with no desire of freedom—one of the most sorrowful spectacles to the benevolent and godly. They were cut off in mercy, that they might be released from earthly passions and cease from sin. We cannot give this trust up to those who would make us believe that God cut them off in cruelty, and that he will permit an eternal perpetuation of the iniquity so abhorrent in his sight. It was because of their abominations—their sins, that Deity took them away as he saw good; and it seems to cast a reproach upon the Deity to assert, that they were taken from sin to sin—that the occasion of their removal was not taken away—that their sinfulness was an abomination to him, and yet that sinfulness will no less be diminished. The Deity doth not so act against himself; and his abhorrence of sin is the best proof of his purpose to abolish it.

Death is not a mere physical change. We have no authority from the scriptures so to regard it. Do we believe the idiot will be an idiot to all eternity? Yet it would seem that many would so look upon humanity, for they liken the departure of man from this life, to the emigration of an individual from Europe to America, and ask us if he does not bring the same moral principles here, as those with which he left the eastern continent? And therefore, according to this similitude, the idiot in Europe must be an idiot in America; and the influences of our manners, customs, and institutions, have no effect upon the emigrant. Who does not see the folly of such similitudes, when the scriptures represent a mighty change as taking place at death, and assert that the risen spirit is clothed in a glorious body—a spiritual constitution! Unfortunately for the objector's reference to the two continents, and the no change affected, is the fact, that when the slave steps his foot on Albion's shores, he is free! And who can tell what a change may be speedily wrought in one so freed from ungodly bonds, and surrounded with the best means of improvement? The mightiest changes have been so wrought. Till this change of place or state, the things 'which alone sustain the name and dignity of man,' are not theirs; and when these are given, a loftier reach of thought and feeling must ensue—a great change must be effected. So with the spirit and the freedom of the resurrection world. B.

Communings with Self.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

How LIFE varies in its aspect, as we pass on from infancy to youth, and from youth to maturity and age! Scarcely, to me, does life retain one trace of its earlier loveliness—and yet it is sunny, and brilliant, and beautiful still. It is the inner world which is now illuminated; for over the outer existence a dimness hath passed; and decay hath been at work upon the glorious temple; and its graceful pillars, wreathed with flowers, have fallen to the earth; and the sanctuary, only, remains undefiled—still consecrated to the presence of the living God.

In childhood, life wore to me an aspect of exceeding beauty. I thought this world must be as joyous as it was glorious; and that as it was externally fair, it must be also spiritually pure. I admired the exquisite decorations of the shrine, but the spirit contained within it had not yet been revealed. It might be a nymph, or it might be a satyr; yet surely I dreamed not of the satyr then. Feeling was to me as fresh and pure as the crystal spring bubbling up at the foot of the old mossy-trunked sycamore, where the anemones grew in clusters upon its brink, and the violets lay with their jetted-streaked petals, looking up to the sun. My heart sang all day, like a bird amid the solitudes of nature; and if at times it had glimpses of clouds through the greenwood openings, there was always a shelter to be found in the 'nursing nest.'

Years have gone by, and the outer life is changed. Still have the stars and flowers their early beauty, and the small birds sing as sweetly as when the heaven of childhood was at my heart. But the shadow of the grave hath fallen along my pathway, and as life once was, it can be never more. Have I not seen the lights go out, and the shrines fall, and the beautiful perish by the wayside? And see I not other lights growing dim, and flickering in their sockets? and pure, radiant stars sinking below life's near horizon? Time, too, walketh by my side, bearing Ithuriel's spear; and at his touch the seeming beautiful shows itself hideous and deformed. Winds that were soft and spicy in early life, are harsher now—so harsh that they chill the life-currents of the soul; and terrible storms break now and then, which it requires a strong heart to resist unmoved.

The inner life hath also changed. It hath grown brighter amid the external dimness. The Deity hath passed from the outer court into the inner sanctuary. Faith stands by the altar of the heart, feeding its incense fires with the offerings of Divine Love. Spirit voices fill the wide temple with melody; and spirit forms glide to and fro, chanting the holy psalms of a holier life in heaven.

Yes, very beautiful is the inner life, for there have been mysterious gatherings here of every bright thing that hath passed away from external being. Are not they here—the good, the true, the noble-hearted, who walk no longer the outer courts of human life? When the whirlwind, the earthquake, and the fire are past, I hear their still small voices wooing me forth to labors of love. And I go, strengthened, fortified, and reverent; and amid the lighter work of the vineyard, the binding up of broken vines, and the raising of those that have fallen, I am cheered by the singing of their sweet hymns, and the smiles of their seraph eyes.

Thou art here, my beloved friend, freed at last from thy galling prison-bonds, and a wanderer whithersoever thou wilt in the boundless domains of the beautiful. Yes, from the outer court of the tabernacle, hast thou vanished;—but thou art still here,—a cherished habitant of my inner life—a ministering priestess in the sanctuary of my soul. Sweet and intimate was our communion in the days of thy human existence; but it is sweeter and more intimate now. No silence so deep that thy clear voice is not heard—no solitude so entire that thy presence is not recognized. Midnight cometh with its gloom and its loneliness, but thou and thy God are with me. Morning heralds in my daily toils; but a voice in my spirit whispers, 'Work on with faith and courage, thou pilgrim of life, for the day of thy release is not far distant, weary though the way may seem to thee. Work on with a brave heart so long as thy God requires; afterward shalt thou share my holy rest.' So in all the solitudes of life,—in all its seasons of depression and gloom—in all its desert heats, and mountain storms, sweet spirit-voices entreat me onward to the goal of recompense, and white hands beckon to me from the far-off summits of the Eternal Hill! I will arise and go! No longer by the wayside may I loiter, filling my basket with frail flowers that the noonday sun will scorch, and glittering pebbles that will become a burden before half my pilgrimage is accomplished. But with a light heart and a firm step press onward to the Temple of Rest, that Temple which crowns the mountain-lands of Time, and whose golden turrets are bathed in Eternal Radiance!

My Child.

How MANY hopes have died with thee
My first, my only child!
I fondly thought my age would be
By thy sweet smiles beguiled.

When first I pressed thee to my heart,
I knew a mother's fears,
Too deep my feelings were for words—
They sought relief in tears.

Father! I cried, to thee I give
This little helpless one!
Thy love is stronger yet than mine,
And may thy will be done.

A sweeter or a fairer child,
Ne'er blessed a mother's heart,
Each day some opening beauty showed
The mind's still better part.

I thought my cup of happiness
Was full enough before;
But now it rose up to the brim,
And e'en seemed running o'er.

And when at length she lifeless lay,
By death's unerring dart,
Like thunder from a cloudless sky,
The blow fell on my heart.

But when I called to mind that I
Had given her to God,
I dared not murmur or repine,—
He took me at my word.

Yes! with a Father's tender care,
And overflowing love,
He gently took my flower from earth,
And planted it above.

Above, in heaven, where wind, or storm,
Touch not her precious head,—
Where pain, and sorrow, sickness, death,
No gloomy horrors shed.

And though no more I hear her voice,
With merry bird-like tone,
And though the light of laughing eyes
Far from my path is gone,—

I cannot wish my loved one back,
To cheer my lovely way;
I would not call an angel down
From God, and heaven away.

But O the blessed thought to meet
Again, to part no more!
Tis the bright star that lights my bark,
Along life's dreary shore.

Moral and Spiritual Reflections on the passing Season.

BY REV. W. M. FERNALD.

Now is the time when we can utter with a renewed gratitude, the expressive language of Solomon: 'For, lo, the winter is past; the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth; and the time of the singing of birds is come.' And such a time we may well employ in extracting a sentiment of piety from the works and appearances of nature. This has the sanction of the sacred writers, and our Savior himself hath given it the might and authority of his example. 'Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow: they toil not, neither do they spin; and yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these.' He expatiates on the beauties of a single flower, and draws from thence an argument for confidence in God. How much more then may we expatiate on the wide field spread out before us in the loveliest of nature's seasons! How may we improve an hour's time on such an occasion, better than in laboring to mingle the impressions of nature with the impressions got directly from the Bible, and showing how it is, that taste and sensibility, though never to be rested in as a substitute, are not inconsistent with a christian's religion; that, in fact, the heart may be occupied with all the solemnities of the Bible, and at the same time awake to the charms and the loveliness of nature? Such an exercise may we now indulge in, with gratitude to Him who is the God of the rolling seasons, and who wakes into life and being the goodly objects of creation.

This is the season of renewed activity and reflection. Nature, which never slumbers nor is idle, hath awoke from the apparent sleep and inactivity of winter, and put on the robes and the loveliness of spring. The sun, the obedient servant of nature, having paid his friendly visit to more southern climes, has returned again to cheer and to animate us. The earth rejoices all around as the frosty fetters which enchained it permit the germs of vegetation to operate, and it assumes a gay and pleasing livery, bespeaking the promise of the Eternal of another season of luxuriance and plenty. The trees are putting on their wonted garments of beauty, and are made musical by the feathered songsters of the grove. Every creature in its turn rejoices to hail the approach of another season of freshness and of vigor, and the tiller of the ground goes forth, scattering seeds of future promise, while all in reason's ear proclaim the goodness of great nature's God, in the fulfilment of the promise that while the world standeth, seed-time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night, shall not cease.

But these reflections are not only pleasing to the mind, they make way for brighter contemplations. They not only call upon us to rejoice, but to rejoice in Him who is the sole author of all this profusion and promise, and to give unto Him the sincerest offerings of gratitude. What season is better fitted to awaken conceptions of the wisdom and goodness of that Almighty Being who hath created, and who presides over the successive changes of the year, making each, in their turn, minister to the comforts, wants, and conveniences of man? We would not, therefore, make this a subject of poetic admiration merely—we would mingle with it the sentiments of grateful feeling;—we would not, in short, look upon nature's face alone, but convert nature into a mirror to reflect her God. It was not the workings of an unconscious nature which spread out the vernal landscape before us. Were it so, we might admire, but we could not adore. And we abjure that sentimentalism which stalks abroad, regaling itself with the beauties of nature, sating every faculty with the utmost measure of its gratification, but which stops here, nor sends one thought heavenward, as a grateful offering to Him who sits behind the whole of this magnificent scenery, and is the sole cause and director of it all. We would not thus be guilty of exalting the creation above the glory of the Creator. But while we would admire, and view with intellectual eye the beauties of creation, and drink in the inspiration of the scene, we would at the same time lay a mandate on the thinking faculty, and send it upwards unto Him who claims the first place in the affections of his creatures, and by whom all that is lovely on the face of our world, was strewn for its embellishment and the delight of its beholders. It was not the adoration of unconscious nature which the immortal Thompson indulged in, when, in the overflowings of his heart, he sang of the blessings of the seasons. These, he declared, were but the varied God.

‘Forth in the pleasing Spring
Thy beauty walks. Thy tenderness and love.—
Wide flush the fields; the softening air is balm;
Echo the mountains round; the forest smiles;
And every sense, and every heart is joy.’

We would respond to the sentiments of this admirer of nature, and we would also become imbued with that spirit of profound adoration which pervades his inimitable hymn to the Deity, from which the above quotation is extracted.

The ‘varied God’ is seen in the goodly landscapes around us. It is his beauty, and his tenderness alone, which are now displayed throughout all nature; and in some picturesque of woods, and eminences, and crystal streams, and grassy sunshine, where nature seems to have sported in the distribution of her choicest colors, and her most varied scenes; or in some fertile field where the art and the industry of the cultivator are seen, and the waving richness of the earth gives token of a goodly harvest; or in the flowery lawn so thickly interspersed with a thousand hues and inimitable touches; it is the paradise of God that is there;—it is his beneficence and his paternal tenderness which have lavished this beauty and plenty upon the face of our earth; and the cheerfulness of man, with the frolic and the gambols of the whole inferior creation, ‘all seem to indicate a world made for happiness—a scene of jubilee lighted up by the glorious luminary that is suspended over it, and in which we may at once see the beatitudes of our existing creation, and the bounteousness of Him from whom it sprung.’

And these reflections serve to show also the superiority of man, and the special obligations he is under to improve well the high sphere which he occupies, in living to the glory of the Creator. It is true that life, and happiness, and joyousness, are spread in inexhaustible profusion over the rejoicing fields and woods, making glad the abode of the inferior creation, causing the earth to ring with joy, and the trees to resound with melody; and within this humble sphere alone could we delight to expatiate, gathering arguments for the existence of an unseen Benefactor, who hath thus upon the earth given tokens of his presiding care, and his wide spread munificence. But this is the theme of man’s meditations. He can indulge in the thoughts and the conceptions of his own understanding, but the very field over which he expatiates, the unconscious brutes who are the objects of his intellectual contemplations, can share no part or lot in the reveries of his sagacious mind. The fields are destitute of intelligence, and the irrational part of the creation know not the Being who hath formed them. Man alone rejoices in his God, and experiences his existence, and aspires to live in his presence, and acquaint himself with his glory. And how much then, should he feel the superiority of his rank and condition, and study well to improve the high faculties with which he is endowed. How should he, when some bright and happy scene of vernal glory, with all its life, and sensation, and enjoyment, breaks upon his intellectual vision, and when he contrasts the unconsciousness with which this scene is viewed by its unreflecting inhabitants, with his own capacious mind which can turn it all to the account of a sublime natural theology, and make it minister to the gratification of his religious faculties,—how should he kindle in the inspiration of the subject, and resolve henceforth to live in accordance with his high vocation, and debase himself no more with such principles and actions as place him on a level with the very brutes themselves! Oh, it is too true that these are the inconsistencies of privileged man, and that many a time he has abused the distinguished faculties allotted to him, and dishonored his exalted nature by sins of every hue and magnitude, from the petty shiftings of the accomplished transgressor, down to the brutish licentiousness of the profligate and the abandoned.

And more than this, there is the sin of thoughtless ingratitude. In this vernal season of the year, there is many an admirer of nature’s decorated landscapes. There is many an enraptured enthusiast who can walk forth in the freshness of the morning, and regale his taste with the scenes of enchantment spread out every where before him. There is many a one, who, gifted with a fine imagination, and a mind alive to the beauties and sublimities of nature, can survey the whole expanse within the scope of a wide extended vision, and as the orb of day lights up the surrounding hemisphere of woods and plains and cultivated fields, and the tide of lustre goes forth upon the face of this whole creation, and the tribe of feathered songsters, spirited and shrill, through woods and groves surrounding, pour forth their sweetest carols and their most lively notes, as if to hail with joy the welcome appearance of the king of day, converting the whole of this territory, which, just before, had been pervaded with the gloom and stillness of the night, into one scene of glory, activity and gladness,—as, we say, all this fills the eye and the ear of this child of refinement and of sensibility, may there be felt the glow of feeling, and the rising of the mind, and the perfect absorption of all the thoughts, which would yet permit him to stand and to gaze still longer upon this scene of loveliness, until the very flight of time reminds him of the occupation which engages him, and recovers him from that state of wrapt admiration in which he had so completely lost himself;—and yet all this may be without one thought which gives to such a contemplation the zest and the richness which of right belong to it,—without one thought of Him who is the author of all this satisfaction, or once regarding him as the God in whom we live, who waked into existence this fair creation, for man, and for beast, and for bird to enjoy, and without whom we should have been left without the richness to look upon, and without the faculties and the existence to enjoy it. Now, is it right that such an homage should be paid to nature, and not a particle to nature's God? Is it right, that such a flood of feeling should be made to flow in contemplation of unintelligent and unconscious nature, while not a thought nor a feeling should exist towards the great source and fountain of wisdom—that presiding Intelligence which hath originated all, and overrules all, and with whom alone it is, that we have mainly and substantially to do? We protest against such naked sentimentalism, which has not a spark of piety or religion about it. We disown that pretension to religious influence which many have set up, who, from the overpowering and the grand, and the affecting incidents of life, have caught a momentary inspiration which lasts as long as the causes of excitement, and dies when these cease to operate. A man may have his understanding stimulated, and his fancy regaled, and his imagination enlivened, and every faculty upon the stretch of its most intense gratification, at some such scene as we have been describing, and which may be met with almost anywhere in the delightful season which is now passing, and yet 'no piety may mingle with the contemplation; and not for the want of knowledge, but for the want of thought, may there be as little of God in the eye of this raptured enthusiast, as in the brute, unconscious gaze of the creature that hath no understanding.'

And now, my brethren, can you sympathize with me in the remarks and the sentiments which have been now offered? Can you enlist against the sentimentalism of a cold and faithless generation, and ardently advocate the duty and the enjoyment of mingling the impressions of nature and the impressions of godliness together? Can you relish this enjoyment yourselves? Can you walk abroad in the glory of the vernal months, and as you view the picturesque of some goodly land, the verdant fields and massy foliage which in beauteous succession pass behind you like a shifting panorama as you move along, betokening riches and abundance,—can you, while you are admiring, carry the sentiment upwards to heaven, from whence all that is beautiful on earth below descendeth from the Father of lights and the Giver of every good and perfect gift? In short, can you mingle admiration and gratitude together? If not, then you are far from a christian's privilege, and a christian's character; and instead of being commended for your fine imaginations, and your luxurious sensibilities, and your rapturous admirations, permit me to say, you are only increasing the depth of your ungodliness, and demeriting a greater punishment for the neglect of cultivating those affections for which you are afforded so full an opportunity.

But if you can commingle the impressions of nature and the impressions of piety, as we hope and trust you all do at times, then you can go forth in the brightness and the bloom of May, and as you see that the winter is past, that the snow is over and gone, that the flowers appear upon the earth, and the time of the singing of birds is come; you can both admire and adore the goodness which hath appointed the regularity of the seasons, and succeeded the tempests and the frowns of winter with the smiles, and the gentleness, and the promises of Spring.

And how else shall we improve the occasion and the subject with which we are now presented? We would remark, that in addition to the religious impressions which may be received in such a season, there is, or should be, a purely moral influence emanating from it. We have frequently heard of the 'smiling face' of nature. This may be contrasted with the sullen frowns of sordid, selfish man. Who can go forth to view the pleasantness which sits upon the cheerful landscape,—the blandness, the gentleness, the mildness, which seemeth everywhere to reign around, emblematic of these same qualities within the human breast,—who can look out upon such a scene, as it smileth in its pleasing livery to the eye of the beholder, and not feel heartily ashamed of the sullen sourness of a soul—a little angry spirit that can with such a spite set up so striking a dissimilitude to nature? Compare one countenance with another. Look on this picture and on that. 'Do not the very openness and benignity which sit on the aspect of nature, reproach him for the cold and narrow and creeping jealousies that are at work in his own selfish and suspicious bosom; and most impressively tell the difference between what man is and what he ought to be? It reminds us of the contrast which is sometimes exhibited between the soft and flowery lawn of a cultivated domain, and the dark or angry spirit of its owner—of whom we might almost imagine that he scowls from the battlements of his castle at the intrusion of every unlicensed visitor.' O! when will man learn of nature's benignancy and smiles, to cultivate a like amiableness in his own disposition, that thus the expressive goodness of nature's picturesque, may be as a mirror reflecting the graces and the harmony of his own soul? So much may be done, at least, by the way of a purely moral influence emanating from the surrounding scenery of this materialism upon the heart of every beholder.

The idea may be extended to embrace the whole of that moral depravity which so disfigures the scene of our sinful world. O! has the thought never struck you, my brethren, as you have gone from the crowded city, or from the busy haunts of men, where you have been brought into contact with human passions, and observed the complex play of human interests, and seen the shifting, and the injustice, and the sordid selfishness; and heard the wranglings of conflicting parties—the tempered reproof—the bitter murmurings—the loud dispute;—has the thought never struck you, when you have gone from such a theatre of moral disorder, to the refreshing and the fair of rural nature, that while in the moral scene there is so much to thwart, and to revolt, and to irritate,—in the natural scene all is gracefulness and harmony? And what account will you give of this impressive contrast? Does it not look as though some pestilential blight had come over this world of ours, leaving its materialism untouched, but inflicting upon man a sore and a withering leprosy? And what is this but the blight and the leprosy of sin? So much, my brethren, though it be of a melancholy character, for the moral instructions to be gleaned from the ample book of nature.

And may we not, while on this division of our subject, look at the distinguished sinfulness of man in the enjoyment of so much lavishment from the hands of his Creator? One would think, when viewing the abode that is fitted up for him, and the richness and beauty which everywhere decorate his terrestrial habitation, that he would, at least, exhibit in return far more of dutiful allegiance to heaven than what in reality appeareth. But if Adam sinned in Paradise, what better ought we to expect, now sin has taken up its settled abode with us, and its seducing vanities wield such an ascendancy over the men of all ages and of all generations? Nevertheless, it will serve to humiliate, if nothing else, to reflect upon the fact, that while all things here are placed under man's dominion, he is the being who hath set at naught the laws of the Eternal, and abused the blessings entrusted to him. And what goes to aggravate his case to our conceptions, is the striking contrast exhibited between him and all the rest of this lower creation. It may indeed be true, that man alone is capable of praise, but we are to look at the contrast simply, as food for serious reflection. And while it is true that a thousand blessings attend us upon every hand, that, to the remotest corner of the earth, and over all its habitations, are the tokens of a presiding Deity, and the friendly visitations of his care; it is also true, that to this all nature seems to yield a universal gratulation; and if, when the foundations of the earth were laid, the morning stars sang together while all the sons of God shouted for joy, so, when turning on its axis, it ushers in the vernal glory of the spring and summer months, the beasts of the field apparently conspire to gratify their Creator,—the birds sing and warble forth his praise, but man, the noblest of his works, rebels! This is a reflection which should serve to humble man, and lead him, when he views the goodness around him, and the distinguished exaltation of his nature, to a resolve henceforth to run with dutious delight in the way of God's commandments.

And now, my brethren, what further improvement can we make of the occasional subject which is now before us? In this rejoicing season of the year, we behold the tiller of the ground going forth, earning his bread by the sweat of his brow, scattering the seed of future promise. And many have moralized on this in a way which is farthest from the truth and derogatory to the high vocation of the husbandman. It is both an unscriptural and degrading idea, that man was cursed to labor, and that, if he had not sinned against the laws of God, he would not have been doomed to earn his subsistence by the toil of tilling the earth which was accursed. Before a single command was given respecting the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, or the forbidden fruit thereon, Adam was placed in the garden of Eden, not, however, to live in indolence among the plenty and the richness of the spot, but to 'dress it and to keep it.' Thus was labor ordained by the Creator as the blessing, and not the curse, of the human race. Without labor, indeed, the curse might be experienced, and the fruits of idleness be seen in the nameless vices to which mankind would then resort, as a substitute for honest, virtuous, and happy industry. Adam, then, was a gardener before and without any reference to the curse, and again we read, that 'Abel was a keeper of sheep, and Cain a tiller of the ground.' And moreover, Elisha, we read, was at work with the plough, when 'Elijah passed by him, and cast his mantle upon him,' and called him to the prophet's office. So that it is a highly honorable calling, and ordained by the Almighty as a blessing unto man.

Thus would we moralize on husbandry, and when in the season of the plough and harrow, we see the sower scattering his seed, the earnest of a future harvest, we would call to remembrance the promise which is every year fulfilled before us, that while the world remaineth, seed time and harvest shall not cease; and adopt the invocation of the poet:

'Be gracious, heaven! for now laborious man
Has done his part. Ye fostering breezes, blow!
Ye softening dews, ye tender showers, descend!
And temper all, thou world-reviving sun,
Into the perfect year!'

We would also call to remembrance the language of the Psalmist in reference to Christ. 'They that sow in tears shall reap in joy. He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him.' Thanks to the God of our salvation! the harvest shall be truly great which Christ the first fruits giveth token of; for 'if the first fruits be holy the lump is also holy'—the whole mass of mankind—the universal harvest of all the sleeping dead! This shall Christ, rejoicing, present unto the Father, when he shall resign his mediatorial kingdom, and God shall be all in all.

What more shall I say on the occasion of the present subject? Spring hath been called an emblem of youth. It is the season of activity and vigor, and when all creatures are busy to provide for their future wants, and secure the objects of their brief existence. And in the rising generation, these are the objects, or should be, of the aim of every one. Youth is the season that must see the foundation laid for future usefulness and happiness, and in which we must prepare for the winter of old age. And let not the youth who are now in the spring time of their existence, in the vigor and activity of life, let pass the opportunity for securing hereafter the rewards of well-timed industry, the peace of virtue, and the respect and reverence of the wise and good. As the seeds of promise are now deposited in the faithful bosom of the earth, so let the seeds of virtue—the principles of truth, and integrity, and justice, be planted in your youthful bosoms, which shall insure a harvest of rejoicing well worth your labors in securing it.

But you must not only plant and sow, but weeding is an essential business in the cultivation of the ground. Be careful then to pluck up the tares which so frequently get sown by the enemy, or else introduced by carelessness, that your reward shall be great, and ye shall be the children of the Highest.

Spring is also the season for pruning and nursing. Be watchful then to break off your sins by righteousness, and to nourish the good which remaineth, that thus you may grow up an ornament in society, neither barren nor unfruitful in the works of usefulness and virtue.

Again, I would remark, that Spring is also an emblem of the frailty of human life. At this season of the year, we need not search for images of decay and death; they are everywhere present, even in the withering beauties of nature. However bright may be the glory of the vernal months, and gay the objects which we meet with, they are fleeting, transitory, uncertain as the life of man. Many are the blooming plants which receive new life and also death in the short season of the spring. So, in the period of human life, how fugitive is man! Death may overtake us in the bloom of youth, and cut us down in the midst of healthful promise. Even when the canker of disease is gnawing at the vitals, the crimson glow of health may be upon the countenance, even as the rose which blooms to-day, to-morrow withereth and is gone. Everywhere does Spring declare, in the expressive language of visible decay, that life is short, and death nigh at hand, even at the doors. We see the trees in the pride of verdure and adorned with blossoms, and the flowers appearing on the earth, and all indicative of vigor and endurance, but in a day they may all be stripped of their blossomings, and in a few months brought to the time of their decay. So, in the life of mortals, fly the fairest hours of bliss, and though the morning of our existence may meet us with smiles, and promise nothing but enjoyment, ere we have attained the evening, or even the noon-day of our existence, we experience the desolation of misfortune, and the bitterness of grief; wo marks our course, and affliction follows our steps. Surely the present season is an emblem of the frailty of human life, and an expressive image of death.

But lastly, I would remark, that Spring is an emblem of the resurrection. Winter would be death when nature dies, were it not succeeded by a restoration and an animation into life. Those flowers which bloom in inimitable brightness, the pride of your gardens, and of matchless hues and forms, were once but shapeless roots in the ground. If this were not a common thing—if you had never seen the like before, you would pronounce it a miracle at once. And what less will you make of the process by which the blooming butterfly is brought out from the death-like chrysalis? We are not offering these as proofs of the resurrection—we rest that upon the rock of our salvation—Jesus Christ, who hath himself risen from the grave. But we ask you, when you look upon the brightness of the flower, and the gilded butterfly, to reflect, whether man may not have within him a principle indestructible as either of them, which may survive the ruins of the grave, and bloom in immortality in the paradise of God. Go, faithless mortal, and look upon the glory of the vernal scene outstretched before you, and say from whence it sprung. From apparent death and corruption. So may we apparently die, but as sure as the sun pours down its life-giving beams, and bringeth glory from the earth, so sure shall the Sun of Righteousness bring glory into being, for 'it is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption; it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory.' And, as in this renovating season, all nature seems to arise from a state of sleep to praise its Author, and the notes of all the inhabitants of the air swell into one universal hymn to glorify the Being who hath formed them; so, on the morning of the resurrection, shall similar songs ascend from all the ransomed family of man.

We will thank God and take courage from the soul-sustaining truth,—joyful we'll go through all the good and ill which chequer mortal life, and say to the oppressed, the afflicted, and the broken-hearted, who have thus far been supported by it:

'Ye good distressed!
Ye noble few! who here unbending stand
Beneath life's pressure, yet bear up awhile,
And what your bounded view, which only saw
A little part, deem'd evil, is no more;
The storms of wintry time will quickly pass,
And one unbounded Spring ENCIRCLE ALL.'

Stanzas on the Death of Mrs. J. H. Scott.

'Sister, my soul's loved sister,
I have bidden thee farewell.'

MRS. SCOTT.

ALL things do call for thee!
I hear low breathings 'mid the bright spring-roses,
And tolling murmurs from the harebells blue;
And where the violet on the turf reposes,
Filling its urn-cup with the sparkling dew,
A soft lament, a wild and sweet deploring
Calls for thy presence here amid the flowers,—
The early flowers, o'er which thy heart, adoring,
Poured forth its gladness in thy brighter hours—
All these do call for thee!

And more than these—ay, more!
Hearts that were linked to thine by strong affection,
Thy child's young voice in many a mournful cry,
They who have named thee, by the soul's election,
The brightest star that shone along our sky—
These call for thee in tones of thrilling sadness,
They woo thee back by many a burning tear—
Oh! 'midst the music of thy heart's deep gladness,
Canst thou in heaven their wild complainings hear,
Thou, who art past all grief?

Thou wert a priestess here;
In nature's temple, by her flower-wreathed altar,

* Her love of flowers was no unreal sentiment. In one of her letters she promised to send me a poem for every species of rare seed, or slip of plant I could find means to forward to her. Among the beautiful varieties of shrubs, vines, and flowers, with which her yard was literally filled, she showed me some wild clematis vines she had raised from seed I had gathered for her on the banks of Bow-Brook. 'I do so love the sweet flowers,' she said—'I am a perfect child about them.'

Long hast thou ministered with gifts divine ;
 Thy heart hath been thy prayer-book and thy psalter,
 And every lone bright spot a sacred shrine.
 Thy hymns—Oh were they not, 'mid glen and mountain,
 Called from thy heart by some resistless power ?
 Blending the music of the wildwood fountain
 With the pure sweetness of the summer flower :
 Were they not, dearest friend ?

Deep sank their fervent tones—
 Deep in our heart of hearts their praise descended,
 And stirred up burning thoughts and holy love,
 For in their rich, impassioned strains were blended
 A zeal and beauty sent thee from above.
 No more to us shall those sweet strains be chanted—
 Hushed is thy voice beside life's flowing stream—
 Thou who so long for clearer waters panted,
 Hast found at last the beauty of thy dream—
 The bright, eternal Fount !

We would not call thee thence—
 We would not, bright one, though a dimness lieth
 Along those pathways where thy smile hath shone—
 For thou art now where beauty never dieth,
 And shadows on the heart are never strown.
 Not all of thee, sweet friend, from earth hath perished,
 Our hearts still keep thee, still they love thee well—
 There are thy songs and gentle teachings cherished,
 There shall the memory of thy goodness dwell—
 For good thou wert, and true !

'The Knitting Society.'

I AM not about to pen a story, or to ramble amid the beautiful fields, or into the rich gardens of romance and poetry, for the reality is far more pleasant than fiction. My theme is drawn from real life—from real life in more than one sense, for while I treat of what has actually been, I recall hours of richest enjoyment—when the better feelings all lived in healthy and joyous activity, and golden memories were being stored up in the soul. I treat of the Universalist Knitting Society in Providence, and do so because I wish the sisters in the faith in other places where there are no such societies, to consider the matter ere autumn returns and take measures to enjoy the good which has been here enjoyed. The meetings here have been emphatically social, cheerful and religious meetings, and the recollections of the happy evenings thus spent in the past, will long exert a desirable influence, winning the affections towards every thing amiable and good.

The association met weekly at the houses of the members according to appointments, and a very large number regularly attended. The passing of the stocking for the contributions of the gentlemen, was always a merry movement, and liberal sums were always received to defray the expenses of the yarn and needles. Then came the winding of the yarn, and nice criticisms and learned disquisitions were made on the most proper method of increasing the woolly ball so that the softness of the material might be preserved. The task is certainly a pleasant one, and for bachelors it is somewhat dangerous at times—though I have not yet heard of any very serious consequences. Puns and repartees fly fast while this work goes on, and frequently is the loud laugh heard which does not 'speak the vacant mind.' Now gaze round the ample apartments and behold the glittering needles weaving the net work for the understanding—not a net work to perplex, but to give comfort to it, which certainly proves knitting to be an intellectual employment. Ah, there is one knitter unravelling a part of the woven yarn, and her countenance resembles his who has to repeat a capital joke because he did not tell it right—half illumined by happy feeling and half shaded by dissatisfaction resulting from not having wrought effectually the first time.

Knitting is certainly very accommodating work, for the fingers will weave the mysterious meshes while the eyes of the knitter flash forth the true fire in straight lines to other eyes, mutually kindling new light to gladden and bless, while the voice utters freely the thoughts of the mind. I know not that there is any thing magical in knitting to enliven and make active the conversational powers, but it is certainly true that a company of knitters are generally the most social and communicative. I have frequently remarked the fact, and trace it to the magnetism of the eyes. Where needle work is the employment, the mind and sight are more engrossed in the task, and there is not that kindling of feeling which is always consequent on the meeting of eyes full of pleasant and warm radiance. And when there is no work, there is often awful pauses, and many a one knows by unhappy experience what Cowper meant when he wrote

'The fear of being silent keeps us mute.'

Here then the poor are provided for by the very means that minister indirectly to the happiness of the occasion. Conversation flows free. Inter-communication of news, ideas, and thoughts, enhances the stock of each member or visitor, and by giving, a gain is made. Happiness sits on every countenance, and a dull face is not to be seen. Let the wintry winds blow, the snow fall, or the rain pour down its bounty, still there is all that can be desired within.

But hark! the knocking of the President's thimble is heard and readily obeyed. There is no jar, no discord, though the religious service about to be attended to hushes the conversation and requires stillness. The stillness is profound, and every ear is open to hear the one voice that shall speak. How beautiful is our religion that will permit us thus to leave the vivacious enjoyments of earnest and pleasant conversation and listen to the voice of scriptural truth without lessening our felicity! How true it is

To make our pleasures less.'

True religion never lessens any pleasures worthy of being indulged in by intelligent creatures. On the contrary, it affords us means of separating the good from the evil, and guards us from the mirth that in the end hath heaviness. It would keep the soul in its true, healthy element, and ensure it the richest happiness in the activity of virtue. According to the nature of the powers called into exercise by various pleasures, will be the enjoyment conferred; and as religion brings out into industrial life the noblest and best powers, therefore it is evident that in her hand are the most valuable gifts—she alone can give the true 'elixir of life.'

A portion of scripture is now read—remarks are offered and others may follow if a visiting brother in the ministry be present; and then a prayer is offered. After this service, the time for departure sets in, but many linger like the radiance of the west at summer twilight, as though loth to leave a scene of rare loveliness; and merrily, group after group departs, impelled by happy thoughts and feelings to trip hastily along the pavements towards home.

I like these social gatherings, where the false distinctions and useless ceremonials of artificial life are forgotten—where we are made to, and are willing to, depend on our wits for entertainment. They do good in many ways, recommending them to all who recognize our social nature and the necessity of its cultivation in the courtesies and humanities of life. The articles wrought for gifts to the poor make not a small sum in estimating the good results of the gatherings, for the number of workers is large, and large also is the number of needy persons—young and old.

We need such meetings as a people. Our religion is eminently social, and it is mutual acquaintance and the awakening of mutual sympathies among believers, that can do much for the production in the soul of a true gospel zeal. We stand too much aloof from each other; and many persons go year after year to the same church and hardly know the occupants of the next pew to theirs. We are too much satisfied with feeling—with the consciousness of possessing friendliness in the heart, and neglect altogether too much the cultivation of proper means of manifesting the indwelling feeling—the secreted affection. We need more familiarity with each other, and in the highest—the most christian sense, to 'be given to hospitality.' Therefore, as a means of cultivating the social feelings, I must very highly estimate the value of these gatherings of our friends.

Another recommendation is their Republicanism. There is no recognition of a nobility, or an aristocracy, or any privileged class. They who meet, meet on common ground. No distinctions of rich and poor are made, and the casual visitor cannot tell by any thing outward who is the dweller in the humble abode, or the inhabitant of the proud mansion. And this is well. Does not our glorious faith level all artificial distinctions—all superiorities claimed by virtue of rich possessions, or outward exaltation? It does. It makes mind worthy of respect wherever met, and virtue the costliest treasure. It calls out the affections to a life of goodness, and prompts the exercise of every kindly and amiable feeling. It guards us against cherishing in any degree an exclusive or Separatist spirit. And this is needed.

These meetings are valuable also, in that they afford great aid to the minister to approach his people without formalities, and he is made able to know them as he cannot otherwise be able. The time, the occasion, and the general cheerfulness, exert an influence to keep away the unnatural restraints, and the individuals act without affectation. We see them as they really are, and approach them as we are not often privileged to. This familiarity is greatly needed.

And again;—where the social feelings are thus awakened, and the right familiarity brought about, the power of the pulpit to do good is augmented. The preacher will be better known and better understood, and he will speak more to the heart. If prudence has marked his course, and he has lived as he should, his presence will awaken the social feelings, and he will not have mere intellect to deal with in the church. He will not be set apart from the congregation as one differing in some mysterious qualities from his people, but they will feel that he has a heart like their own, and that its affections are uttering truths for their good. Then he will never be made 'an offender for a word;' the people will not fear to speak to him of what they may disapprove, or of what they want, which he neglects or does not perceive. Neither will he be left in doubt respecting the success of his ministrations; for he will frequently meet with expressions of their effects from the people who know him and love to encourage him. He will be able to enter more into their feelings—to know their wants, and when the time of trial or bitter grief comes, his words will enter their hearts with a divine unction and do them good. He will be the one they delight to consult in important matters in which he may be supposed to have an interest as their spiritual friend, and his presence will always be welcome and cheering. Happy the minister thus situated! He can labor with all his soul, for every where he will find hearts beating in sympathy with his own.

The 'Knitting Society' of the Universalists in this city (Providence) closed their meeting in April. The last was a most happy one, and every lip was eloquent with testimonies of the enjoyment of the meetings of the season. I am happy in being able to copy from the 'Gospel Messenger' the address read by the President at the last meeting. It was listened to with deep attention; and though not intended to be like an Almanac to suit all places, yet the general sentiments are applicable to Universalists every where.

CLOSING ADDRESS.

BY MRS. SUSAN R. MORRIS.

'This evening closes our meetings for the season, and, if other feelings accord with my own, we have never met with so much pleasure, or separated with such reluctance. The past winter has been to us, for many reasons, one of peculiar interest and profit. It has been justly remarked, that the tree of religious liberty was first planted in the soil of Rhode Island; it has been permitted to grow and extend its branches, and the prayer has again and again ascended that the smoke from persecution's altar should never be seen wreathing among its foliage. Here first went up the glad and thrilling sound, freedom to worship God. The name of our city was an expression of gratitude for this happy privilege, and with it are connected associations which should be remembered with joy, cherished with thanksgiving, and which should ever stimulate to progress. Providence afforded the first shelter for the persecuted, a home for the oppressed, a refuge for the poor, in spirit, protection from ecclesiastical rule, and liberty to exercise thought, and express conviction thereon without the fear of imprisonment or death. Our minds dwell on this idea with exultation, that in the early history of our republic, there was found one noble soul, one daring mind, one energetic spirit, who disdained to be trammelled by creeds or formularies, who sought a resting place from the winds of self-righteousness, and a covert from the storm of pharisaical authority, and who transmitted the liberty thus found, and the privileges thus secured, unimpaired to posterity.

His name should be hallowed in every liberal heart, and his memory held in everlasting remembrance. Yet amid all these pleasing associations, these endearing recollections, the thought will intrude itself, that what is denied by power is attempted to be established by public opinion; that the spirit which governed Pharisees in the days of our Savior, still holds its control over the minds of too many of his professed followers, and even at this late day, when light and knowledge have so much increased, those who venture to exercise freedom of thought in the light of reason and scripture, and express their conviction of truth against pre-conceived opinions, are denounced, vilified, and traduced, even in the land of Roger Williams.

No other testimony is required in justification of this assertion, than merely to advert to the scenes of the past season. We have witnessed the most unprincipled opposition with which our experience has ever furnished us, and yet we have found that the weapons of the adversary have fallen harmless at our feet, and that we have remained unscathed amid the fire of the enemy.

When our meetings commenced we had no pastor; already had the connection been dissolved which in a few weeks separated us. This was a trial little anticipated, and for which we considered ourselves illy prepared. But we did not know our strength, our energies had not been put in requisition, and we feared the result. Many of us said and felt that our meetings would lose their interest, we should have no guide, no shepherd, and we virtually acknowledged that none could be found to fill the place of him who had so successfully ministered to us in holy things. But our fears were dissipated as chaff before the purifying wind, and we learned, as a people, what many of us had previously felt as individuals, that "as our day is, so shall our strength be." Every succeeding meeting has increased in interest, we have added abundantly to our stock of faith, our thoughts and aspirations have been upraised to heaven, we have left the earthly and leaned on an Almighty arm, and found support, and hope, and comfort, which surrounding circumstances could neither blight or destroy. Every reflecting mind among us, (and I cannot but feel that I include all in so saying) will in the sincerity of the heart thank our heavenly Father for the discipline of the past season, as therein is verified the truth that whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and that for our profit; though evil was intended, good only has eventuated, and that all things will work together for good to those who love God. Our prospects are now cheering, and our hearts are made truly glad, for we have again a pastor, whose ministries (if the past give assurance for the future,) will conduce to our spiritual well being, to elevation of thought, purity of feeling, and a more perfect understanding of the truth as it is in Jesus. May we feel the importance of strengthening his hands by renewed exertions in the cause of the Master to whom he has given himself, and in which he continues to labor.

Let us evince our gratitude by increased energy, and untiring effort, and never forget that much of our happiness depends on cultivating kindly feelings and friendly communications. The bond of union which has so firmly cemented us in an associated capacity is not to be severed when we cease to meet; the silken cord, which has drawn heart to heart, must not be broken because other duties require us for a time to separate. No! Let the happy hours, the joyous scenes, the blissful hopes, and bright anticipations realized in the past, in retrospect come often before us, that they may stimulate to action, and prompt to good works. We have uniformly met in the spirit of love, and always parted in unaffected peace; prosperity is within our borders, and plenteousness in our habitations; but yet uninterrupted felicity is not the lot of mortals, and there are some sad scenes mingled with our cup of bliss.

Five successive years had passed and our numbers remained unbroken; but in the sixth, in the mysterious order of Providence, was one called from among us, who had, it is true, met with us in weakness, but whose sympathies, nevertheless, the few that remained unimpaired by disease, were ever enlisted for our welfare.

The seventh season death took from us a lovely young mother, who had but just been called by her "new name," and a faithful father in our Israel, who had borne the burden and heat of the day.

These both died in the triumphs of faith, and the closing hours of their existence afforded a striking illustration of the power of the gospel, when believed in its fulness, to illumine the otherwise dark valley of the shadow of death.

The eighth, which is the present season, we have been called to part with one who, at the opening of our meetings, mingled with us in all the freshness of health and beauty, with every prospect of continued life. But she has so recently departed, the circumstances of her sickness and triumphant death are so vivid in our minds, and were so justly and happily delineated on the day of her funeral, that more said would be superfluous. These lessons of mortality teach us the necessity of the divine injunction, "Set your affection on things above." Our thoughts are oftener in heaven when the loved of earth are there. Our desires rise more fervently, our aspirations become purer and more elevated as they ascend the throne of grace, coupled with the sublime idea that our devotions mingle with theirs, and together we address their Father and our Father, their God and our God.

Let these dispensations inspire in our minds a spirit of humble trust and confidence in the Author of our being, and strengthen the resolution which I doubt not we have individually formed, that whether we meet or are separated, wherever we are, or whatever may be our trials, we will stand fast in one mind, and with one spirit strive together for the hope of the gospel.

Written for the Repository.

Obituary.

WE have received intelligence of the death of MRS. ELIZABETH SWEET (widow of the late NATHANIEL SWEET) who died in Marblehead, April 8th, aged 68 years. Mrs. Sweet had been infirm for a long time, but still was ever cheerful and patient. She delighted to visit the Temple when her health would permit, and carried to her home holy and happy impressions. It always did me good to greet her on the way, or in the church, for I knew there was one ready to hear for the truth's sake, and who would bear away a blessing. Such a one could not but die peaceful and reconciled, and thus she did close her pilgrimage. May the God of all grace bless the faithful daughter who ministered to her wants with filial fidelity; and though she may not fully unite with me in the faith I love, yet I rejoice she possesses its beautiful spirit. And may the God of consolation enable all the relatives to look aright on the departure of the aged mother, and prize the glorious religion which alone can give to the soul in death the great and satisfying hope. THE SCHOLAR'S INHERITANCE.

Not gold and gems; not pastures and meadows, fat flocks and waving grain; not deeds, bonds, mortgages and stock—such things seldom fall to the scholar's lot. If he have a thatched cottage, a shady elm, a musical brook, a maple dish, with his books and a clear mind, he may well be content, and deem himself rich withal. Often is he poorer than this; but weighs not a scanty wardrobe and the uncertain meal, in comparison with knowledge. Yet is the scholar heir to a worthier inheritance, measured out by no metes and bounds, weighed in no earthly balances, and of a value assignable by no ordinary calculus. It embraces every pebble, every spire of grass, every flashing wave, the depth of the sea, the caverns of the earth—it compasses the circuit of the stars, and he weighs and measures them as his rightful possessions. Wherever aught may be known, there is his realm. Every thought, feeling, act of man, in the long reach of his history, past and to come, is his. The spirits of earth and air are his; the soul of the flower, and the demon of the mine, the invisible agencies of the wind, and the melodies of the spheres. With reverent awe he passes into the society of celestial hierarchies, not as a stranger, but as one of them. Lowly and humble in his temper, the shining laws and orders of the universe, are his, as he is duly subject to them. The unseen messengers that pass to and fro between heaven and earth visit him too, in his meekness and integrity.

To this inheritance he is always welcome. In the regions of thought no one will hinder his entrance. There are no hiring clauses, no writs of ejectment. Nature receives her child heartily, and with good cheer. The heart of the world is open to him who carries a true heart with him. Science throws open all her stores to him who would enjoy them; his own rudeness only, and want of skill, detain him from the complete fruition.

This inheritance is everlasting. His title to it lies in no bond nor lease, but deep in his own immortal being. No earthly law can divest it, no ordinance of princes abate its worth, nothing but his own recreancy and baseness. He who made the eye for light, made also the soul for truth; and the sight of the soul which fails not through age, is evidence that the perception shall hereafter grow clearer forever.

Our Book and Memoranda Table.

WITHDRAWAL OF MISS EDGARTON. It will be perceived by the Prospectus that Miss Edgerton has retired from any editorial relation to this publication; but this will not, we are assured, lessen in the least her interest in the work, or deprive the readers of the Repository of the pleasure and profit of greeting her writings. She still continues as a correspondent, and our patrons may confidently expect to hear from her as often in the future as they have in the past.—Some ministering brethren have been pleased to circulate a report or surmise, that Miss Edgerton withdraws because of dissatisfaction with the management of the work. Circumstances have transpired which seem to demand of us an appeal to her to decide the matter, and we have the pleasure of presenting a direct and earnest denial of the truth of any such surmises. We wish not to print our own praise, and publish the following only because it seems to our mind to be important, to meet and set aside the report alluded to:

'As regards my withdrawal from the Repository, it must be needless for me to assure you that it is not from the slightest disapprobation of your course. It would be folly in me to say that the Repository is not capable of improvement; but I do say, in all sincerity, that with the resources you have, and the small amount of mature and practised talent which you are able to bring into requisition from abroad, no one could have done better than you have done. As an editor, your course has been honest, dignified and courteous; you have encouraged the diffident, and brought into the service of our cause, talent which would otherwise have been lost to us. You have raised the Repository from a very inferior to a very respectable rank among the literary publications of the day; and always, I do assure you, I have felt it an honor to be connected with you as a co-worker in such well-directed labors. The reason why I now withdraw, is because I feel myself incapable of doing sufficient for the Repository to entitle myself to the credit of being an editor; as a correspondent I shall feel less responsibility; and perhaps shall be able to assist you quite as much, without so much anxiety of mind as I feel when serving in an editorial capacity.' S. C. E.

ENCOURAGEMENT. We confess the poverty of words to express deep feeling, and give without comment the following from the 'Star of Bethlehem.'

'Universalist and Ladies' Repository.—The March number of this periodical has made its appearance filled as usual with interesting matter. We have not room to particularize, but the "Minister's Wife" deserves more than one reading.

'The next volume will commence July 1st, instead of June 15th. A new, neat, and small type is to be used, which will give room for more reading matter, and quarterly there is to be a fine steel engraving. It will be a handsome Magazine for the centre table, and one which the ladies of our denomination ought to encourage. Let those who now take the Lady's Book, and similar publications in preference to the Repository, pause and reflect a moment on the consistency of their course. The Repository, though not obnoxious to the charge of sectarianism, is the only literary Magazine of a denomination which we believe maintains gospel truth. It has won its present standing solely by its own merits. Its pages boast no high-sounding literary names to give it a factitious celebrity. It has not existed upon patronage, but has gone on, slowly, but surely advancing in merit, and success. It is struggling for still farther improvement, and the means to place itself beside our best Magazines. Is it right, is it consistent with our professions, to patronize other periodicals, and suffer our own to languish for want of support? Is it just, to give as a reason for so doing, that it is not equal in execution, ornament, and reading matter, when we withhold that from it, which would enable it to compete with any journal, if liberally bestowed? A word to the wise, we hope, will be sufficient. L. J. B. C.'

LOWELL OFFERING. We have just had put into our hands the back Nos. of the second volume of the 'Lowell Offering ; a repository of original articles, written by females employed in the Mills.' The work maintains the excellent character we have heretofore attributed to it, and meritedly receives earnest commendations from the press everywhere. It is now published in a very neat style, pamphlet form of 32 pages, monthly, at one dollar a year in advance. Address, post paid, or free, 'Offering, Lowell, Mass.'

A SERIES OF CONTROVERSIAL SERMONS in defence of Universalism, by Rev. O. A. Skinner. These discourses were preached (says the Prospectus) during the recent excitement in this city, and were not only the means of advancing greatly the spiritual interests of true believers, but of turning many to a knowledge of the truth. They are now published at the urgent request of many who heard them, and in the hope that they will be instrumental in promoting the cause of liberal christianity. The following are the subjects discussed :—Endless Misery irreconcilable with the goodness of God ; Endless Misery irreconcilable with the purposes of God ; Endless Misery irreconcilable with the nature of man ; Endless Misery irreconcilable with reason ; Endless Misery not taught in the Bible ; The testimony of scripture in defence of Universalism ; The Faith necessary to constitute a Christian ; Experimental Religion ; The Practice of a true Christian. The work will be neatly printed on good paper, and contain 216 pages, 18mo. Price 50 cts. Seven copies for $3. Subscription papers to be returned immediately to A. Tompkins, 38 Cornhill, Boston.

BEAUTIES OF MURRAY. New Work. We have received the proposals for publishing a new work to be entitled the 'Beauties of Murray,' selected from the works of Rev. John Murray. A most interesting and excellent work might thus be made, and we have no doubt but that such a one will be made. We present the prospectus as containing all that need be said :

'Everything connected with the life and writings of the venerable and beloved Murray, must possess peculiar interest to the denomination of Universalists. With his life most are familiar ; it has been published in a form and at a price which has placed it within the reach of every reader in our order. But this remark will not equally apply to the writings of Murray. While most have become acquainted with his doings and sayings, very few comparatively have enjoyed the pleasure of reading his writings. These are voluminous, expensive and scarce. They abound, however, with fervent piety, elevated thought, pure sentiment, and original ideas. It has been suggested (and it is hoped that the suggestion will be favorably received) to collect in one book the "Beauties of Murray," as displayed in his writings. A single volume, not exceeding one dollar in price, with due care and judgment bestowed on it, might embrace all that is peculiarly interesting and instructive in this writer, and prove a valuable addition to the Universalist Library.—Under this impression, these proposals are issued, and the attention of the Universalist public invited to the subject, and their patronage respectfully solicited. It is desired that early efforts be made for subscribers, and that returns of the number wanted be made with all convenient despatch. As soon as sufficient encouragement is given the work will be put into the printer's hand, and issued with as little delay as possible.—The labor of selection and arrangement has been entrusted to Br. Le Fevre, of Hudson, who is now engaged on the work.—Will-clergymen of our order, and active friends generally, interest themselves in this matter, and make early efforts and returns? A trifling exertion, it will be seen, will secure them a copy for their trouble.

The work will be issued in a handsome duodecimo volume of 300 or 350 pages, as the case may be, neatly bound, for one dollar, the single copy—six copies for five dollars.

Returns may be made to the 'Union and Messenger Office, No. 130 Fulton Street, New York.'

ZANONI. A Novel. By the author of 'Night and Morning,' 'Eugene Aram,' &c. In 2 vols. The person who opens these volumes expecting to meet in them a delineation of real life and real character, will be almost immediately apprized of his error ; whether to his gratification or not, will depend very much upon his comparative taste for the real and ideal. Zanoni, in its higher character, its fine sentiment, and the consummate developement of the great idea involved, as essentially a poem—a most beautiful and ideal creation, claiming for its distinguishing attributes a perfect originality of conception and a delineation as delicate as it is masterly. The hero, from whom the work derives its name, is a Rosicrucian—one of the two sole survivors of a fraternity, which by relinquishing all earthly passions and desires, and dwelling only in an intellectual and spiritual existence ; by magic, and adjuration, and various mystical arts, had acquired power over the spirits of the unseen and ideal world, and an immortal existence upon earth. Unlike Byron's Manfred, Zanoni, with all his unearthly power and wisdom, is a true and earnest philanthropist. He never exercises his necromantic power except to defend and bless the virtuous, and to frustrate the machinations of the wicked.

So many of the kindly affections of humanity still cling to Zanoni, that despite a long and noble resistance, he yields at last to the strength of a pure and disinterested love. For Viola (who by the way is one of the loveliest and most spiritual creations of the human intellect,) he consents to yield up many of the high prerogatives he had for many centuries enjoyed ; and at last, so disinterested, so entire does his affection for her become, that he willingly, joyfully resigns his human immortality, and lays down his life for her, in the hope of a more glorious immortality beyond the grave.

Of the utility of such works as Zanoni, we are not prepared to speak. Their effect will ever be different upon differently constituted minds. Individually speaking, Zanoni appears to us susceptible of very pure and elevating ministries. It exalts the imagination, encourages a love of humanity, and leads the mind from the most beautiful picturings of the Ideal, to a perception of the sublimer glories of the Divine Real.—For a copy of this, and the work noticed below, we thankfully acknowledge our indebtedness to Mr. Mussey, 29 Cornhill.

THE DAUGHTERS OF ENGLAND. By Mrs. Ellis. 1 vol. This is an excellent book—worthy of being placed in the hands of every daughter of America, as well as of England ; and one which they cannot read without being benefited. That it should be novel in its design or in its teachings, cannot be expected of a work of this class after the multitude of books that have been written upon female character and duties. But it is far from being common-place or threadbare in its style or inculcations. Mrs. Ellis writes with the earnestness of a true-hearted woman—of a devout and sincere christian ; and we heartily commend this work to the attention of the young ladies of our own country, who are emulous of being as virtuous and refined as their sisters of Britain. Mrs. Ellis is the author of the 'Women of England,' 'Poetry of Life,' and various other popular and useful books.

THE FLOWER BASKET. Translated from the German of Schmid. By Rev. T. J. Sawyer. P. Price, N. York. Many thanks to our friend, the publisher, for a copy of this beautiful little work. It is very tastefully executed; pretty enough for a centre-table even in these days. We hope 'The Flower Basket' will find an extensive sale, both for the encouragement of the translator and publisher, and for the moral improvement of the purchasers. The beautiful simplicity of its style, and the purity of its sentiments, are above all praise; moreover, it is exceedingly interesting; and this, we know, is held no unimportant qualification.

THE STAR OF SALVATION. This is a new paper, to be published weekly in Lowell, in place of the 'Star of Bethlehem,' which has been removed from that city and merged into the 'Trumpet.' 'The Star of Salvation' is published by an Association, and is printed in the same very neat form and style as was the other named paper before its enlargement, and is to be edited by Mrs. Thomas, Thayer, Miner, and Gage. One dollar per year is the subscription price. It will be a good paper and deserving of patronage.

WASHINGTONIAN TEMPERANCE ADDRESS. We have been favored with a copy of a Temperance Address, delivered in Rockport, Ms. by Br. John Allen, published by the Washingtonian Society of that place. The address is a very excellent one, presenting a good train of thought, and being written in an animated and vigorous style. It is highly creditable to our brother, and its circulation will doubtless do good.

CHRISTIAN WARRIOR. We have received the first No. of a new paper published in Richmond, Va., entitled as above, and edited by Br. D. D. Smith. It makes a good appearance, and doubtless will be an interesting publication—for the editor has the ability to make a useful work of it. It is to be published every Saturday, and is afforded to mail subscribers at $1.50 per year. We sincerely wish our Br. abundant success—the prosperity of well doing and the advancement of the great cause of evangelical truth.

NEW SABBATH SCHOOL CLASS BOOK. Mr. Tompkins has in press and will publish immediately, a Class Book on the Parables of our Lord, by Br. J. M. Austin. We have not seen any portion of the work, and know nothing of the plan pursued, and can only say we have no doubt of its being an excellent addition to our instruction books. We commend it to the attention of our friends.

☞ The first No. of the new volume will be published JULY FIRST, instead of June fifteenth, in order that the work may hereafter be issued on the first of each month. Look out for decided improvements. We want all prospectuses on which names are or may be placed, sent in during the month of June.

CLOSE OF VOLUME. This No. closes the tenth volume of the 'Universalist and Ladies' Repository,' and it becomes us to gratefully acknowledge the aid we have received in the literary department, and the degree of patronage extended to the work. This we do, while we ask for a continuance of the same, as essential to the existence and value of the work. We shall aim and labor to make it a better magazine than it has been, embracing a wider range of subjects, and possessing more to interest and instruct. We have always aimed and labored to do the best our means allowed, and we now rejoice, not selfishly, but socially, that our resources are more abundant, and that experience has taught us many wise lessons. We are determined to use more discrimination, and to judge more independently respecting what should be given to our readers. Our sensibilities are sometimes too severely excited in respect to writers, impelling us to consult their feelings, rather than the best good of our readers; but hereafter we hope to have stronger nerves—to obey more strictly our own convictions; and this we hope to do with proper respect and with a right sense of our obligations to those who intend us a favor. We ask for the countenance of those who desire the advancement of evangelical truth, and who are ready to acknowledge the usefulness of our work. We hope to make it an acceptable family Magazine, and to merit a repetition of the favorable opinions expressed towards it.

DISCONTINUANCES. Those of our subscribers who intend to relinquish their subscriptions, will please send word by the 15th of June, or they will be considered as subscribers for the next volume. Subscribers can send by the Post Masters free of any expense to us, and no subscriber should add expense of postage to the loss of his subscription. Let this be remembered, as our postage bill is a serious matter—augmented unjustly by the carelessness of many subscribers. We hope the additional attractions of the new volume will incline many to continue as patrons who have thought of leaving us. We need all our present subscribers, and great additions to give us the patronage needed to sustain the publication of the work and to encourage us in our labors.

Sisters in the faith! be zealous in our behalf, and remember the judicious hints given in the notice quoted from the 'Star of Bethlehem,' written by Mrs. Case.

AND NOW YE DELINQUENTS. What shall we say to you? What words of earnestness will move you and wake for us some feeling in reference to our wants and your own neglect? Arouse yourselves from an indifference that is criminal, and deal honest with those who have been faithful in endeavoring to send to you an acceptable and valuable work. Send on immediately—let there be no delay, and redeem your names from all suspicion. We wait for the needed incomings, and hope the best.

AGENTS. There are Agents of this publication from whom we are desirous of hearing, as their accounts remain in an unsettled state, and it is very important that attention be paid immediately to this matter. We trust that each one who has not yet sent in, will let us hear from him without delay.

We gratefully acknowledge our obligations to many faithful Agents, whose fidelity has been of very great service to us. We trust we shall always be able to present a work which shall interest them in its circulation, and keep them willing to labor as they can in our behalf.

TO CORRESPONDENTS. 'Thou art ever with me, love,' is a very pretty poem, but we must be excused from publishing the effusions of individual sentimentality, which only bring upon our devoted head the jeers of the generality of readers, who will not separate the editor's taste from the character of any articles. Writers should be careful not to talk too much of their own feelings and their great love for their own private and peculiar friends.

'Mossdale Cottage,' in our next.

We hope our correspondents will be liberal in their favors in the future, as we need their assistance and are very grateful for their kindness in the past. Let us still work together for the good of society and home.

A press of other matter and the Index, rendered it necessary to omit the page of Music prepared for this month, which we regret as much as any of our readers.

List of Letters containing Remittances received since our last, ending April 27, 1842.

LAKE GEORGE.

ILLUSTRATION.

WE present in this Number a beautiful picturesque view of Lake George, affording a well drawn sketch of some of its loveliest features. Though foreign tourists have often had the disposition of the Irishman who thought the snow in the Emerald Isle was 'a little whiter than in America,' yet they have been forced to dwell with poetic enthusiasm on the varied beauty of our noble lakes, and have always filled a good page with hearty descriptions. Visited in autumn when the mountains, woods, and shores are clothed in the gala dress of the year, an infinite variety of the beautiful is seen, from the gentlest and most exquisite, to the magnificent and sublime. The waters, sleeping in silvery smoothness, mirror the delicate and gorgeous colorings of the frost-painted trees and the richly crowned hills, and all the imagery of the many hued clouds, so that the whole forms a glorious scene to feast the lover of the artistical beauties of nature. And they are not wanting in historical associations to awaken the love of the past—to assist imagination in peopling the waters, and giving to them the animation of peaceful and warlike pursuits.

Lake George is one of the noble sheets of water, occupying the northern part of the great glen by means of which the Hudson pierces the mountain chain. It is south of Lake Champlain, which at Ticonderoga receives its waters by an outlet, which in the course of two miles sinks nearly two hundred feet. Its length is thirty-six miles, and its width varies from three quarters of a mile to four miles, thus presenting every variety in connection with the islands and shores. The transparency of the waters is remarkable, the clean gravelly bottom being frequently distinctly visible at a great depth, so that the floating visitor can easily imagine that the air and waters are one, where the shadows of the mountains do not darken them. A large number of small islands gem the Lake, the principal of which is called Diamond Island, and once contained a fortification. Near the southern extremity are the ruins of old Fort George, and near the southern shore are the remains of a fortification called Fort William Henry. The dreadful battles between the French and British during the years 1750 and 1760, were fought in this neighborhood, and there are many points of melancholy interest from the legends connected with them. The barbarities committed by the Indians connected with both armies were revolting in the extreme, and the very tragic death of Miss McCrea, will ever give a romantic interest to this region. Her story is well known—how she remained behind when her betrothed retreated with Burgoyne's army, and was sent for by him through a party of Indians, in whom he supposed he could confide. Some delay caused him to dispatch a second party, who met the first returning with the young and beautiful bride, and quarrelled about the reward promised. In the struggle Jane McCrea was killed—tomahawked and scalped. She was dressed in her bridal robes, as she was to be married immediately on her arrival at the camp. Captain Jones, the betrothed, did not long survive her, for the horrors of her death were more to him than the terrors of battle under any of the forms of war, and he died of a broken heart.

Lake George is a short day's ride from Saratoga, and a visit to it always makes a part of an excursion to that famous resort. Here and there are intervals of very fruitful cultivation, and then through a length of nearly fourteen miles we can sail between parallel ridges of craggy mountains, in beautiful contrast with the calm waters of the Lake. At times the shore recedes from the waters with a gentle acclivity for a few rods, and then, with a bold ascent, rises to an elevation from five hundred to fifteen hundred feet. The numerous islands relieve any monotony that otherwise might be felt from the extent and calmness of the waters, and their beauty makes up all desirable variety in the enchanting and romantic scenery of the Lake. Indeed, there is more to charm and interest in a lake like this, than in others of greater magnitude, because of the changes and contrasts by the intervention of islands and the unevenness of the shores, permitting the beholder to gain exquisite delight from viewing the waters pushing their way among the rocks, or winding round the roots of the towering trees, or playing with the base of the islands, or stealing far inland to invite out the songsters of the groves and give brighter greenness to the banks. These are in lively contrast with the smoothness of the wider parts of the Lake, which stretch out far in the distance. In this respect, the Narrows is a point of view always regarded as among the most beautiful pictures of the Lake; the mountains rise far up, with lofty peaks, in the distance, their base lined with foliage; while near by is one of the fairy isles with its wild and graceful beauty, reminding of the past and present lords of the waters, dividing the stream with elegance; and the shores on either side are rich in luxurious greenness. In the heat of this early summer day, it gives a delicious coolness to gaze on the beautiful sketch and let imagination loose. O for a sail in one of those fairy boats!

Wordsworth, in an essay on the scenery of the Lakes in the north of England, states that there once existed at Lucerne in Switzerland, 'a model of the Alpine country which encompasses the Lake of the four Cantons. The spectator ascended a little platform, and saw mountains, lakes, glaciers, rivers, woods, waterfalls, and valleys with their cottages, and every other object contained in them, lying at his feet; all things being represented in their appropriate colors. It may be easily conceived,' continues the poet, 'that this exhibition afforded an exquisite delight to the imagination, which was thus tempted to wander at will from valley to valley, from mountain to mountain, through the deepest recesses of the Alps. But it supplied also a more substantial pleasure; for the sublime and beautiful region with all its hidden treasures, and their bearings and relations to each other, was thereby comprehended and understood at once.' We wish that American ingenuity would give us something like this in reference to the region of our Lakes; and we should be delighted to present an effort at such a work, in words, from any of our correspondents. Let them make a balloon, rise to the right point, and tell us what they see. B.

HEAVENLY VISIONS OBEYED.

BY REV. HENRY BACON.

'I WAS not disobedient unto the heavenly vision.'

PAUL stood before Agrippa, making his defence against those who were his enemies, because of his faith in Jesus as Christ. He recounted the circumstances attending the mighty change that came over the spirit of his life; and while a deep enthusiasm of soul is manifest therein, there is also evidence that this enthusiasm had its springs not in hot and wild excitement, but in sober and thorough convictions. A power irresistible in its energy was felt, changing the whole current of his being, and giving him as warm and strong a zeal for Christ, as he once had against him. This change came over him, not in a dreamy hour of romance, of wild and pleasing thought that promised him fame and glory under the banner of the Cross,—but it came while his soul burned with inveterate enmity towards every one who named with reverence the name of Christ. His mind was doubtless filled with all the questions that made controversy between Jew and Christian, and the why and wherefore of the positions taken by each—for he was a learned man, schooled in the wisdom of his age, and possessed great reasoning powers. He had decided many times on the merits of the discussion, and fostered stronger and more strong his Jewish prejudices. His zeal was according to his perception of the Right; and his earnestness and sincerity must be commended, however, much his actions as Saul of Tarsus may be frowned upon. There is something to admire, if not to reverence, in bold and self-sacrificing enthusiasm towards what are deemed the best measures for social good, even though those measures may be unapproved by us. How the truth was made clearly manifest to him—how there ran through his mental being a changing power, transforming him inwardly into a disciple of him he had despised, we cannot tell. We cannot decide these questions any more than we can how it was that the 'I will—be thou clean!' of Jesus, made the blood of the leper course with a delicious coolness through his veins, telling him the leprosy had departed.

Conviction did come to Saul, changing the whole vital element of his mental being and throwing off the leprosy of Jewish error and corruption. He was a new man. An unshadowed moral sublimity was given to his enthusiasm. Worldly honors were nothing—human praise was of but little worth. Persecution and suffering were bravely borne, and wherever he went Jesus was his Master and the Cross his glory. After a life of devotedness, he died in the triumphs of the glorious faith he had so ably expounded and defended, and which he had declared to be 'unsearchable riches'—riches of love, riches of hope, riches of comfort, riches of everlasting glory.

Thus did he demonstrate his sincerity and prove the truth of his words;—'I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision.' A vision of Jesus Christ in the glory of his love and grace; a vision of the baseness of warring against him; a vision of absolute duty. He saw what Christ was—what he himself was—what he should be. 'Lord! what wilt thou have me to do?' was the language of his heart. The answer he obeyed. The moral glory of his life is unsurpassed in all the annals of the world since his time. O how much lofty thought has been kindled by exhibitions of his greatness—the greatness of entire devotion to the best good of the man and society. What Reformer has not felt his soul strengthened as he has thought of him? and who that has been persecuted for daring to utter honest convictions and to roll out the burning coals of thought on the flaxen bands of social wrong, has not exulted that God has made the soul mighty to withstand human malice in his fear? O Paul! thou art crowned with the golden crown of Righteousness, whose radiance grows not dim even in the noonday of human glory.

What Paul was, we should be. Devoted to working out the teachings of our heavenly visions—the visions that are vouchsafed to us in our hours of devotional thought, when the pinions of the spirit are strongest to fly upward and give to the eye of the soul glimpses of angel glory. Visions of what human love is—what the determined will can do—what the grace of God shall consummate. Visions that make us feel that we are not all earthly—that wrought with our mental being are aspirations which rise to heaven, and that we should live in view of a higher destiny than earth can grant—a destiny that teaches how much greater is the man, than the king, or the hero.

But first, let us pause and reverently acknowledge the worth of that capacity by which we are made capable of having heavenly visions—of transcending the sensual—of living in an ideal world full of types and symbols of the immortal. Were it not for this imaginative power, to what a small compass would ranging thought be confined! What forms of loveliness, what images of unutterable grandeur, what visions of the morally sublime, would vanish! The aged couple who sit out in the shade of the wide spreading tree they planted when their first vow went up to heaven, could not, as now they do, throw around each other the robes of youthful freshness and beauty—could not see the furrows departing, and the smooth cheek and fair brow again presented. Neither could again be visited the scenes hallowed by the whisperings of love, the utterance of earnest thought, the mutual prayer. Childhood's home would indeed be in ruins. It could not be brought out from the desolation—from the changes wrought by time or art, and again seen with all that made it the loveliest spot of earth. As there the patriarch and his companion sit, they could only see what others see. The forms that once met with them on the broad green, are there no more; nor, as they look up, is there an opening of the heavens, through which the eye penetrates to the verdant fields of unfading beauty, where roam the departed from earth, sandaled with immortality.

Without the picturing power of the Ideal, which we should learn more to value and rightly cultivate, the Mourner could not have her solitude made sweet by the return of the spirit form of the beloved. When in the still and solemn night she awakes to feel how lonely death has left her, the gloom of her soul can not be chased by the form that comes out from the darkness, with radiating light and youthful beauty; the holy countenance could not again be gazed upon, and the blessed smiles that were rays from a loving heart—the suffusing of sympathising amiability—would not come like sunshine to shaded flowers! 'Alone! alone!' would be the melancholy language of her sorrowing soul. Nor at the thoughtful hour of departing day, would the companionless sister gaze out upon the sympathising stars and feel to say to the departed—

'Even now thy dear remembered eyes,
Filled up with floods of radiant light,
Seem bending from the twilight skies,
Outshining all the stars of night;
And thy young face, divinely fair,
Like a bright cloud, seems melting through,
While low sweet whispers fill the air,
Making my own lips whisper too.'

This power to recall the departed—to fill up the desolated scene with the beauty of other days—to throng the canvas of the future with angel forms, is a power Religion bids us cultivate, and our own best happiness requires it. It is the power by which the glories of prophecy were brought before the inspired mind, and by which they may pass in review before our inward sight to bless and cheer us with heavenly visions. If we do not cultivate it, ours cannot be the faith that gives a present existence to things hoped for; nor when the loved lie down to sleep the sleep of death, can we see them awake as angels! As then we desire—and well we may—to have faith made a reality, let us value aright the poetry of thought—the inward sense that penetrates the visible—that sees the spiritual in the material, God in his works, eternity in time.

And wherefore, we should ask, is this capacity to receive heavenly visions granted to us? It is that we might feel our mingled nature—that amid the temptations that throng around us we might have present with us the glory of virtue, and that on earth we, like our Master as he talked with the Ruler at night, may feel ourselves in heaven. That oft to quicken our affections—to give more ardor to our devotion to duty, our friends may be transfigured before us; and that we may, as in a mirror, behold what we may become by fidelity to our spiritual instincts, even as did the primitive Christians as saith a good man,—'We all, with unveiled face, beholding, as in a glass, the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the spirit of the Lord.'

What are some of the heavenly visions granted to us, to the teachings of which we should not be disobedient? I trust, that in answering from experience, I do but utter a voice whose echo is in every heart.

1. I would treat of those visions given us of our friends at times, when we behold them clothed in a beauty we are not wont to recognize.

Behold that son, as in his chamber, far away from the parental home, he sits in thoughtful mood. He holds in his hands a present from his mother, sent by a visitor to the city. Last night, that youth was in the scenes of wild revelry and mirth, among vicious companions, who would train him to tread with them the paths of death. He feels the effects of the past night's revel, but a new pulse has been given by memory to his heart. There is a strange mingling in his eyes of the languor of dissipation and the suffusing moisture of affection. He loves his mother—for she has ever loved him; and now he is recalling her tokens of kindness—her expressions of tenderness, and is contrasting therewith what he has been to her—a forgetful, a wandering child. He feels her hand upon his head as when she blessed him; her arms are round his neck as when she plead of him to forget not her warnings; she looks upon him with the full gaze of maternal anxiety as when she sought to read in his face firm resolution and noble purpose. O never yet was there so much loveliness in that ever-lovely face—never did those eyes seem so full of tenderness—never were those lips wreathed with so much sweetness—never did such a holy radiance glow on every feature! His mother is transfigured before him—a form in which every dream of angel beauty is realized, and yet it has outstretched arms for him, and a melting voice to say—‘My son! my child!’ He shrinks before the presence of so much purity; but bury his face in his hands as he may, he cannot shut out the heavenly vision! Happy, happy will it be for him, if it follow him as he mingles again with the betraying world, that as oft as he returns to the thoughtful mood and brings again around him his father's home, he may rejoice to say—‘I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision!’

As with him, so is it with all of us. There are times when as we think of our chosen friends they appear before us as Jesus to his disciples on the mount, when ‘his face did shine as the sun and his garments were white as the light.’ However beautiful they may have seemed while we have daily mingled with them in the intercourse of life, at the season of holy thought when affection makes known her full power, they wear an aspect more heavenly—they seem embodiments of every excellence—their faults are all forgotten like the spots on the sun, and we marvel as we behold a loveliness never before recognized, or dreamt of. As we gaze on the excelling beauty, our hearts reproach us for past neglect—of bearing to our homes too much of the world's vexations and harshness—of not recognizing charms fairer than flowers, holier than the stars, and more essential to our daily happiness than much of what makes the outward pleasant. It is at such seasons that we feel, deeper than is our wont, what treasures we possess—what jewels of affection we are privileged to wear, and how inadequately we have appreciated them. And then come solemn whisperings that they may fade and be called for by Him who alone can brighten and re-set them. We shudder as we think of what may be; but even then they assume more attraction —the idea of loss awakens all the mind's energies to concentrate their illuminating power on the fancy portraits, till tears ease the aching fullness of the heart. I pity him who has never felt this extreme of emotion—who has no power to bring the absent before him in more than actual loveliness, as the blind always picture those devoted to them, regarding them as the loveliest of earth. He cannot have loved as man can love—as it is man's highest glory to love, and he must be deprived of hours of rapture known to those who rejoice in the visitations of these heavenly visions.

And wherefore do these visions come? They come to teach us the beautifying power of love—that

’Tis the heart that magnifies this life,
Making a truth and beauty of its own.’

They come to teach us to cherish more reverent feeling—to look deeper than the surface of every day life—to bear into the world the images of home, to be as an holy presence to keep us true to those virtues which alone are the safeguards of domestic peace, that we may bear back something else than the harshness and untuning effects of the jars of the busy sphere. They come to teach us to feel as the bereaved feels, when in the visions of night the departed returns, waking those intense feelings it would have been well for him to have cherished in time past, ere the face of the living had been changed for that of the dead. They come that we may recognize more of the divine in the human—that we may feel ourselves surrounded with the Infinite, and read of the beauty of God in all the loveliness of human love. They come to thee, O wandering child, that the voices of thy home may again be heard, and enter with all their pleading earnestness and winning sweetness into thy heart of hearts. They come to thee, O forgetter of the humanities of life, that thou mayst be recalled from the ways of the selfish, where thou hast gathered too many thorns to plant in the paths daily trod by those whose happiness should be thine. They come to thee, thou who art too much with the world, to bid thee turn from its gilded vanities, its wild idolatry, and live more for what abides in the quiet retreat, where the music of God's harmonies steals in upon the soul, and the passions are trained to become the friends of the graces.

Be it thy joy, thou to whom comest the vision of friends enveloped with beauty born in the soul in its affectionate moods, to say to Him who givest: ‘I was not disobedient to the heavenly vision.’

‘O cast thou not
Affection from thee! In this bitter world
Hold to thy heart that only treasure fast;
Watch—guard it—suffer not a breath to dim
The bright gem's purity.’

2. Another class of heavenly visions granted to us are those by which we see manifest the power—the reforming might of the determinate human will. We see every day, with our natural eye, what Sin can do; and as oft as we contrast man as he is, with the reflection of what he should be as shown in the Gospel, we shrink before the picture of what sin hath wrought—we feel indignant that our race should be so recreant to the trust committed to them, like him who buries in dust the splendid work of the artist on which is the impress of immortal genius. When we see the bands that bind, the weaknesses that cripple, and the passions that sway with mighty force, we feel the approach of the sickening influence of despair, and mourn the lot of humanity. But there come in those seasons of despondency, bright visions to cheer us, showing us from what depths of degradation man has risen, and to what lofty heights he has attained. We see before us those who have denied all alliance with a betraying and debasing sin—who make the time past of their lives suffice for service to the works of the flesh—and who, by the energy of a determinate Will, are moulding and fashioning themselves into the form and living beauty and glory of the true man. They come before us—we gaze with reverent eye—we listen to their speech with earnest attention—the deepest waters of the soul are moved—a halo of light seems to surround their head, and they grow before us into beauty attractive beyond aught in the material world. Lesson on lesson is read to us for our learning, and we feel that they come from authority—the authority of God speaking through the stern experience of a human spirit.

It is well that it should be so. For when a traveler comes before us from the ruins of Oriental cities, there is an interest immediately excited within us towards himself and his subject, which no mere description, though far more eloquent, can command. There is something entrancing in the thought that we are gazing on one whose eyes have seen and whose heart has felt all that is described—who has stood beneath the tall column and lofty portico, where the twining ivy is contending with the exquisite sculpturing of unsurpassed skill; we see him advance from thence, and contrast his shadow with that of the giant pillar; with him we visit ruined hall and tower, listen to the sighing stream and the break of the surging sea, and filled with lofty thoughts, we re-animate the deserted city, and restore the works of the skillful sons of Art. Many a vision—earthly vision—comes before us, and with many a wise lesson too—lessons that tell us of changing time, of how the fashion of this world passeth away, and that we should learn the arts of eternity. But are not feelings and emotions of a holier sublimity awakened when one comes before us from the ruins of humanity? He can tell us of more awful ruins than time and the influences of the natural world can make, and teach us that it is indeed true—

‘That one lost mind,
Whose star is quenched, hath lessons for mankind

Of deeper import than each prostrate dome,
Mingling its marble with the dust of Rome.’

And when we see such a mind restored, and hear of the struggling laboring of the invincible will, do we not have a heavenly vision of the might of determinate mind, strong in the strength of goodness, and victorious through grace from on high? Should we not gaze with reverence, and feel that we are beholding a greater than the work of king Hezekiah, who had only to deal with materiality when he purified the temple. And know ye not that ye are the temple of God? O be not disobedient to the vision that speaks of the inner glory, too much obscured by earthliness, but work with energy of heart to purify and re-consecrate it to Him who is the Spirit thereof.

3. Another class of heavenly visions are given to us by reflection on what christian benevolence and philanthropy are doing in the social world. In the efforts put forth by human goodness in behalf of the Reforms of the age, we recognize the presence of a noble sympathy—we familiarize ourselves with its influence and effects. We see how it would mould and fashion the social elements—how it would elevate the masses—how it would bring out into clear mental sunlight the eternal principles of Right—how it would bring every thing that now receives respect to an unalterable standard and test—and shows it has faith in the Millennium by devotion to the means that alone, under God, can produce it. We take our position on the high mount of meditation. The great world lies beneath, in brightness and shadows, and we gaze on the mighty scene. We behold the Apostles of the Right and the Good mingling amid the contending and active throngs. The masses seem to heed them. The haunts of vice are forsaken, the retreats of avarice and fraud are deserted, the tables of the money changers in the temple are thrown down, and the traps of deceit are deprived of all their springs. The stern man begins to smile, the cruel to be kind, the hard hearted to weep, the penurious to be generous, and the powerful to be magnanimous. The prisons are changed into places of attractive industry, the insignia of pride vanish, the drama of master and slave is no more enacted, and nought destroys or mars the song of a happy world, active in harmony with heaven’s law of order.

The vision is beautiful! It comes in blessed hours of hope to him who has shed bitter tears over the evils to which his race is subject—who knows what they have to contend with—who blames not humanity so much as he pities—who worships the martyr spirit of the true Reformer. It comes to cheer him—to take the stone from off the sepulchre of his hopes, that the Christ of the Regeneration may come forth in all his resurrection glory. It comes to give him trust in God and faith in man; to bid him pray and plead and sing; to encourage him to struggle on, nor faint, nor murmur, but day after day to labor and seek God's blessing thereon. It came to Moses, Jesus, Paul, Luther, Washington, Oberlin, Murray, and each and all of 'the sacramental host of God's elect,' who stood against the might of error, stern and strong as the long line of rocky sentinels that fence our coast against the sea. Aye, more than that—they stood like Moses stretching out his rod over the sea, making it obey the divine mandate to open a way for the oppressed, and then turning it back for the destruction of that which had oppressed.

And what does the heavenly vision teach us? It teaches us not to spend our time in mere dreaming, or waste our strength in fancy sketching; but to arouse ourselves to work—to triumph over the sin that doth most easily beset us—the resting on good intentions. The poetry of benevolence—the romance of reform, are good enough to please for a season, but they are useless if they do not excite to strong thought and deep feeling that will not let us rest without laboring to work out the pictures of the soul—as the artist in whose soul is perceived a glorious design, or the poet to whom an inspiration has come to lift up his whole being, cannot rest till the pencil, or the pen, is grasped. Work, O man! work! is the command. Work with all thy might—for God and humanity work!

'Generous faith hath power

By her prevailing spirit, e'en yet to work
Deliverances, whose tale shall live with those Of the great elder time. Be of good heart!
Who is forsaken? he that gives the thought
A place within his breast. 'Tis not for you.'

When we gaze on the visions—the heavenly visions of human love, we are to rise higher than man—to the Source of all that burns and glows in the philanthropic soul, giving it a quenchless ardor. God, and not man, is the Reforming Spirit. The circling chain reaches, link after link, to the throne of the Eternal, and when he pleases, he moves the cloud at his feet, and the electricity of his power leaps from link to link, communicating a vivifying energy to millions of souls. And thus, in every division of habitable space, there is a struggling for right and truth, and God is there. O human love is beautiful, as, with a holy and generous faith, it struggles to redeem the sinful—as the mother tells her erring son of one home—her heart; or as the faithful wife or sister, with softest accents of tenderness, reminds the wanderer that one pillow shall always be ready to rest his head, where he may hear one heart that has not ceased to beat for him. And shall visions of unshaken and undying love in human beings come before me, without my recognizing in them the teachings of God's eternal love? Humanity loves while life on earth lasts. The devoted dies with a prayer and a blessing on her lips for him who hath no mercy on himself. What is the Resurrection, if this love be not immortal? If it passes away, there must be darkness in heaven. But no! it lives, and its life is the breathing of Jehovah's love. Come visions of noble philanthropy! stay before the eye of the soul, more pleasant than summer's richest scene—more grand than the most entrancing autumn sunset pageant. Let me confess the presence of my God—the God of light and love!

4. The heavenly visions of eternity given by our holy faith, must be confessed as the most beautiful that ever enter 'the spirit's pictured halls.' How often is it said concerning certain classes of sinners—'Imagination dares not follow them to the eternal world.' And why? because visions of horror—hellish visions—will come before the gaze of the ideal, overwhelming to sensibility and torturing to the best affections. Aye, we are told that good men—men whose lives have been one bright day of piety, stagger under the weight of oppressing thought when they think upon this subject. And well they may. Yet why? Is there no God in eternity? lives there no Divine love? is redemption only on the earth? Whence hath Jesus gone—where is his mediatorial throne—where doth he plead—where is he touched with a feeling for our infirmities? In our Father's house there are many mansions—in the universe there are many spheres of being or existence. God reigns in all. Wherever he reigns there must be hope. The wings of thought can bear the imagination to no part of the Universe where God ceases to be light, if thought be the bird of truth and love. We know it to be so. Know it! by the everlasting voice of sympathy in the soul—by the ten thousand echos of the truth that God is unchangable—by the divinity of those visions that fill every void of the heart and satisfy every aspiration of the soul.

Such was the glorious vision arrayed before the prophet when he exultingly declared that the face of the covering cast over all people, and the vail that is spread over all nations, shall be destroyed. The Lord of hosts will swallow up death in victory; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces; and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth: for the Lord hath spoken it.' Let men by learned sophisms if they will, lessen the extensiveness of this enrapturing prophecy; and what will they do? They lessen the grandeur and sublimity of all visions of eternity; they grant existence there to infinitely greater evils than here exist, oppressing the soul with mountain mysteries, as they teach that the inequalities of this life will be rectified by eternal inequalities. God pity them. God be praised that ours is not so darkening a faith as theirs, and that not simply in a few moments of rapture, but continuously, we can sing:

'His own soft hand shall wipe the tears
From every weeping eye,
And pains and groans, and griefs and fears,
And death itself shall die.'

The reality we cannot but wish to be hastened and therefore we exultingly exclaim :

'How long, dear Savior, O how long
Shall this blest hour delay?
Fly swifter round, ye wheels of time,
And bring the welcome day.'

He who sees that vision and leagues himself with sin, is indeed disobedient. Disobedient to the most glorious revelation of the beauty and joy of holiness. Blessedness is but another term for sanctification, and sanctification is only to be gained by practical and habitual obedience to the truth as it is in Jesus.

What then is the great moral of our theme? It is, that to the believer is given the highest elevation of thought and feeling—the grandest range for meditation and the sublimest flights of poetry. He has an indescribable advantage over the unbeliever. He is like a traveler who has ascended an Alpine height—step after step, leap after leap, cliff upon cliff, till he stands on the lofty pinnacle of rock, drinking in the air of a stronger life, while he seems but a moat in the air to those who are below. Grandeur and beauty, in endless variety, are around him on every side; indeed, all is lovely seen from his lofty point of view. But he cannot bend down and reach to the travelers in the valleys below, and lift them up. Neither can he give them any adequate conception of what he is privileged to behold. He cannot give them his consciousness—he can construct no bridge by which his thoughts and emotions may pass to their minds, however great may be the toll which they are willing to pay. They must labor as he has labored. Step after step they must take, pressing on, not heeding the sharp stones and the briars that sometimes wound and vex them, but keeping the will fixed and the full strength of the body active. Thus, and thus only, can they arrive at the heights on which the christian stands, and see and rejoice in the sublimities he beholds and in which he rejoices. Thus, and thus only, can they know the advantage which the believer has over the unbeliever, and be led rightly to estimate the nature God has bestowed upon them.

Reader! Let us be wise unto that which is good, using the abundant means which our Spiritual Father hath furnished for our improvement in the graces of christian virtue, that whenever his spirit draws near to question our faithfulness, we each may be able to say: 'I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision.'

ORIGINALITY AND GENIUS. As our work is intended to be composed of articles written expressly for it, we would in a friendly way just throw out the hint, that true Originality and Genius can only be attained by deep study with the affections, and a constant converse with the moving universe around us. ## SAILOR'S SONG.

BY IONE.

FAREWELL to the tame green shore!
And a merry song as the snowy sheet
Springs forward the breeze or the gale to meet;
And the anchor lies like a sleeping thing,
Or a bird at rest on its weary wing!
And the timbers creak at the rude caress
Of the dancing waves in their mirthfulness!
And we sleep, not still as the landsmen rest,
But rocked on a smooth and yielding breast!

Far over the ocean's floor,
As we move like a courser fleet and strong,
And list to the wild and wondrous song,
Which steals from the ocean's sparry caves,
Where the sea-nymph still in her beauty laves!
We seek through the clear, green depths below
To note the source of its music low!
There are harps beneath which we fain would see,
And the minstrel hand that hath touched the key!

Hark, hark, to the midnight storm!
It comes in its sable garments rolled,
But a mighty arm hath its strength controlled!
It sighs like a half repentant thing,
And passes away on its broken wing!
And the stars look down on the restless deep,
Till its crested waves in their beauty sleep!
And the sailor's eye with a glance above
Is bright with the kindling fires of love!

'PICTORIAL ILLUSTRATIONS.' No. III.

BY MISS M. A. DODD.

'Look Fanny, see how it snows! The air is filled with the feathery particles which, though they seem so light and evanescent, and descend so softly and so silently, yet cause an almost magic change in the whole appearance of nature; for it seems as though the angel of death had come down during the night watches, and covered the ground with a shroud, and spread a white pall over the mountains. It has a bleak look, and a beautiful, and sometimes I love to see the snow; but not now, no, not now! for I am far from my own home, and I shudder to think of the long miles which must be passed over to reach it, and the way made dreary and uncomfortable by this early snow. Poor E., too is out in this gloomy storm. I wish we had not let him go to W. What an unpleasant time he will have, and perhaps get sick from being so exposed. And here is an end to all our out of door amusements. No more rambles by the river side; no more excursions to the mountains; no more sketching and no more rides, for us; oh dear! oh dear! We must be shut up now with our books and knitting-work, and leave the pleasant sunshine to gather around the heated stove. How I do hate stoves!"

"This from you, cousin Mary! I thought you never quarrelled with the "clerk of the weather," and that your equanimity was storm proof; but I see the most even temper is subject to flaws, and I must take the liberty to laugh at your impatient words, and your rueful countenance. Why, I really thought you would be in ecstasies when you first saw our mountains and valleys in their bridal garments, our streams hushed to stillness, and our forests in their feathery and graceful drapery; but there is no accounting for tastes, as the saying is, and no calculating upon the changing moods of our friends, I take it. If you had been accustomed to seeing deep, deep snow, lying all around you, for three or four months in every year, you would not think so much of this. I will not attempt to point out the beauties of the scene to you; for one who professes to handle the pen and the pencil should have an eye to see for herself; but I may call you to consider the utility of this provision of providence. Sanced, invoked a blessing on the inventor of sleep, because it covered one all over like a blanket; and all the green things which gladden our eyes in the summer time, I am sure follow his example, and bless the inventor of snow, which is the blanket that hides them from the sharp winds, and from the step of Death, who is searching for them through the weary winter. Do not "borrow trouble" in anticipating the difficulties of our journey towards the South, for perhaps we may have fair weather then; and you need not fret about poor E., as you call him; for you know he is well guarded against the cold, with his over coat and buffaloe, his fur cap and gloves, his "Canada overalls," and his warm heart which is better than all; for that will lead him fearlessly and cheerfully, to encounter the snow and wind through a long day's journey, that he may save us from the disappointment of not seeing him back to night. I dare say you will be the first to praise him for perseverance in accomplishing his object, and he will answer, with his usual readiness of speech, that your approbation is his exceeding great reward. But from what arises your sudden spite against stoves? I am sure they are very comfortable articles in the winter season, we could hardly live without them; and I believe you sometimes use them at home. Come cousin, bid the clouds vanish from your face, I long to see its serenity restored. Let us have sunshine within doors, if we cannot without. There, your countenance is beginning to brighten, and you will soon acknowledge it is better to be merry than to grieve. It would not take much to set you a laughing now, and "Moll," I do love to hear you laugh."

"Well then, laugh I will, at you, and your sermon, if you have done preaching; for I have not heard such a homily since Sunday, and I hope you have notes of the discourse, for I must get a copy to keep me from ever looking cross again. But to be serious dear

Fanny, I thank you for your gentle admonitions, and regret having allowed myself to indulge in such a petulant mood of mind; but it is all owing to a violent attack of "the blues;" and besides, I cannot bear to see our pleasant mountain walks buried in the snow, and to be shut up here like a caged bird, when I so long for wings to bear me through the free air to the lofty mountain tops. Pray, what is that you are humming? oh, I remember the words of that old song.

"Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage;
Minds innocent and quiet take,
That for an heritage."

Well, I deserve the rebuke, and now if you will play and sing "By gone Hours," I think it will have a soothing effect.'

"Thank you cousin, your voice operates like a charm, and those sweet words too, how I love to hear them.

"'Tis sad, 'tis sad to think upon
The joyous days of old;
When every year that wearies on,
Is numbered by some friendship gone,
Some kindly heart grown cold:
Could those days but come again,
With their thorns and flowers,
I would give the hopes of years,
For those by gone hours."

O, Fanny! what a mighty power hath music over the mind! Surely, it had its "birth in heaven" when "the morning stars sang together;" and when we enter that better land, how will our rapt souls be ravished and exalted with its divine harmonies! Will my voice, now so tuneless, then give utterance to the melody in my heart? Shall I too, be permitted to sing thy praise, O God, my strength, and my Redeemer?"

"Shut the piano now, cousin, and let us see what A. is so busy about, here in the corner. Why it's a picture upon my word! I am completely outdone, I shall give up the pencil and stick to the pen in future. This is a parting scene, the sailor's farewell. How his poor wife clings to him, while his messmate sits waiting in the boat to convey him to the gallant ship, which is seen in the distance, beyond the lighthouse and the rocks. This is tolerably well done for a new beginner; but the waves around the boat are a little too rough, and the poor sailor's arm is out of joint somewhere near the shoulder; you must try again. If you like water scenes, I wish you had been with us when we rode along the bank of the river, the other day, after the sleet storm. It had not cleared away at all, but you know E., said he was my physician, and must prescribe a ride for my health; and I was glad of an excuse to get out of doors, though somewhat afraid of the ice; but his trusty rosinante is sure footed, as well as swift, and we had quite a pleasant drive, though the weather was so uninviting. The White River, was not white then, I never saw water look so gray and leaden, and yet so perfectly still and clear; for every tree, and shrub, in its icy vesture, and the dun clouds which veiled the sky, were all faithfully reflected in that deep gray mirror; and it seemed strange to me that running water should present an appearance of such perfect rest. The scene was dreary and its stillness unbroken, whether we looked along the deserted road, or down into the leaden waters, or up to the wild mountains and the gloomy sky; and it seemed as though the desolation of the coming winter was shadowed forth in every thing around. Such a scene would strike the painter's eye, as one exactly adapted to contrast with the life, the brightness and the joy of summer; but I think it would be difficult to convey that picture of dreariness to the canvass. How different it was from the variegated scenery which charmed our eyes on that sunny day when we rode for miles along that same river; when the sky was so blue, the air so soft and mild, and the trees in the first flush of their autumn glory; ere the continued frosts had changed their leaves to brownness, or the cold winds brought them to the ground. How gorgeous was the spectacle! The near and distant mountains, draped to their very summits with standards of purple, and banners of green and gold, inlaced with all the rainbow's brilliant hues, now flashing like sunshine, and now gleaming like blood red flame! O, I never saw anything so enchanting, so lovely; and my heart was oppressed, almost to aching, with an overpowering sense of transcendent beauty. Our poets, and painters, need never wander from their own land in search of inspiring themes, till their genius and art are exhausted in attempting to picture forth the glories of our Autumn woods.

Ah Fanny, how pleasantly and swiftly the hours have flown away, for the day is almost over which I thought would be so tedious, and I have forgotten to watch the falling snow flakes. 'Minds innocent and quiet,' need not depend for happiness upon outward things, for they can find something to cheer them in the most gloomy weather; and now, if I wished to paint, or describe a scene of true enjoyment, I would have a stormy, winter day without, and a cheerful fire within, surrounded by smiling and contented faces.

Dear cousin, this is but one of the sweet seasons I have passed with you in your happy home! The time is now drawing near when we must both leave it, perhaps to return here no more; but we shall bear away with us the memory of these peaceful hours, and perhaps look back to them in after years, as sunny spots where we paused from the turmoil of life and rested together; for "are not those ever the brightest periods of our existence which are marked by no strongly exciting incidents, and of which we only remember, when they are gone, that they glided quietly away from us, in the blest companionship of those we love?"

THE ALMOND BRANCH.

[Translated from the French of De Lamartine.]

BY MRS. J. R. SPOONER.

THOU art alas! but beauty's emblem,
Blooming branch of the almond tree,
Fading away on thy parent stem,
The flower of life is seen in thee.

It heedeth not neglect or care,
It waiteth not on summer's ray—
Leaf after leaf thus withering there,
Shows forth our pleasures day by day.

Though short, O let us prize delight,
Contend it with the zephyr's breath,
And drain its chalice ere the night
Approach, and warn us of its death.

Often doth beauty in its pride,
Remind us of the morning flower,
Wreathing the fair brow of the bride,
And fading ere the festive hour.

One day is past, yet others come,
But Spring is hastening to depart,
And every flower it calls to bloom,
Cries 'hasten' to the human heart.

SKETCHES FROM THE MEMORY. NO. I.

BY REV. T. P. ABELL.

'AND snatch the faithless fugitives to light.' ROGERS.

THE LATE RETURN.

'—PUT the senses' curtain back,
And on the wakeful soul look in.'

I.

'O WHAT a lovely residence!' exclaimed a very agreeable travelling acquaintance, as the stage coach wound round the base of a hill and came in view of a low white cottage house, in front of which there seemed to be a very highly cultivated flower garden in the noonday of its richest bloom, and which was otherwise immediately surrounded by the most luxuriant and imposing wildwood. The eye had but little more than caught a glimpse of the loveliness before us, ere the stage stopped at the gateway. The coachman flung his heavy whip upon the top of the vehicle, and in an instant more the door opened, and the steps were unfolded. Here I took leave of the passengers, and alighted. Again the stage passed on, and I saw its side thickened with the faces of its occupants who were gazing upon the cottage and its embosoming scenery, which, in a moment more, was shut out from their view. So do the beautiful things of earth flash upon the vision of the mortal traveler as he is hurried through this busy and evanescent life!

Far back to the unclouded days of childhood did fancy wander. Of those whom I supposed were dwellers in the cottage, I had the most indistinct recollections, save of one—a dark-eyed, and most beautiful girl. Of equal ages, and residing near to each other, we were companions in school, and participants in many a scene of childish glee. Say what we will of the exquisiteness of after delights, when the heart knows how to appreciate and enjoy, and say what we will also of time, distance, change,—the free, glad hours of childhood are the brightest and the most imperishable treasures in the urn of Memory.

Passing up the broad path leading toward the house, I was met by a matronly lady on whose brow were furrowed the marks of many years and much anxiety; but whose mild expressive countenance and graceful dignity of bearing, at once excited admiration and an earnest and compassionate interest in her behalf. The self-introduction being over, and tendering many warm assurances of welcome, she informed me that her daughter, whom it was possible I might remember, had latterly suffered greatly from ill-health; and that, having in their retirement but few neighbors and few visitors, and as it might relieve the monotony of the sick room, if I were to pass a few days in their society, I was urged to remain so long as the stay would be consistent with my duties or desires.

II.

Alone!—as the sweet Quakeress, Mary Howitt, sings it—'all, all alone!' The mother stepped to the invalid's room to inform her of my arrival. Hundreds of miles distant from the unforgotten haunts of childhood,—distant, too, on the highway of life, by more than a score of years, from that hallowed spring-time season, scenes the most vivid and inviting claimed the tribute of passing thoughts. Shadowy and fragmentary visions, clothed in hues of transcendent romance, rose up before the imagination,—many a dream was dreamed again, and the heart, all withered and shrivelled by the storms of life, was half cheated into the belief that it was young again! We smile at, and pardon, the monomaniacal fancy-freaks of the old man who, trembling upon his oaken staff, persuades himself that he is in the heyday of youthful being, and that he is verily walking forth with, and leaning upon the arm of his dearly beloved! But he who, in the full years of life, with the ripe realities of manhood about him, shall so far forget the matter-of-fact soberness of daily duty, as to indulge a moment in commune with the associations of his most innocent and happiest days, is thenceforth a scoffer at the great objects of human existence, and is fit only to live in the atmosphere of the supremest sentimentality.

'Ah,' I mentally exclaimed, 'is it to err, to care, to grieve, that we are awakened from our first fresh dreams? Is it for the thorn and thistle of what a hard faced world names duty, that we are called away from the bowers of childhood? Is it that the heart may be seared over by its conflicts with temptation, sin, wo? Is it to find hope a mocker, and human trust a name, and the gossamer bubbles of ambition as empty as the vanity that pursues them? Is it that——'

I was interrupted.

'The door on the left, at the end of the hall,' said the lady, 'leads to my daughter's room. You will find her there, and she will be pleased to meet her friend.'

And there she was, in her early womanhood, in her triumphant patience, in her undeparted beauty. The native rose had indeed faded on her cheek, but a crimson flush was there, which was less beautiful only as it indicated the disease which nourished it. There were the same dark, dreamy, and yet sparkling eyes, through which at once spoke the brilliancy of the intellect and the goodness of the heart. The lids, with their long lashes, now and then drooped over them, like the falling fold of a cloud upon the sun's disk, and after the passing, 'there was light.' The ringlets of her raven hair, escaping from their gentle entanglements, fell upon the ivory whiteness of her neck, like the wing of 'some dark, beauteous bird,' shining upon the drifted snow! Her whole features were most exquisitely moulded; and they wore that unconquerable expression of calm and cheerful composure which angels, could they suffer, might well envy. And there she was—ADELIA still!

Raising her head from the pillow as I approached, and extending her hand, she bade me welcome with a smile that, under other circumstances, would dangerously soften the most immovable heart. Though she had long been the marked victim of a slow but fatal malady, and had wasted by degrees under its influence, she was nevertheless able to converse freely, and for some little length of time, without suffering much weariness.

III.

'I know not,' said Adelia, a day or too after my arrival, 'I know not whether I should have recognized you as my old playmate—your personal characteristics are not, I think, such as I should have anticipated, had I been allowed to conjecture,—and yet on second thought, I am quite well persuaded that such a recognition had not been impossible. Are there not what may be called the divine instincts, by which soul reveals itself to soul, and which, in their action, constitute the divinity of friendship, and especially of all higher affection; and which may also be the true medium of re-assuring us of the identity of friends?

So I have thought. Nor can I believe it a mere sick bed fancy. So to believe, must be, I am sure, at least an innocent error. I wish for something more indubitable than the affirmations of sense.'

'But why,' I inquired, 'should more be needed? If those affirmations will not convince us, will not other evidence fail also, inasmuch as it must be less palpable,—perhaps therefore less comprehensible?'

'I am not,' she rejoined, 'disposed to be very logical, nor am I very incredulous in regard to the evidence bearing, as I imagine, in favor of what I wish to believe. What I most desire on this subject is the conviction that there are true spiritual sympathies or impulses which not only draw friends to friends, but make them known to each other. The remembered tone, the speaking eye, not only satisfy as to the possessor of them, but they each bring an added joy to the pleasure of the mere personal recognition, and we somehow congratulate ourselves that we have been true to the past. I were content with this, so far as it pertains to earthly associations and recollections. But Thought—Aspiration—Benevolence—will not pause here. Earth is not our all. But here we leave the earthly. What we now call sense cannot aid us in the True Life, where the Imperfect shall be done away. I would fain believe that when, on the Far Shore, I meet those with whom I have held holy commune here, soul will respond to soul in the fond ardor of a recollected companionship; and that then those imperishable instincts, which here gave even faint demonstrations of our real claim to a divine vital principle, will be obstructed no longer by the imperfections of mortality, allowed so to operate as to preserve the identity of our chosen affections, while the great and universal harmony of hearts be none the less unbroken. And why should they not? I know that I am weak, and it may be that I am inordinately selfish. But I desire this faith in the future recognition of friends. I find in it comfort, and even support, as I lie here, as it were, beneath the very shadow of the great Devourer.'

IV.

I took occasion, while Adelia was sunk in one of those states of light sleep which her system so much required, and which, I had noticed, were becoming more frequent, to visit the garden grounds, and to wander awhile in the neighboring woodlands. Nothing could be more romantic than the locality of the place. Opposite of the house, there towered up one of the lofty peaks of a high range of hills which, though they greatly limited the prospect in that direction, were of themselves noble objects on which to feast the eye, as they were thickly covered with evergreen trees of the most magnificent growth and beauty. The view from either side was more extensive, and not less pleasing. In the rear arose another hill, around the foot of which, passing along near to the cottage, ran a sparkling rivulet, whose murmuring waters 'kept up an healthful music.' Returning from my ramble, and passing through some of the winding walks, and among the curved and nicely arranged flower-beds in front of the house, I could not fail to perceive that great care and taste had been lavished upon the garden; but it was also evident that the favorite fostering hand was now withdrawn from it. It was nevertheless a lovely place,—meet for sweet and holy contemplations.

'Your voiceless lips, O flowers, are living preachers;
Each cup a pulpit,—each leaf a book,
Supplying to my fancy numerous teachers,
From lowliest nook.'

' . . . Amid solitude and shade, I wander
Through the green isles, and stretched upon the sod,
Awed by the silence, reverently ponder
The ways of God.'

V.

'Do you find anything,' inquired Adelia, as I revisited her room, 'in our wild retreat, which pleases you? We are here far away from the thronged marts of business,—fashion does not intrude with her ribands and filagree,—we have not even the usual interchanges of country socialities; but even here, to my fancy,

"The world's unwithered countenance Is bright as at creation's day;"

and I have felt that I had gained much in exchanging the theatre of a gayer and more effeminate life, for the spirit-soothing shades of our Glen. I have here found the true school for the cultivation of the nobler sensibilities of our strange nature, while I have been freed from exposure to the arts and hypocrisies which custom, and interest, and mis-named etiquette, demand. The zephyr, the brook, the bird, still the tumults of inward feeling by their inimitable melodies. Nature preacheth sublime lessons, if we will but hear and believe. And the soul

" . . . . . that can receive
And hold in its unlimited embrace
All things inanimate, and all that live," is the soul which heedeth these lessons, and which nature blesseth.'

'But, Adelia, do you not think we often speak enthusiastically of Nature, without at all comprehending its beautiful affinities, or appreciating its spiritualizing influences?'

'That there is in some,' she replied, 'a passion for romance or poetic extravagance, which is to the possessors, as undefinable as it is imbecile and useless, I allow. But we are not to generalize this characteristic, and impute it to the multitude. I am persuaded that the simple and unlearned know more of nature than the wiser suppose. To me, though I but dimly apprehend its beauties, and may often wrongly interpret its teachings, it is a benignant friend. From its responsive bosom I gather the truest sympathies. As the great Anointed was the moral, so is this the physical display of the attributes of the Eternal. Gilded with the smile of the Creative Spirit—lightened up forevermore with the beams of his mercy, its great utterance to the human soul is, to trust, to love, to adore.

'But,' she added, after a few moments' pause, while her whole countenance seemed to speak the enthusiasm of pious hope,—'but I find, after all, my purest treasure in the Better Revelation. This,' she exclaimed, as she held up a small Testament, which I had not before noticed, 'this is my chart and councillor—my creed and true confessional. Now that I can look back unregrettingly upon the rainbow-hued vacuities of the gayest season in life,—now that I can turn and gaze with an untrembling pulse upon the fast-approaching mysteries of death, and the mysteries of the life beyond it, I affirm that there is no blessing inherited by earth's pilgrims so inestimable as this. It is here'—and she pressed the little book to her lips—'that God vouchsafes the pledged assurance of the unalterable benignancy of his nature, that I know that "my Redeemer liveth,"—lives to cheer and support by the ministries of his truth,—lives to break up the dim dominion of the tomb,—lives to pluck the sting from death!'

'My daughter!' interposed the mother, who had entered the room unperceived by the invalid, 'I fear you are talking too much. Be calm now, and rest awhile.'

Exhausted by the effort she had made, Adelia was in a few moments wrapt in quiet slumber. O sleep! thou art ever the friend of the weak, and the weary-hearted; and thy visitations, still as the rush of an angel's wing, bring a healing panacea to the heart and the frame of man.

VI.

On entering her apartment on the following day, I noticed that her countenance wore a paler cast, and more languid expression, which were evidently the effect of yesterday's excitement. It is saddening to stand by the sick bed and watch the progress of disease,—to see, day after day, the strugglings of the spirit in its crumbling tenement, as it prepares to take its final flight. Habit may familiarize the scene, but yet the hastening decay,—the fearful and agonized grapple between nature and disease, and the solemnities of the death-hour, when the cold damps gather upon the once fair brow, and a livid ghastliness spreads itself over the whole features and mocks us with its likeness to life,—these are certainties which throw heavy shadows upon the live heart, and awaken within it emotions unutterably solemn. But a beautiful moral grandeur is there,—there by the invalid couch,—when the light and glory of faith fall around the scene of mortal conflict—when the advances of the terror-king strike no terror home upon the victorious heart—when, forgetful of the anguished body, more than which death cannot claim, the earth-weaned thoughts go forth and take their indestructible hold upon the Rock of Ages! Thus to die is gain, is glory.

VII.

'I fear,' said Adelia one day after we had been awhile conversing of earlier and happier days, and she had in the mean time been evidently failing, 'I fear the pleasure we experience in meeting our friends, is often very greatly lessened by a more vivid recollection of our sufferings during the intervening period of separation.'

Having been anxious to learn something of the history of her heart from her own lips, since I was well assured that the recital would embrace much, aside from the fact of our former acquaintance, that would interest me, I availed myself of this moment to intimate such a desire.

'I cannot tell you much,' she replied, 'but as you are now, save my mother, the only friend with whom I may converse, and as it not impossible that you may, in the course of life's mysterious changes, meet with one who, though far and long absent, is yet ever present with me'—and she placed in my hand a miniature,—'and as you will, should you meet, bear to him a message from one I know he will remember, I will endeavor to gratify you in part. But I have not strength sufficient to indulge much in particulars, nor would you care to have me do so. Mine is a simple story, with few incidents and little romance, unless it be the romance of suffering; but I will not trouble you with much of this. This is said to be woman's peculiar lot, and the more uncomplainingly she bears it, the more truly will she have fulfilled her high mission.' Pausing for a few moments, as I supposed, to collect her thoughts, she immediately fell into a slumber which was so gentle, so still, so solemn, that I almost felt myself alone with death!

VIII.

'O that dream!' exclaimed Adelia, with a smile, as she awoke after an hour's repose. 'It was bright and beautiful, and therefore it is the less likely to be realized. I thought he was already here, and that he talked, not of the pall, but of the bridal veil. But in our dreams, we are greatly addicted to substituting fancies for facts. And yet what is life, our great life, but a dream,—glorious now, and gloomy anon,—but a dream nevertheless? And what is death, dread, gaunt death, but the sudden awakening of the spirit-being, with the difference that the after realities are far more glorious than the obscured imaginings in their brightest phases? A fitful dream is life!'

'I will now tell you,' she resumed again, 'if you will listen, in a few words, what I have to say of myself. My father, you will remember, removed to the city of

—, where he was fortunate in the accumulations of wealth, far beyond his anticipated success. He maintained his respectability, in a measure, by those outward displays which the wealthier generally are not apt to forget. His steeds were as noble, his equipages as splendid, as those of his equally independent neighbors. He was religious, in the popular sense, as he was in formal connection with one of the first churches in the city. But his religion was principally in the care of the minister, excepting whenever an opportunity occurred for him to demonstrate his opposition to spiritual innovations. Heresy was a name for which he had no charity or forgiveness.

'The only child, and of course the idol of my parents, I was allowed every reasonable indulgence. With my education no cost or pains were spared; and my progress was pronounced truly gratifying to my friends. For several years I was happy in my studies and amusements; and to my vision life, in the prospective, could not well have been otherwise than alluring. But I by and by became acquainted, though I confess I was still young for the forming of such an acquaintance,—with a young gentleman of some few years in advance of myself, but who was possessed of every requisite to recommend him to my imagination, as well also as to my heart. The acquaintance, encouraged by his family and my own, soon ripened into friendship,—friendship soon became love, and

" . . . love, true alchemist, turned all to gold,"

or, filled life with unalloyed sweets. After some three years, during which time we had ever met in the bliss and confidence of the holiest love, my father ascertained, by the aid, I believe, of his spiritual guide, that Charles Wilton,—remember the name,—had publicly exhibited some religious preferences which were far from according with the popular judgment, and which were therefore peculiarly obnoxious to my father. He soon saw Charles, and they conferred long together, but to little avail. They subsequently met several times; each meeting, however, instead of reconciling, seemed rather to increase their differences. As father would not compromise his respectability, nor Charles his conscience, a final and lasting separation must take place. I was positively forbidden the privilege of seeing the proscribed errorist. Every precaution was taken to prevent our meeting. At last, wearied by disappointed hope, and believing, as I afterward accidentally learned, that he should be more reconciled were the separation still more complete, he embarked in a ship and sailed for a foreign clime. Not many months after, father met with several signal reverses of fortune, which induced him to retire with his remaining wealth to the western country, and devote himself no longer to the pursuits of active life. He fancied this nook between the hills, and he built this cottage, partly after his taste, partly after mine. The second year after his removal hither, he suddenly fell ill, and lingered in life but a few days. His prejudices were much softened before he died.

'It is now five years since I saw Charles. Nor have I heard from him since his departure from the country. But his name and his image are enshrined here,'—and she laid her wan hand upon her heart,—'nor will they—' but she found herself too much overcome by debility and old recollections to proceed farther. At that moment her mother came in, and adjusting the pillow, we left her to forget in her sleep those memories upon which her heart had so long feasted.

IX.

A few days after she had related the circumstances above noted, I was in her room, sitting near the window, through which came in the soft rays of the setting sun, giving a bright crimson tinge to everything around us, when she addressed me in more than her wonted energy, and bade me receive her message. 'When you see Charles,' said she, in earnest and solemn emphasis, 'bear him my love,—that is the word,—and tell him that, in joy and gloom, in strength and weakness, in life and death—tell him that, through all the changes of past and eventful years,—Who is there?' she exclaimed, in an altered tone, as voices from the hall reached us. 'O God! it is Charles!' she uttered again. But it was over. Her hands unlocked, the eyes opened, and the countenance seemed as undisturbed and peaceful as before. 'I am calm now,' she said, and so she was. A moment, and there stood by the couch one whom the fond mother called 'Wilton—Charles Wilton.' He, too, appeared as dispassionate as a veritable Rosicrucian. And what need of words—poor human words? Eye spoke to eye—palm thrilled to palm; and there rolled back the shadows of gathered years, and the two held deep and holy converse. What need of words—poor human words, when true souls utter themselves?

X.

Charles Wilton had returned to his native city a few weeks previous to the event alluded to above; and on learning there of the death of Adelia's father, he hastened on to meet once more the object of his unchanging affections.

He had been at the cottage nearly a week, when one morning—it was sabbath—I went into the sick room, and was instantly struck with the altered and more unfavorable appearance of the invalid. Charles and the mother, standing by, were silent and sorrowful. 'I have been thinking,' said Adelia, in a low tone, 'that this morning we will have our nuptials solemnized. Shall we not, Charles? It will be a sad wedding, I know; but, if I live, it will be just as well, and if I die, then, as we have been one on earth, so shall we be one in heaven.' After some little arrangements were made, Wilton stepped to the couch, took Adelia's thin hand in his, and in a moment more the sacred union was ceremoniously consummated. And just as the sun was throwing the last parting rays on the earth that day, the king of the grave claimed his bride!

She died, 'and made no sign.' And at the going down of the sun on the second day, we followed in tearful silence the corpse to its narrow dwelling place. Peace to those pure ashes.

O Wilton, so late at the bridal altar—so soon at the tomb! After thy struggling years of separation and disappointment, thou hast but found for thy heart's inheritance a deeper and more lasting desolation. And thou hast learned one of the most fearful lessons of experience,—how the vicissitudes of life cripple and crush the pinions of Hope!

TELL ME YOU LOVE ME.

BY MRS. C. W. HUNT.

TELL me you love me when the rosy beam
Of early morning flushes hill and stream,
And lights the joyous sea;
More cheering than the sound of martial life,
To him who's hast'ning to the field of strife,
Fall such sweet words from thee.

Tell me you love me—and through seas of wrong,
My drooping, fainting spirit shall be strong,
And bears on undismayed;
'Tis not enough to know thou lovest me still,
We know the sun shines—but we feel a chill
When clouds his bright beams shade.

Tell me you love me when the last faint ray
Of sunset's glory fades and melts away;
Speak then in accents low;
Oh! not the holy night's baptismal dew
Upon the earth such freshness can renew,
As my fond heart shall know.

Tell me you love me, ever; every hour
We breathe the unchecked perfume of the flower
Until it droops and dies;
Love is the fragrance of the human heart;
Its breath can heal the spirit's bitterest smart;
Oh! let its incense rise!

Tell me you love me—when the young stars wake,
And fire-flies glancing by the mirror lake,
Make beautiful the night;
Turn then on me thine eyes of undimmed love,
And the resplendence of the worlds above
Shall fade upon their light.

Tell me you love me when the chilling seal
Of death is on my brow, and I can feel
The ice-cords round my heart;
Thy love beneath—the love of God above—
Lightly my soul shall go,—nor fear to move
From earth, from thee depart.

THE GOSSIPINGS OF IDLE HOURS.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

HOUR FIRST.

WELL, this must be an idle afternoon, despite all my good-will to industry. The spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak. This soft south wind, making dreamy melody among the branches of the elm that grows up at my window, has a strange Mesmeric influence upon my nerves. My old, velvet-covered, (Tabby velvet, dear reader,) square-backed arm-chair, has such a winning aspect of repose, that in spite of a most womanly resistance, I have suffered myself at last to be received passively within its gentle, mahogany arms. Farewell, now, to needle, thimble, scissors, thread; farewell to books, crayons, pictures, pens, and ink; farewell to everything in the habitable universe save this most bewitching, consummate repose. Even Thomson's Castle of Indolence could not be a more delicious retreat than this same little room of mine, and this luxurious green velvet arm-chair.

'Whatever smacks of noyance, or unrest,
Is far, far off expelled from this delicious nest.'

I have the greatest good-will imaginable toward all the grand movements of the age; but pardon me, dear reader, even a movement across this little apartment to-day, would be worse than a Catholic penance. Even the last work of Charles Dickens, (Heaven bless him!) lying on the window seat beside me, yet unread, has not power to tempt me from my Eden of rest, my dear little 'Sleepy Hollow.' Yet I do not wish to sleep. My thoughts were never more wakeful than now. Let me, therefore, gaze out upon these little street-scenes that are enacted so quietly before me, and I will gossip to you about them with my tongue, which is the only member at present capable of activity.

The village road makes a graceful curve, and winds off from my sight behind a dell of tasselled willows; but just at this point a branch of this same thoroughfare takes the abandoned course of the old road, and at the very spot where the line of my vision terminates, makes another fork, and with both arms nearly surrounds our little cream-colored church. Opposite this chapel is the small village school-house. The scene is pretty. It has, at least, a rural look.

Let us take a gossiping view of the passengers that trudge along this street. Emerging from behind the willow dell, I see the stooping figure of a 'pack pedlar.' Like many a genteel 'loafer' he carries all his wealth upon his back—and a ponderous load it seems. Step by step, he labors along the way. Now he ascends the grassy slope to our neighbor's dwelling, and rap, rap, rap, go his bony knuckles against the door. The mistress of the house appears. The positive shakes of her head are no rebuff to his earnest entreaties for her patronage. Down he tumbles his huge burthen upon the entry floor. Scarfs, veils, ribbons, laces and jewels are temptingly displayed. Seeing that these make no headway against her principles of economy, he begins next to unpack ninepenny-calicoes, spool-cotton, steel bodkins, assorted needles, hooks and eyes, etc. etc. etc., all of which are among the 'must haves' of life. Finally he prevails on her to take some little article named in his catalogue, and apparently satisfied with his luck, replaces his pack, makes a low, foreigner's bow, and departs.

Hard as the labor of his way must be, doubtless his itinerant life has many charms. If he has an eye open to the beauties of nature, he has opportunities of witnessing them in all their numerous varieties. Mountains and valleys, plains and woodlands are traversed by his practised feet. He sees the upspringing of the first violet by the road side, and the last aster that survives the blast of the northern wind, looks up to cheer him on his way. By the shores of lakes and the banks of rivers, across wild brawling streams and through glens of softest green, he pursues his path from village to village, seeking like Bunyan's Pilgrim, to ease himself of the burthen that weighs down his weary limbs. Human nature, too, he sees in every variety. Into every dwelling he finds admittance, and comes in contact with every form of humanity. Many a family history does he store up in his mind, as year after year he takes his accustomed round. Many a humorous anecdote and romantic incident does he treasure up to make food for thought when old age shall have put an interdict upon his laborious wanderings. But we must leave the poor pedlar to pursue his way, and recommend to such of our listeners as would know more of his itinerant profession, the beautiful delineations of Wordsworth, and of that sweet friend of ours, the author of the 'BLIND PEDLAR.'*

The next figure in the landscape, is that of a woman. We must gossip gently this time, for she is a poor, lone being who approaches—one to whom our gentle Lord might have said—'Neither do I condemn thee—go and sin no more.' The wind, filling her short, scarlet cloak, bears it out like a streamer behind; her hood, also, of faded green silk, is blown back from her forehead, over which fall straggling locks of coal-black hair, rivalling in hue the eyes that roll beneath; and upon her bare and brawny arm she bears a basket filled with cranberries, the harvest of her morning labors. The long strides that she takes soon diminish the distance that lies between us; she is crossing the door yard now—is now beneath my window—looks up with a foolish simper and salutes me with a low, girlish curtsy.

Poor old Sussey! When I am eating the nice tarts made from those fresh spring cranberries, a thought shall stray to you in your far-off, lonely hut. But no! I forget. The hut is in ruins now, and another home

—the pauper's home is yours. But your heart has led you back there to that old and loved retreat—I am sure it has led you there, for in no other spot grow the meadow cranberries so large and red. It was but the other day that I too, visited the ruins. After a long, long ramble through the wildest and greenest old woods, where the moss carpets the whole earth, and is jewelled over with scarlet winter-berries and purple anemones—after a long, long ramble through thickets of the glossiest-leaved laurel, and beneath the green arches of slant old hemlocks, we came suddenly upon a large, green, billowy pond, whose waves were tossing angrily against its high wooded banks. Hills surrounded it on every side but one—and on that side gushed forth a merry stream, near the banks of which were the ruins of poor Susy's hut. All around was solitary. Woods and hills shut in the view on every hand; and no sound was heard but the groaning of the waves, the laughing ripple of the brook, and the caw! caw! of melancholy crows. Here for many years had been old Susy's habitation. How she subsisted was a wonder to me, so far away from the dwellings of men and the comforts of human society. But my father showed me the spot where she used to raise corn, perhaps other vegetables, also; and very near this place, through the corner of a woodland, lay a large meadow, filled with cranberries and cowslips which the old woman occasionally brought into the village to exchange for salt meat, and other articles of provision. Yes, it must be that she has been to the old meadow again, and gazed long and ruefully, no doubt, upon the pile of bricks and stone that mark the spot of her ancient residence. Who will blame her if she fondly loved that wild and lowly home? She had little else to love, poor thing! little else to claim her thoughts. And even the affections of the sinful and the abandoned must have some object around which to cling, though it be but a crumbling hearthstone, or a patch of barren ground.

From behind that same group of willows approaches another form. The walk is a familiar one. I know every attitude, every motion. Why should I not? He is one of the household, dear fellow! Ah! he is returning from the Post Office. His hands are full of packages, newspapers, &c. Wait a moment. 'Any letters for me, Johnny?' 'One. Guess who from, and you shall have it.' 'From Mrs. —.' 'No.' 'Miss —.' 'No.' 'Mr. —.' 'No.' 'Well, who is it? You don't know whether I guess right or not—How should you?' 'Because I know the post-mark and the handwriting.' 'Oh! don't make me guess any longer. Do give me the letter.' 'I am sure you will guess right this time,' says Johnny, laughing. 'If it were not so very, very, very long since my last letter that I quite despair of ever receiving a reply, I should almost fancy from its aspect, that it might be from —.' 'You are right,' is the reply; and dash comes the letter into my lap. No, it has fallen behind my chair. Farewell, dear reader, to idleness, and to you.

* See Vol. IX. of Ladies' Repository.

This letter has acted like a galvanic battery. Were the strength of a giant required to break the seal, I am sure I could do it without delay.

SKETCHES FROM SCRIPTURE. NO. I.

BY MRS. J. R. SPOONER.

Now Israel's land had sinned, when Saul had slain
And wronged the sons of Gibeon, and there came
A grievous famine three successive years.
In vain the laborer ploughed, in vain he sowed;
The earth, obedient to high Heaven's command,
Gave no return. The cattle of the field
Found not th' accustomed herb, and starving died.
Pale Hunger, with her wan and haggard look,
Beset alike the palace and the hut.
The strength of men waxed faint, and day by day
Their wives and children drooped for want of bread.
All powerful Hope had long sustained the mind
With promises of aid, and fainting hearts
Were roused to life and energy, while she,
With her bright cheering eye, looked on and smiled.
But she had fled, and black despair usurped
Her radiant throne, and scowling fiercely there,
Threw the dark shadows of his gloomy brow
O'er every heart where Hope was wont to dwell—
E'en as the storm-clouds rise, and hide the sun.

And David said unto the Gibeonites,
'What shall I do for you? And wherewith make Th' atonement, that the Lord may bless our land?'
'No gold or silver,' thus the answer ran,
'We ask to quench the memory of our wrongs,
But seven sons of him, who did the sin,
Give now into our hands.' And David took,
Of Saul's descendants, five of Michal's sons,
And two of Rizpah's, and the Gibeonites
Bore off their captives to Gibeah's mount
And hanged them there together, and did leave
Their corpses all unburied where they died.

With all a mother's love, and tender care,
Had Rizpah watched her sons, from childhood's hour,
To that of manhood. Well doth woman know
The full unutterable tide that flows
From the deep fount of feeling, when her babe,
The mother first doth clasp unto her heart.
And how that days, and weary nights of care,
And all the arduous tasks that infancy,
In its long helpless state demands, but serve
To render dearer what was dear before.
Affection's spring, exhaustless, flows apace,
Its waters rise with every new demand.

Had sickness laid them low, or had they died,
To serve their country on the battle field,
'T would have been sad enough to her who gazed
With fond maternal pride on her young sons,
Who now repaid her long and anxious love,
By tender watchfulness, and care for her
To whom they owed their being.

But who can tell

The piercing anguish of that mother's heart,
When doomed to see these loved ones sacrificed
In the full vigor of their youthful days,
By ignominious death! And then to view
Their blackened corpses, all unburied lie,
Deprived of funeral rites. O dreadful sight!
To her whose faithful love forsook them not,
Who now her station took beside her dead,
Spreading her sackcloth on the barren rock—
And mid the scorching of the sun's bright rays,
Scared the lone vulture from his destined feast.
And through the dreary night, when beasts of prey,
With hunger wild, came howling from their dens,
Strong in her love, she still maintained her watch,
From early harvest time, until the earth,
Refreshed at length by grateful showers, burst forth
In promised fruitfulness.

All nature smiled;
The verdant fields, and budding flowers looked gay,
And feathered songsters rose from every grove,
Trilling sweet lays, that spoke of love and joy.
The streams, renewed in strength and power, rushed down
The mountain's sides, through vale and glade below,
And dancing o'er their pebbly beds sung loud
Of peace and plenty.
But Rizpah, what cared she for sounds of joy?
They seemed to mock the anguish of her soul,
And found no echo in her grief-worn breast.
What charms for her had sun, or field, or flower,
While her sad eyes were bent upon a sight,
The thought of which alone might freeze the blood
With silent horror! To see the slow worm
Pursue his loathsome task, and thus destroy Beneath her gaze, the forms of those she loved
To cradle on her breast! No pen may tell
How deep the iron pierced that mother's soul.

Amid the gladness now throughout the land,
There was one heart that mourned for Rizpah's fate.
We are not told the name of him who came
To Israel's king, and urged her plaintive tale,
But we must love the goodness that thus sought
The monarch's aid, and pity for the same,
And not in vain, for David then resolved
To gather Saul's remains, and Jonathan's,
(Whom he had mourned so deeply), and the bones
Of those who had been sacrificed, and then
He laid them in his father's sepulchre
In Zelah. And David prayed for God's Forgiveness of the land.

No more is said
Of that lone childless woman. Pray heaven she went Down to her grave in peace.

USEFULNESS OF DRONES. It is said, that Bees, in making their honey-cells, are followed by a lazy drone, who is watching for their sweets, being too indolent to work himself, and whom the working bees endeavor to kill, but who, nevertheless, acts as an instinct in them to provide for themselves and not trust to slothful companions, who would live on their industry. ## SCULPTURE.

BY REV. JOHN G. ADAMS.

WE wish Sculpture could be better appreciated; that there were more lovers, admirers, patrons of it among men, and especially in our own community. It is of little avail, however, to murmur here. People will admire and patronize what they please; and those who differ in taste, must learn the virtue of mutual forbearance. Yet this philosophy of taste must be 'strange—passing strange.' No very wise man just now will attempt to fathom it; although he may often be driven to extremities in consequence of its manifestations.

The saying, 'let there be no dispute about tastes,' is popular everywhere; although there are many moments in the history of some minds when its spirit is most unceremoniously violated,—when the multitude seem to provoke patience, and set all rules of mutual agreement about taste at defiance.

It should always be in good taste to admire, to appreciate true genius. We say this with as much assurance as we say that all men should be in love with truth and righteousness; and we are just opinionated enough to be wedded to this notion for life. All departures from this good rule, we think, are to be regretted. It is humiliating that the multitude so eagerly run after the sham and superficial, to the neglect of the substantial and true; that brassy bombast, kaleidoscope declamation, and popular noise, attract more attention than 'thoughts that breathe' truth for all men in all times, clothed merely in 'sound speech that cannot be condemned;' that trashy novel writers have more readers than Guizot, Carlisle, or Channing; that new and strange prescriptions for body and soul, if only bound up and labelled in what the throng consent to call 'crack style,' are sought and used, when if the ordinary and long-tried were thus served up, they would answer the same, and ten to one, a better purpose. But again, we shall not complain. Nor must we be grieved that Sculpture is not more highly appreciated with us at the present time. Aside from other considerations, we cannot so much wonder when Painting abounds; and when even this at times becomes so tame, as to call for another branch of art to make it available. Bunker Hill battle must not only be Painted, but actually fought with fire, and smoke, and noise; and Niagara Falls must be presented with actual water, a roar, and an artificial thunder-shower to match. Then comes the rush!

We were speaking of Sculpture, the simplest of all arts,—yet the grandest, truest, most noble. He who can call beautiful form and even glowing life into being, not with the combinations of drawing, coloring, light and shade, but of cold clay and marble, must be ranked in the highest order of genius. 'A marble thought,' is this Sculpture, that lives through long ages, and speaks to passing generations the same strong language of inspiration and of truth. Instance the Apollo Belvedere. Time has not changed it, nor prevented the impression of its mysterious power on the soul. For eighteen centuries it has spoken the same thing to man. The works of Sculpture that adorned the Parthenon, excite as strong an admiration when gazed upon in a British Museum, as they did in the Athenian citizen centuries before the Christian era.

Touching the history of Sculpture, we may observe that it has an early and distinguished origin. The old world has much to tell of it. We have reason to believe that the Egyptians were in possession of this art at a very early period, although with them it existed in a barren state, until improved by the Persians and Greeks who came among them after the conquest of Cambyses, 525 B. C. It was probably esteemed by the Hebrews, but chiefly as an auxiliary and ornamental to architecture. The Etruscans, many of whose works still remain, excelled in it. But the highest rank in the art, unquestionably belongs to the Greeks. They surpassed all other nations. In the Homeric age, Sculpture had gained a remarkable degree of cultivation. Phidias and Praxitiles are names interwoven forever with the art. The occasions for the execution and use of statues in Greece were frequent and various. A distinguished writer remarks, 'Not only were the temples of the Gods ornamented with their statues and with sculptured representations of their mythological history, but works of this kind were required in great number for public squares and places, for private dwellings, gardens, country seats, walks, and for architectural ornament in general. The portico at Athens was crowded with statues. To heroes, wise men, poets and victors, statues were erected out of gratitude and respect, to princes often out of flattery. Thus did the statuary always find reward for the exercise of his art, and for the application of all his talents, which were quickened and stimulated the more by emulation.'*

Having attained its highest excellence not far from the time of Alexander, Grecian art gradually declined, and finally ceased. Then came the Roman reign of Sculpture. Splendid works of this art were brought from various cities to Rome. Grecian artists also came hither; and temples, public and private buildings, gardens and manors were almost everywhere embellished with statues and other productions of the sons of genius.

Sculpture thus flourished until the latter part of the second century. Then it gradually went down. Yet many of its noblest works survived; and since the revival of the arts in Italy, the last seat of ancient Sculpture, these monuments have been collected and described. Of these remains of ancient Sculpture, many collections have been made. In Italy, at Rome, Naples, Venice and other places. In France, in the * Eschenburg's Manual of Class. Lit.

Royal Museum at Paris; in England, in the British Museum at London; and in Germany, at Vienna, Munich, and Dresden.

But very few of the genuine remains of the art have visited our land. Copies and casts in plaster serve us as substitutes. The Boston Atheneum has in possession some of the most noted and valued monuments of ancient Sculpture. Among these are the Laocoon, Apollo Belvedere, Venus de Medici, The Torso, Antinous, Gladiator Borghese, &c. Similar works have also been procured by the Academy of Fine Arts at Philadelphia.

Passing by scores of the eminent in our art, including Italian, French, German, Dutch, English, Swedish, Russian and Spanish, the mere recital of whose works might almost surfeit us with models and combinations rich and rare, we are directed to Cavaceppi in Rome as the one who makes the transition to the great sculptors of the present time. Then comes Michael Angelo, of whom it has been justly said, that 'no artist ever exerted a more powerful influence, or more deeply impressed his peculiar views upon art.' His Moses on the tomb of Julius II, is said to be a matchless monument—'inimitable and unimitated in modern times.*' Next follows Canova, the first among the moderns to eradicate the existing evils in the art, and to restore the excellent creations of past and distant ages. He founded a new school, in which grace, simplicity and majesty preside. The figure of Hebe (a copy of which is in our city) is among the most celebrated of his works.

Then there are other names of no mean worth; Dannecker and Chaudet, Flaxman, Chantry and Gahogan. Chantry has given us of his genius in the statue of Washington, now in the State House in Boston. Dingy, and dull in place though it be, still it is living with high and sacred inspiration. The moral sublimity hath life in that form. In Mrs. Hemans' words of address to it,—

'The language of that noble brow
For all things good shall plead.'

Thorwaldsen, the Dane, next appears. He now stands at the head of the modern school. Whether he deserves all the praise and fame he has acquired, may have been doubted; yet he is unquestionably an artist of a very elevated rank. And one of the most agreeable things in connection with his history is, the pride with which his countrymen regard his genius. Is it not cheering to the admirers of the sons of art, to know that a nation's interest in one of her own sons, an artist in a foreign state, induced the sending out for him a national vessel, when he announced his intention to visit the home of his youth? and that public greetings and processions met him at almost every turn of his triumphal course? This is a homage such as we admire. And such has Thorwaldsen just received of his country.

And where are our American sculptors? Abroad, and at home. The list is not long. We are not yet old enough to record much of the American development of the art now before us. A few years of the past tell the whole story. Yet our sculptors are already up and at work. First stands Mr. Greenough, now in Florence, with Powers and Clevenger. His great work, the statue of Washington for the United States capitol, has just reached us. It is highly lauded. One of our distinguished men has said of it: 'We regard Mr. Greenough's Washington as one of the greatest works of Sculpture of modern times. We do not know the work which can justly be preferred to it, whether we consider the purity of the taste, the loftiness of the conception, the truth of the character, or what we must own we feel less able to judge of, accuracy of anatomical study and mechanical skill.*'

This gentleman has also vindicated the statue in its strangeness as it comes in contact with our crude taste. Whether his learned and very candid interpretation of form and costume will 'go down' with our numerous Jonathans and Zechariahs, aye, and some too who would be known by more modern and elegant names, for long years to come, is to us, a matter quite debatable. The work, however, is destined to live; and its author has already earned a sculptor's immortality. Powers, the Vermonter,—the self-taught, inventive genius, also flourishes in Florence. He, too, will leave enduring traces in the field of this art. And Clevenger, whose name and works are with us—each in high esteem;—these are at work where facilities such as they require, are far better than they can be at present in their native land. Crawford is at Rome. Of him, Miss Sedgwick writes, in her 'Letters from Abroad;' 'On our return to Rome from Naples, we had the pleasure of personal acquaintance with Mr. Crawford, and of confirming our prepossessions in his favor by actual observation. The tide had even then turned in his favor. He had recovered his health and become known to many of his countrymen. While this book is going through the press, we hear that a sum of $2,500 has been made up in Boston for his orphans. We hope that New York will not lag behind, but will extend her hand to her own son while there is yet some faith and generosity in doing so. When he becomes better known, there will be no merit in sending him orders.†'

In America we have but three sculptors; Brown, at Albany, and Dexter and Brackett in Boston. Of Mr. Brown's work we have seen nothing; although we feel warranted in speaking of him as a sculptor of high reputation. Several of his pieces now in Albany, have gained him much praise.

Specimens of Mr. Dexter's hand are to be seen at the Artist's Exhibition in School Street. His head of Mr. Dickens is one of the latest of his works. The inspiration of genius is in his soul; and he can make it speak to others. May his prosperity never be less,—a meagre wish, we know, for almost any of our good artists just at the present time,—yet a perfectly safe one, which means much more than faint words can declare.

The youngest of our American sculptors is Mr. Brackett. Just started—although fairly started in his noble work, he deserves much attention—much sympathy—and better than all—patronage. He is one of our best geniuses; a student in the great school of nature, with spirit baptized into the very poetry of his subject; pursuing his task too with untiring zeal,—and in nothing discouraged by the self-denials and crosses which expectation presents in his onward course.

The first main production of Mr. B. which attracted public attention, was his group, the 'Binding of Satan.' This, as the work of so young an artist, received much praise,—praise too, richly merited. The group was designed and executed within the short space of three months. The artist describes it in a letter to a friend, as 'a rapid production, thrown off in the excitement of the moment, under peculiarly embarrassing circumstances.' The design of the work is, an exhibition of the ascendancy of the spiritual over the natural,—the triumph of good over evil, which is the peculiar work of Christianity. The artist has selected for his subject the description in the twentieth chapter of Revelations, where Satan is represented as about to be chained by the angel. The two great characters are here strikingly set forth; the agony of hatred and revenge disarmed of their power; the power of heavenly love 'commissioned to restrain the might of evil.'

We admire this design,—not only because it speaks the power of genius, but because we have here the very idea of Christianity. Like Painting and Poetry, Sculpture has too long lent its aid to heathenism. We want it in the future, identified with Christianity. And we doubt not that it will be. We love this work because it savors so of the gospel. 'The angelic influence of goodness' predominant over 'the satanic energy of evil';—Love's triumph and unbounded dominion! The idea teems with the excellent and holy,—with faith sublime in God and man. Thanks—Christian thanks to the soul of genius at whose bidding it was outlined in this attractive group.

We have another attempt of the same artist. It is in the statue of that general favorite, that loved of all loved ones in modern book creations,—the little Nell of Dickens. We wish that all who have so anxiously followed that singularly captivating one through her brief life—taking part in her griefs and joys, and feeling the rush of the warm tears at her impressive burial, could gaze on her fair countenance and child-like mien as our genius of the marble form and glowing soul has presented them. We think they would agree that little Nell had come to give them a silent greeting, and to thank them for their sympathies, and loves, and tears. Many delighted visitors have already paid their respects to this statue. It will be popular; because it is so complete an embodiment of the general idea.

We cannot now speak in detail of the other productions of the same hand. They are good and true;—and the artist needs only one advantage, that of time, to make him eminent. May he have this—much, much of it. And we doubt not that in this, other needed and essential accompaniments will appear.

Our subject leads us to consider the fate of Sculpture in our own country. We have reasons for believing that good and grateful days are dawning upon it. But little, truly, has yet been done in its behalf; nor has that little been equal to our means. Yet much as we are disposed at times to jeer our small admiration of Sculpture, we could say much in palliation of it. Our country is but just out of the wilderness; and we are to remember that 'a thousand years scarce serves to form a state.' We are just beginning to do the work of national life—and this after two fierce wars since that life was given us. Now indeed we are in the midst of a revolution caused, among other things, by extravagance and recklessness in the pursuit of wealth. This must be passed—as passed it will be,—and onward we shall go in the steam-power speed of the present, with all the additional velocity acquired in the future; and then we trust—the sword and musket laid aside, and our moral vision clear,—the pen, the pencil and the chisel will have their ample work. The love of the arts already grows deeper and stronger as we advance in years and national vigor. This is but a shadow of what the pleasing reality will be.

We have thus written down certain thoughts on a subject, which, however cold and uninteresting to multitudes, makes our heart warm as we write upon it—not as an artist—not as a critic—but as a lover of Sculpture. And we cannot lay aside our pen without the expression of a strong desire that in the future progress of our nation, her sculptors may not labor in vain, nor spend their strength for nought. We would have them grow with the growth and strengthen with the strength of our prosperity,—setting up their silent yet speaking monuments in the midst of our institutions of learning, religion, wealth and renown; monuments which like those of the early sons of genius who toiled and wrought where now lie

'Lone columns on the Ionian shore,
And sculptured ruins scattered o'er Athenian and Corinthian plains,' and whose works are before our admiring eyes, shall impart inspiration and delight to myriads in the bright ages of improvement yet to come.

THE MEETING.

BY MRS. C. W. HUNT.

THERE—that's the last! never again,
Will I clasp hand of thine;
I will not yield my spirit's warmth
Upon so cold a shrine.

I met thee, then, with all the warmth,
I ever felt for thee,
Nor dreamed to find in one so loved,
Such heartless mockery.

I could have clasped thee in my arms;
But in thy soulless gaze
I read no memory of the past,
Friend of my early days!
Not so we met in former years
When life was fresh and new,
Ere I had learned to doubt, and thou
Wert loving, kind and true.

Thy soul was open as the day,
Pure as the unstained snow;
No shade of passion had been thrown Across thy guileless brow.
Too soon thou'rt changed! too soon hast learnt
To bow to fashion's wiles;
Fetter the rapturous soul, and wreath
The lip with hollow smiles.

Ne'er be it thine to know the chill
That gathers round the heart,
Nor thine the struggle to suppress Tears that unbidden start,—
To meet the half-extended hand,
Where thine was freely given;
To feel the heart's pure wealth flung back,
And its strong love-cords riven.

Farewell; 'tis over now, no more
Shall memory cling to thee;
Roll on—ye waves! our paths divide
With dark oblivion's sea!
Sooner than clasp thy hand again,
Or trust thy faithless breast,
I'd live and die in loneliness—
Unnoticed and unblest.

LIBERTY. All men have a passionate inward desire to transact for themselves that which chimes in harmony with their best feelings, without being questioned as to their motives in so doing. Let us all act wisely in this matter, for liberty is like a guardian angel, seeking the happiness of all, but veils herself when the freedom of one son or daughter of earth is called to task for its own rightful exercise. ### RANDOM SKETCHES.

BY JULIA.

MORN in the city! The cold, gray, misty light appeareth in the East, and the now desolate streets shall soon echo to the tread of hurrying feet. There is a calmness and beauty spread over the city, which it will not wear again, until the turmoil of another day is past, and the hush of night again falleth over the scene. The sky, shall I dare to speak of the ever-changing sky, brightening with the hues of morn. It is becoming more and more radiant as the first gray mists of morning disappear, and the blue and crimson clouds are brightening in the East. Now a change hath passed over them, and they have assumed the purple and golden tints which poets love so well. And now the silence is broken, and my thoughts are recalled to the busy world of men. It is the rattling of a market wagon laden with its goodly store. Then following comes another, and another still, and 'the cry is still, they come!' Now hasty steps are heard upon the pavement, the laborer goeth forth to his daily toil. Discordant cries are heard in every street, and again my ears are obliged to hear that sound which has become so hateful, that never-ceasing cry of 'Ledger, Times, and Daily Chronicle.' There a daughter of Afric is bearing a basket of snow-white linen, which her toil worn hands have washed, and a son of Erin passes with his dray. That meanly dressed being who is passing down Market Street, is the same that the evening twilight saw so degraded by intoxication. His step is slow, and hesitating. Doth he go forth this lovely morn, with a bosom wrung with remorse for the sin which binds him in a slavery so debasing, and resolving never more to yield to the tempter? If so, may strength be with him.

The sun appears, and none who have not watched the morning light from the first fading of the stars until the brightness of the perfect day, can tell how beautiful is sunrise in a city. It cometh, not as I have been wont to greet it, lighting the far blue hills with its glorious beauty, and giving gladness to vale and forest, to lowly cottages, and woodland streams,—it beameth upon roof and spire, and busy thoroughfare of the goodly city, in brilliant contrast with its plodding cares. The glad waters of the Schuylkill are flashing back its radiance, and the sunlight seems to have found a mirror in every heart.

But what is all this beauty to the sleeping thousands who inhabit these dwellings? The fashionable world is wrapped in slumber, and this array of loveliness is for the eye of the sons and daughters of toil. There is beauty and gladness over every part of this fair earth, but it is ordained that those who seek shall find, and the careless eye may never meet with either. Seek we the garden walks in quest of weeds? We shall find many, rank and poisonous. Go we forth to gather flowers? Lo! they are upspringing in our pathway, and gemming the hill-side and gladdening the meadows with their loveliness.

But the sun is beaming now upon both the lowly and the lofty dwelling. What hath been the lot of their inmates since last he shone thereon? Gaiety hath been there. The festal lamps have burned brightly in the hall, and soft-toned music mingled the joyous hours. There have been gay smiles at the banquet, and graceful forms in the dance. The bright eye hath beamed brighter, and the soft tone grown softer, and the flush of excited feeling hath mantled many a cheek so pale before, and none asked of the weariness which hath dwelt in many a heart—in the brilliant throng. Yet many, yea many have gathered there, with the bright smile upon the ruby lip, and the sunny light of a joyous spirit in the glancing eye, and the gladness of youth in the music voice,—and the bitterness of death in the pride-veiled heart. But it is past, the festal lights have gone out, and the festal wreath hangs withering on the wall, for it is morn in the city.

Want hath been there. The child of indigence hath lain down upon his rude pallet, and slept to dream of plenty, which he could not reach, and viands which mocked his touch have hovered round the slumbers of the famishing one. The mother hath hushed her sobbing babes to sleep, and with tearless eye and spirit of despair hath watched their rest. Their sleep is broken now, and again they pray, 'Father, give us this day our daily bread,' for it is morn in the city.

Sorrow hath been there. In the wakefulness of saddened thought have the hours been passed, and griefs which had been hidden from the light of day, haunted the silent watches of the night. Sleepless pillows were pressed by throbbing brows, and tears of anguish wrung from breaking hearts. There have been some who calmly smiled when other eyes were bent upon them, and lightly jested with the jesting throng, on whom the spirit-eyes of night looked down in pitying love. And some, whom mortals call the cold, the proud, the stern, have knelt in the still midnight, and humbly prayed for strength to suffer still unmurmuringly to the last. Strong hearts have struggled with the wild agony of passionate grief, and some have hushed their woes to the calmness of despair. It is over now, the veil is re-adjusted, it is morn in the city.

Sin hath been there. The still midnight hath listened to the loud laugh of the reveller, and the stealthy step of the robber. Guilt, which had shrank abashed before the eye of day, stalked boldly forth, and called the night its own. The gambler hath bent eagerly over his desperate game, and the wine-cup hath done its deadly work. The incendiary hath lighted his torch of destruction, and throughout the goodly city hath pealed the alarm cry. But now it is morn in the city.

Sickness and death have been there. The moan of the sufferer on his couch of pain has ascended on the wing of darkness. The fevered brow, and languid frame have sought in vain for slumber, and the cry of agony hath broken the stillness of the night. The gentle stars have watched unwearied by the bedside of the suffering, and cheered the weary hours, by their blessed presence. Breaking hearts have gathered around the dying one, and quivering lips have said the last farewell. Anguish hath abode with the night, but it is morn in the city.

Finally, the spirit of God hath been also there. Relieving the bitterness of want, hushing the tempest of grief, and saying to the wild waves of sin, 'Here shall thy course be stayed!' It hath been in the mirthful circle, inspiring a holier mood, and bidding the angel of innocence to preside over their gaiety. There hath been strength given unto the fainting heart to bear life's burden well, and new peace hath come to the breast of the sorrowful. The aching brow hath been forgotten in praise to Him who chasteneth in love, and from the death couch hath a triumphal song been heard. Even the anguish of surviving love has been hushed into quietness, and from the bitterness of desolation the mourning ones have arisen with spirits humbled and subdued, gathering strength from very weakness, and firmly pressing onward in the path of holiness. Truly the angel of the Lord hath been abroad through the night, ministering peace and joy and love, for bright and beautiful is the morn in the city.

MRS. SCOTT.

HER CHARACTER AS A UNIVERSALIST.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

WE trust our readers will require no apology from us for again introducing the name of our departed sister. Nothing appertaining to her, can, we believe, be devoid of interest to Universalists—certainly not to Universalist females. She was one of us in heart and soul—a bright, outshining one, it is true, but humble still, and of earnest heart, moving as quietly in her pathway as though she were not the cynosure, and we were not her lowly and watchful admirers.

Perhaps, more than for any other one reason, we venerate and love her, because she was essentially denominational. We would not be understood to say that she was in any degree exclusive, or that she loved her own sect so blindly as to be unobservant of its faults. But Universalism was the spirit of her life—the breath she breathed—her hope, her faith, her all. In her this devotedness had a peculiar merit. The doctrine of Impartial Grace is not rooted and grounded in the Valley of the Susquehanna, as it is on the shores of New England, and in the flourishing villages of New York and Ohio. The heaven has not yet gone forth very abundantly from the societies of the metropolis into the inland counties of Pennsylvania; and truly and indeed are they obliged to labor and suffer reproach who publicly avow themselves its advocates.

In the village in which Mrs. Scott resided from the time of her marriage till her death, this doctrine is seldom proclaimed from the desk. Now and then an itinerant herald of salvation 'gets up a meeting' at the Court House, and a few listen gladly to the good news of a world's redemption; but the elite, (and what shire town has not its elite?) are seen wending their way to the genteel churches of the Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Baptist and Methodist, which stand at intervals along the pleasant streets of Towanda.

During our visit there in the autumn of 1840, we attended one of these chance meetings. The day was cloudy and damp; Mrs. S. was confined to her room by indisposition, but was too anxious to have the meeting well attended to allow any one to remain at home with her. The congregation was very small. There were not more than four or five females present. Among them was the sweet Mrs. M., whose death Mrs. Scott has commemorated in one of her most beautiful poems; for though her home was one of wealth, luxury and fashion, she hesitated not to give open countenance to the faith she loved.

Of this character were all the meetings Mrs. Scott had opportunity of attending in Towanda. Her usual place of worship was in Monroe, a village four miles from T., where Br. Ames preached half the time to a small congregation that assembled in the distant school-house. The other half of the sabbaths Br. A. was employed at Sheshequin, the birth-place of our sister, about ten miles distant (I believe) from the place of her later residence. These meetings, also, she occasionally attended, at the same time that she paid visits to the home of her childhood.

We mention these particulars to give some idea of the state of Universalism in the region of country where Mrs. S. resided, and to prove what we have stated above,—that devotedness to this cause was in her a peculiar merit. Her literary acquaintances in T., (and she had several whom she highly prized) were all of a contrary faith—a circumstance she could not but continually regret. This religious difference, while it forbade the most intimate communion, did not prevent warm and sincere attachments. Among all classes, and by all denominations, Mrs. S. was deeply respected as a true and devoted christian, But though respected as an individual, she had the unhappiness to feel,—and feel it she did, most sensibly—that the sect to which she belonged, was a repudiated one; that the doctrine she loved, was scorned and hated; that its adherents were looked upon as ignorant, irreligious and profane—little better than scoffers and infidels.

Was it not, then, a feature of rare and distinguishing beauty in her character, that in the station in which she moved, with the talents she possessed, and the applause and admiration she might have else acquired, she should cling with zealous affection to the glorious religion of her childhood, that which had nurtured her in moral beauty, and stamped upon her heart the impress of celestial purity?

Most nobly, most eloquently did she all her life long avow and advocate the principles of universal love. But everything was done quietly. With her there was no parade of sentiment, no spirited declamation, no long and elaborate harangues. She did not go from house to house like a public proselyter, obtruding her religion upon her neighbors; but when occasion called for an expression of opinion, no one could have spoken more nobly, more independently, in behalf of what conscience told her was truth, than did this gentle, sensitive and delicate woman.

She did not run her short career of usefulness without many temptations to turn astray from the strait and narrow path which she had chosen. The voice of the tempter came in this wise: 'You have gifts, Mrs. S., rare gifts, such as few, very few possess. Why cast these gems of thought along a pathway so obscure? Why publish these beautiful poems in the journals of a small and derided sect, when if set before the world in the popular literary periodicals of the day, they would elicit admiration from thousands of such as are capable of appreciating intellectual beauty?'

And let no one suppose that a voice like this, aided by the tender persuasions of love, could be coldly listened to by one whose heart was susceptible to every influence of affection, and every suggestion of duty. She would not have been the gentle, yielding, reverent woman that she was, had these things failed to arrest her attention and to excite reflection. But reason and conscience, her best, her most persuasive counsellors, spake with another voice. She saw that though the path of fame might lead another way, the path of real usefulness was that which she already trod. The literary field was already thronged with competitors—there she would be but one of the crowd; but here there were few sweet musical voices heard proclaiming the truths of the Redeemer; and those few were listened for with eagerness, and heard with profit. Here she could see the fruit of her labors;—(was it not rich and glorious?) here she could exert a useful influence, for there were many hearts that paid such allegiance to her talent, as they would pay to none other on earth.

The mere circumstance that a woman of intellect, of deep religious feeling, of pure mind and heart was proud to give her earnest and public countenance to an unpopular sect—nay, more than this—that she was at all times ready to speak out, eloquently and forcibly in behalf of its peculiar doctrines, was with many persons, a strong and impressive evidence of its claims to respect, if not of its affinity to truth.

Though not the very first woman who wielded the pen in defence of Universalism, she was perhaps the first who had sufficient genius to command general and enthusiastic admiration. And when years shall have passed away, and many sweet feminine voices shall be singing in the gardens of the New Jerusalem, we doubt not her name will still stand pre-eminent among those of her sex whose labors have been characterized by talent, independence, and enduring usefulness.

Miss Sedgwick, in her 'Letters from Abroad,' speaking of Mrs. Barbauld, says that in England she has experienced the great disadvantage of being considered the organ of a sect. From the same cause, undoubtedly, the writings of Mrs. Scott will be restricted in their popularity; but if by being the organ of the purest form of christianity preached since the days of the Apostles, she has lost any portion of public applause, there is abundant compensation in the knowledge that by this means she was the instrument of bringing many minds from spiritual darkness into the glorious light of Universal Love. Other reward than this she never coveted; and ever distrustful of her own powers, she never fully realized the extent of the good which she really accomplished. Let us who have experienced the benefit of her labors, gratefully and affectionately cherish the remembrance of her goodness, and humbly but fervently strive to lead lives as pure, as unselfish, and as useful as did that 'Pride of the Valley'—JULIA H. SCOTT.

MOSSDALE COTTAGE.

BY CHARLOTTE.

THERE'S a beautiful village, far, far away,
To which Fancy is ever returning,
And a sweet little spot, ever blooming and gay,
That I think of with homesick yearning.

Down a green, shady lane is a lone, quiet glen,
A brook ripples gently by it;
'Tis far from the bustle and noise of men,
And a traveller scarce would descry it.

Through the trees, peers the roof of a simple cot—
The woodbines with foliage wreath it;—
And many a monarch might envy the lot
Of those who are dwelling beneath it.

Plenty presides at their frugal board,
Peace spreads her wing o'er their dwelling,
And night and morn is the Giver adored
By hearts with gratitude swelling.

Contented hearts and industrious hands
Make easy their daily labor,
And while tilling their own, or another's lands,
They ne'er envy a richer neighbor.

When the day is past, in the cool, green lane
May be heard glad voices greeting;
Who would not part for a day to obtain
The joy of that happy meeting?

When the sabbath comes, with its holy rest,
'Mong the groups that are church-ward wending,
May be seen those cotters, neatly drest,
To the fane their footsteps bending.

With meek devotion they hear of Him
On whose love their thoughts are dwelling,
And their eyes with grateful tears are dim,
From the heart's deep fountains welling.

The Bible alone, is their rule of life,—
'Tis a guide that will fail them never;
It will lead them onward through storm and strife,
And anchor them safe forever.

Ah! who would not live, in that humble cot,
A life of such pure devotion,
Far rather than share the proudest lot
In the midst of the world's commotion?

CONSOLATION TO THE AFFLICTED.

THE following letter was originally addressed to an elderly lady in New Hampshire, whose husband by an unfortunate accident had been suddenly killed a few weeks before. It has been thought that its publication in the Repository might subserve the cause of humanity, by placing it within the reach of others whose circumstances may be similar to hers for whom it was first penned.

AUGUST 1, 1840.

DEAR MADAM: I trust you will pardon the liberty I take of addressing you upon a subject in which you are deeply interested. It is a liberty which I should not assume, were it not that circumstances seem to justify me in such a measure. Although a stranger to you in person, yet I am not uninterested in your welfare. Your children who reside in this place, are respected members of my congregation, and it is at their request that I write this letter for your perusal. They have informed me of the truly melancholy dispensation of Providence which has overtaken you, in the sudden and unlooked for death of your husband—they have told me of your deep anguish, which greatly adds to their distress at the loss of their father—and they have solicited me to address you in the hope that I may make some suggestion, which will allay the wretchedness that now preys upon you. Be assured, dear madam, I enter upon this task with none but the kindest emotions towards you. I have no disposition to wound your feelings, or to afflict you anew, or to intrude rudely upon the privacy of your sorrows. My only object is to give you relief. I would speak to you of hope and peace—I would endeavor, in imitation of the Savior whom I strive to serve, 'to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and to set at liberty them that are bruised.' Surely you will not turn away when I come to you, as I trust, in the spirit of the blessed Jesus, with messages of life and gladness!—you will not close your ears, when I would strive to drive away the dark clouds which now envelope your spirit, that the sun-light of gospel truth may shine upon your mind and bring consolation to your troubled heart!

It is when I am called as an ambassador of Jesus, to address the mourning, the disconsolate, the broken-hearted, that I especially realize the unspeakable excellency of the religion which I profess. In such seasons I bless my heavenly Father, that he has had mercy upon me, and opened my eyes to behold the beauty and glory of his character, the impartiality of his goodness, the boundlessness of his love, the inexhaustible riches of his grace and mercy, and the infinite abundance and fullness of the salvation which he has prepared in his Son, for the wretched, helpless, dying children of humanity!

With your husband I had no personal acquaintance; but I have been informed from various sources, that he was an honest, industrious man, a good husband, a kind parent, an obliging neighbor, and a useful citizen. And this is saying much, very much indeed, in his favor! Would to God that many, who make great professions of religion and piety, could have the same said of them, in truth. But still your husband did not profess to believe in certain human creeds, and had not connected himself with any visible church. And now that he has been cut suddenly off, those creeds would fain instil the dreadful thought into your mind, that his doom is sealed for everlasting woe! If you believe this is his condition, it must fill you with anguish indescribable. I can conceive of nothing that can pour such a flood of wretchedness upon the soul, as to believe that a departed friend who was the object of our love, has gone to a place of never-ending misery. If you harbor such a fear, my heart bleeds for you. Where—oh where—poor, heart-broken mourner—where can you flee to find refuge from such an awful thought?—where can you go to find consolation and hope? If you turn to the cruel, cruel doctrines of men, they can afford you no relief, but will add to your anguish. They coldly cast your beloved husband off, without one ray of hope, and unfeelingly assure you, that you can never meet him more! If you go to those who preach these doctrines, what can they possibly say to you, to afford you comfort in your affliction? Alas! nothing—nothing! If they speak as they profess to believe, they must tell you that concerning the condition of your husband, the companion of your youth, the father of your children, which will wring your heart with ten-fold agony—they must tell you, if they believe what they preach, that he is lost forever! But in the name of that Savior who shed his blood for a sinful world, I beseech you, believe not these dreadful words, so full of poison and death to your happiness—close your ears to them—turn away from them—and flee to Jesus, the tender-hearted Savior—flee to his holy and blessed gospel—search its divine truths, its blessed promises—and you will find streams of mercy, rivers of compassion, boundless oceans of grace, in which you can bathe your weary soul, and obtain consolation and peace amid all your sorrows!

Although your companion undoubtedly had his failings, as the best of men have, yet you have no reason to despair of his condition—you have no cause to settle down with the gloomy thought that he must be miserable forever. On the contrary, you have many grounds for the indulgence of hope, of great hope, of precious, life-giving hope! You unquestionably believe that your husband's sudden death was an event brought to pass by the direction of the Creator—and you must also believe that his condition in the future world, depends upon the character of that Being who thus suddenly took him to himself. Now in making up your mind in regard to his condition, it is all-important that you should reflect upon God's character, and see if you have any reason to indulge such dreadful fears respecting his dealings.

The Creator is our Father—he is the Father of all men: 'Have we not all one Father?' says the prophet Malachi—and the Apostle Paul, as we read in Acts, said to the Athenian idolaters, 'We are his offspring.' Every human being, then, is an offspring of God. Will the Father of spirits deliberately cast his children into a misery which is hopeless and endless? Would you torment your children forever, even if you had power to do so? I know you would not—your heart is too tender and too full of affection, to allow you to act so cruelly towards them. But, dear lady, are you better than God? Have you more love for your offspring than our heavenly Father has for his? Oh! think of this, and do not believe that you can be more merciful and affectionate than that Being who made you, and gave you all the affection you have for your children! What would you do for them, if you had the power? You would put into operation measures that would result in making them all good, upright, righteous and happy. Can you not believe that the great Parent of all, is anxious to have his children good and happy, as you can be to have yours? And remember, he has power, abundant, omnipotent power, to make them all become so whenever he thinks proper. Having all means at his command, will he not do a work so good as this? If the scriptures are true, he will make all his creatures in due time know him, and worship and glorify him. Allow me to quote a few passages to prove the truth of this declaration: 'All nations shall call him blessed.' Psalms lxxii. 17. 'All the ends of the earth shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before him.' Psalms xxii. 27. 'All nations whom thou hast made, shall come and worship before thee, O Lord, and shall glorify thy name. Psalms lxxxvi. 9. If you believe these declarations of the Most High, then you surely must believe he will finally bring all his children, the whole human family, to worship and adore him, to love and serve him.

The Creator is also a good and merciful Being—'The Lord is good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works.' Psalms cxlv. 9. And the mercy of God is not short and fleeting like man's—it is not confined to this life, but endures forever, and is over all his works. David says that the mercy of the Lord endureth forever! and hence his mercy will forever be over all his creatures. God is also a Being full of love. Hear the words of John: 'God is love.' Did you ever reflect upon the importance—the immense importance—of that declaration? The nature of God is love; he is all love, unmixed, impartial, everlasting love. Oh! what a delightful thought for the christian heart. We are told also in the scriptures that 'love worketh no ill to its neighbor.' As God is love, and as love worketh no ill, how can it be believed he will plunge the beings he has formed into ceaseless wo? This would be the work of a God of hatred and not of love. The influence of love is to do good, and not evil. Think of this, I beseech you, and do not dishonor the unchangeable God so much as to believe that his love can ever change to hatred towards any of his creatures.

He is also a God of justice. And I ask, can a just God torment forever his creatures for the sins of this life? This thought violates all our sense of justice. It would be revenge and retaliation—not equity. Do you really think, dear madam, that your husband committed sin enough to deserve endless wretchedness? I am certain you will not say so—Then do not believe so. There is no possible reason why such a thought should dwell in your mind. God will punish all his creatures as much as they deserve, and as much as will be for their good, and no more. Any punishment more than this, would be rank cruelty. I wish you to read the twelfth chapter of Hebrews; you will there learn that God chastises or punishes his creatures for their good, to make them partakers of his holiness—and hence he cannot punish them forever.

Do you entertain the heart-rending fear that your husband will be cast off forever by his heavenly Parent? Hear what the prophet says, and then banish entirely such a thought from your mind: 'The Lord will not cast off forever. But though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies; for he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men.' Lam. iii. 31. Read also Psalms ciii. 8, 9, and cxlv. 8, and Micah vii. 18. The whole Bible abounds with passages proving the truth of the heart-consoling doctrine, that God will eventually bring all his creatures to holiness, happiness and heaven. You will do me a great favor, and find much comfort to yourself, I am sure, by reading attentively and candidly, the following portions of scripture—Gen. xii. 3: xxii. 18: xxvi. 34: xxviii. 14. Acts iii. 25, 26. Gal. iii. 8. Isa. xlv. 22, 23, 24: xxv. 6, 7, 8. Jere. xxxi. 33. Heb. ii. 9. 1 John ii. 2. Acts iii. 20, 21. John iv. 42. Isa. lvii. 16. 1 John iv. 14. Rev. xv. 4: v. 13. Read the 5th and 11th chapters of Romans; also the 15th chapter of the First Epistle to the Corinthians, and 1st Timothy, 2d chapter. I would invite you to notice particularly in this last chapter, the words of the Apostle in 1 Tim. ii. 4, where he plainly declares that God 'will have all men to be saved and to come unto the knowledge of the truth.' Do you, dear madam, believe this blessed declaration? If you do not, then do you not disbelieve and reject God's holy word? But if you do, then you must believe that all men will finally be saved, and filled with purity and joy. Oh! happy thought—blissful anticipation! who does not desire to believe a truth so glorious—a truth which gives to angels their highest raptures! The heart of every christian who possesses the spirit of Jesus, must leap for joy, that the God, who is all powerful, and does his will in heaven and earth, has so plainly declared his determination to sanctify and save all his dependent creatures.

I am confident that you will allow that the scriptures afford a great amount of evidence in support of the doctrine of the final salvation of all men. But perhaps you will say, there are passages in the Bible which teach the doctrine of eternal pain. If this was really the case, then the scriptures would contradict themselves. But this cannot be—there is no contradiction and cannot be, in the word of God. There is not a passage in the Bible, which, when properly understood, teaches the awful, God-dishonoring doctrine of endless wo! This is not my opinion alone. It is an opinion which has been entertained and defended by many of the most learned and pious men in the christian church, from the days of Christ to the present time. Your children, I have no doubt, will furnish you with books, if you will read them, which will explain to you in the most consistent manner, all the passages which you now may suppose teach this soul chilling sentiment.

But you may entertain fear for your husband's happiness, because he was taken away suddenly, and without any preparation for death. You should remember that this was by the express direction of our heavenly Father. As he is a good being, and does every thing for good, it is our duty to believe he directed the death of your husband to be thus sudden, for some good and benevolent purpose. A being who loves all his creatures, will never allow any thing to befall them, which can be the source of ceaseless evil to them. If your companion was not prepared for his Maker's presence, God has the power to renovate and purify him, and make him in every sense fit and worthy to praise, and adore, and enjoy him forever.

We should believe the Creator will do this for every sinful child of humanity. No one can enter God's presence until he is fully prepared. Every member of the human family needs to be changed and renovated before they can stand before the throne of the Eternal, and find happiness there. But we believe that all will in due time be thus changed and prepared. If there are circumstances which prevent the accomplishment of this desirable change in this life, there is an abundance of time and means to bring it to pass in the life to come. This is the very work which belongs to Christ, as the Savior of the world. He came expressly to prepare all men for the purity and joy of heaven, and the presence of the beneficent Creator. Hence the Apostle says that Christ will reconcile all things to God. And after all have been prepared and made ready, then will they be allowed to enter upon the joys of eternal felicity. What a precious truth is this! Is it not calculated to give us joy unspeakable, to believe that not one poor, blinded sinner, shall be compelled to lie down in endless blackness and woe—not one wandering, wretched prodigal shall remain forever from his Father's house—but that Christ, the blessed Savior, shall seek and find all the lost sheep—shall bring all to repentance and reformation—shall induce the last prodigal to return—and that heaven shall be filled with loud rejoicing that the ransomed family of man have become as holy and happy as the angels of God?

I should be pleased to dwell longer upon this delightful subject, but time will not allow. Believe me, dear madam, yea, believe God, believe his holy word, which assures you that you have no cause to despair in regard to your husband. You should not sit down in gloomy repining at the providence of the wise and good Creator. It is your duty to strive to find consolation, and resignation and peace; and this consolation and peace you will find, by cherishing faith in the fullness of gospel grace and salvation. The word of God, which cannot lie, warrants you to indulge the blissful hope, that in due time, you will meet your departed companion—you will meet your dear children and all whom you love on earth—you will meet an entire, ransomed world—in the courts of bliss above, and rejoice with them forever more! Let me entreat you, as you value your own peace of mind, search until you find this glorious, this heavenly truth, which alone can speak peace to your troubled soul! Search the scriptures prayerfully and faithfully, until you behold the light of this happy faith—pray earnestly to God that you may see its divine beauties and enjoy its precious hopes! And let me beseech you to turn from the counsel of those who would persuade you not to search for this doctrine of God's universal grace. Heed not their advice, for it will cause you to remain still in the midst of those doubts and fears which send darkness and horror into the soul! That the Lord may assist you in all your researches and investigations, and enable you speedily to find that glorious truth and that precious faith which maketh free indeed, and which fills the soul with joy inexpressible, is the fervent prayer of

Your sincere friend,

THE DREAMER.

BY MISS M. A. DODD.

'A DARK, cold calm which nothing now can break,
Or warm, or brighten,—like that Syrian lake,
Upon whose surface, morn and summer shed
Their smiles in vain, for all beneath is dead.'

SOUL of mine, why art thou dreaming?
Dreaming through the weary day!
While life's precious hours are wasting,
Fast, and unimproved away.

With a world of beauty round me,
Lone and sad, I dwell apart;
Changing scenes can bring no pleasure,
To this wrecked and worn out heart.

Now I tempt the quiet ocean,
While the sky is bright above,
And the sunlight rests around me,
Like the beaming smile of love:

Or by waters softly flowing
Through the vale I wander now,
And the balmy breath of summer,
Fans my cheek and cools my brow.

But as well, to me, might darken
Over all the gloom of night;
For no quick and sweet sensations,
Fill my soul with new delight.

In the grass grown, silent church-yard,
With a listless step I rove;
But I shed no tear of sorrow,
By the graves of those I love.

Could I weep, the spell might vanish;
Tears would bring my heart relief;
Heart so sealed to all emotion,
Dead alike to joy and grief.

When the storm that shook my spirit,
Left its mission finished there,
Then a calm more fearful followed
Than the wildness of despair.

Whence the spell that chills my being?
Bidding every passion cease,
Closing every fount of feeling,
Say my spirit is it peace?

Wake! O, spell bound soul awaken!
Bid this sad delusion flee!
Such a lengthened dream is fearful;
Such a peace is not for thee.

Life is thine, and 'life is earnest';
Toil and grief ye may not shun;
But be hopeful and believing,
Till the prize of faith is won.

Then the peace ye may inherit,
By the Savior promised free;
Peace, the world destroyeth never;
Father, give that peace to me!

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF WOMAN'S LIFE. NO. I.

BY CHARLOTTE.

OUR MINISTER'S FAMILY.

GENTLE reader! I have so often and so elaborately described to you our little village, that I fear you will deem it but an idle repetition to descant once more upon its beauties; but had you ever visited Heathside, you would feel as I do, that it were impossible to describe a tithe of its charms. Yet it is to none of the scenes I have before described that I would now draw your attention, but to yonder neat white cottage, a short distance below the Parsonage on the opposite side. What a cool, shady appearance the thick, green foliage of those old apple trees give it—and how prettily it stands, not far from the margin of that willow-fringed pond! It is the residence of our Minister's Widow and her only daughter. There is one more feature in my landscape which must not be omitted; this is a small, humble edifice standing midway in yon green lane opposite the cottage, from which during several hours of the day issues the hum of voices, and at intervals, groups of merry children may be seen playing and shouting before the door, and giving unequivocal evidence that there the village school-mistress dispenses her discipline. What idea, fair reader, does that title conjure up in your mind? Does fancy present some old, wrinkled dame, with nicely plaited cap, spectacles on nose and ferule in hand—or the sharp, thin visage and shrill voice of an antiquated maiden? What a portrait of sweet Julia Cardonnel! Picture to yourself a venerable damsel of nineteen, tall, slender and graceful as a young willow, with a complexion fresh, yet delicate as the blended hues of the apple-blossom; exquisitely moulded features, large, soft grey eyes, veiled by long black silken lashes, full red lips, luxuriant hair with 'a single shade of chestnut on its gold,' a low, sweet voice and silvery laugh, and you have a tolerable likeness of our village school-mistress.

Julia Cardonnel is the orphan daughter of our former clergyman, and the only child that survives to cheer and bless the desolate heart of his widow. Many of the villagers remember the day when the young minister brought to the Parsonage his lovely bride, then in the first flush of youth and beauty. She was the youngest and favorite child of a doting old father, rich, and descended from a proud and ancient stock. Every indulgence that gold could purchase or affection bestow, was lavished upon her from her birth; not a wish of her heart had ever been thwarted, and her fond father looked forward to the time, when a brilliant marriage suited to her merits should place her among the noblest in the land. But unfortunately for this project, during a visit to some country relations, she became acquainted with Edward Cardonnel a young student of divinity; she passed several weeks constantly in his society, and when charmed with her beauty and captivated by her sweetness and grace of manner, he offered to her acceptance all he possessed, which was, in fact little more than his heart and hand, she referred him to her father without a doubt of the success of his suit. But though the loving and inexperienced maiden of sixteen never dreamed that Edward's want of fortune could be an obstacle to their wishes, her father had very different views of the subject; and when with a frank acknowledgement of his circumstances the young lover requested permission to address his mistress, he was formally dismissed and forbidden the entree of the house. Unused to contradictions, and accustomed to have every wish gratified, it was not to be supposed that the fair Julia's mind was in a state to bear this disappointment calmly; she wept, remonstrated and finally fretted herself sick, but the old man's mind was far too firmly set upon his own project, to be changed even by the tears of his darling child.

Opposition as is usually the case, only fostered the grande passion, and when Edward was settled over the society at Heathside, she braved the displeasure of her father, resigned the luxuries and elegance to which she had been accustomed, and forsook the proud mansion of her ancestors, to share the humble fortunes of the devoted pastor of a simple but affectionate flock. The parsonage was soon transformed by her tasteful hand into a delightful abode; many hued and beautiful flowers blossomed in the little garden before the door—the fragrant honey-suckle climbed almost to the roof and filled the air with its odor, and all within and without the house had an air of quiet and graceful simplicity far more attractive, than the gorgeous splendor of prouder dwellings. When Edward Cardonnel introduced his young wife into his humble abode, so different from the luxurious home of her childhood, he had not been wholly free from misgivings, lest her love should not be proof against the change, or lest its ardor should be damped by the prospect before her. But he had not fully estimated or understood her character; hers was one of those leal spirits, which are never laggard in a labor of love.

'Do not fear for me, dearest,' she said in reply to an intimation that had escaped her husband's lips, concerning her altered situation—'when I left my father's house to share your humbler fortunes, I knew well what was the task I undertook, and I am ready to brave all that may fall to my lot, and perform to the best of my ability the duties that devolve upon me as the wife of a poor man, and the help-meet of a servant of God, and if I gain your approbation, Edward, my labor will be well repaid.'

She set about her new avocations with a zeal and earnestness which soon rendered the most complicated of her domestic duties easy and simple, and by enabling her to discharge them in less time, afforded her leisure to accompany her husband in his visits to the sick and poor among his flock, and to offer relief and comfort to all who needed. In the year succeeding their marriage, a new and endearing tie, brought new cares and additional pleasures, and in the performance of her conjugal, maternal and social duties, Mrs. Cardonnel's happiness would have been complete, but for the remembrance of her aged father. She had written immediately after her arrival at Heathside, and still later, asking his forgiveness for this, her only act of disobedience, and requesting his benediction on a marriage which lacked his blessing only, to make its felicity perfect. But no answer was returned—the old man was inexorable, and had apparently cast out his youngest darling from her former place in his affections.

Years passed, and three children, sweet household treasures, now gladdened the Parsonage; the eldest, a girl, inherited her mother's name and beauty, while her temper and disposition presented a beautiful combination of the characteristics of both parents; for though gifted by nature with the playful gaiety and exuberant flow of spirits which had distinguished her mother's youth, yet from being in a great measure the pupil and companion of her father, she had imbibed, as it were, with his studious habits, the thoughtful gentleness of his manners. The second child was a pale, sickly, delicate boy, deformed from his earliest infancy by disease, but richly gifted with meekness, and displaying a patient endurance of the most acute suffering, which might have put many an older person to the blush. Poor Herbert! his was a weary lot, and yet how uncomplainingly he bore it; suppressing the faintest groan, and trying to smile, even while his brow was knit and his lip quivering with sharp agony, lest his mother's heart should be wrung by looking on the sufferings of her child. And if a sigh did sometimes escape him, as he sat in his chair by the window, or on the piazza before the door, on the long, bright summer days, and listened to the merry shouts of the boys as they pursued their active amusements on the green within sight of the house, enjoyments from which he was debarred, it was instantly checked, and taking up his book, he would thank God that he was not blind, and that so many blessings were yet left to him. There he would sit, day after day, reading, singing, or carving with his knife some curious toy for little Edward, a bright eyed, sunny haired, frolicsome child, the pet and plaything of the whole family,

Such was the group, which fifteen years after their marriage, twined round the hearts and blessed the dwelling of Edward and Julia Cardonnel; and if, at times, when she looked upon her children, and recalled her own childhood and girlhood, she sighed for her father's forgiveness, and for his blessing upon them; yet time and his implacability had, in a great measure, worn off her sorrow for her only act of disobedience towards him. Her lot had been one of happiness, and when her daily duties had been cheerfully performed, she found time to impart to her daughter the elegant accomplishments in which she in her youth had excelled, to cultivate the mind and heart of her afflicted boy, to amuse and instruct her youngest darling, and to join with her husband in improving the minds, and ministering to the necessities of the people of their charge. Idolized by her husband and children, beloved and respected by rich and poor, thus did Mrs. Cardonnel, the beauty and the belle, pursue the even tenor of her way.

But happiness so perfect and entire is not for this world, else should we never be willing to leave it; surrounded by prosperity, and friends faithful and beloved, how could we ever part from them even to gain heaven?—for truly, 'where the treasure is, there will the heart be also.' The dark wing of the angel of death overshadowed that peaceful dwelling, and the parents hung in agony over the shrouded form of their youngest born; there were sobs and tears at night, where in the morning had reigned joy and sunshine; but it was not for those on the darkness of whose hearts the star of salvation had risen, to mourn as 'those who have no hope,' and they soon ceased to grieve that the fair flower which had budded in the garden of their hearts, should blossom in deathless beauty on the banks of the pure River of Life! Dear as the sweet child had been to all, by none was his loss so keenly felt as by the poor, deformed Herbert. They had various avocations, and active employments to wean their minds from sorrow, but he, occupying the same seat, day after day, and engaged in the same monotonous routine of amusements, was constantly reminded of the lost one. His mother and Julia sought to divert his thoughts from such memories, by removing every book and plaything which had belonged to the child; but he saw their design, and one day looking up from a reverie into which he had fallen, and perceiving them intently regarding him, he said: 'Do not think I am mourning for either Edward or myself, for I know that he is an angel now, in that bright beautiful land of which you have so often told me, and though he cannot come back hither, yet I shall soon go to him; and there, dearest mother,' he continued, his eye brightening and his face irradiating as he spoke, with holy joy, 'there none shall scoff or mock at my infirmity, for God shall take away this poor, suffering, mis-shapen frame, and fashion it anew, like to Christ's glorious body, and there I shall meet Edward, and we shall walk hand in hand beside the crystal streams, and drink of the water of Life. Oh mother, when I think of him in that blissful clime, and then of myself, a sick, suffering and useless being, I can scarcely bear to wait my time.'

Not long did the boy pant for the realization of his dreams; Edward passed away with the summer flowers, and the frosts of October whitened the grave of Herbert Cardonnel. There were tearful eyes and quivering lips, when the little family met at the table or around the fireside in the long winter evenings succeeding their double bereavement; they missed that bright head with its golden curls, and that other pale, meek face with its large, spiritual eyes and intellectual brow—and when the evening hymn was sung, they listened in vain for the two young voices that were wont to pour forth their melody.

That winter passed. Spring came and went, and ere summer had thrown down her garland, a new sorrow had entered the hearts of the mother and daughter. Mr. Cardonnel's health was evidently failing; his untiring devotion to his parochial duties, combined with the grief and anxiety of the preceding months, had wrought fearful ravages on his naturally delicate constitution, and his wife and Julia listened with fear and distress to his short and difficult respiration, and to the quick, dry cough which succeeded every effort in speaking or reading; and his people who were fondly attached to him, sighed and shook their heads, as they remarked his attenuated form and languid movements, his sharpened features and the bright crimson spot which burnt on his hollow and sunken cheek. As the autumn approached his symptoms grew even more alarming, and his terrified family sent for a physician of the neighboring city, who was celebrated for his skill in pulmonary complaints. He came, looked on the patient, heard the recital of his symptoms, and was silent. His benevolent heart shrunk from the fulfillment of the physician's hardest task; he looked round on the little group—his eyes turned from the countenance of the victim, calm, placid and resigned, yet bearing the fatal signet of consumption, to the pale, sweet face of the wife, and the fresher loveliness of the daughter, both wearing the same expression of hope faintly struggling with the sickening and terrible fear, and he felt he could not deceive them; he could not raise hopes that would prove fallacious, and yet how could he bear to crush them with that dreadful intelligence. Thrice he essayed to speak, but failed in the attempt, and just as he was making another and desperate effort, unable longer to endure the suspense, Mrs. Cardonnel grasped his hand, and with a voice that sounded strangely sharp and shrill to her hearers, she exclaimed, 'O do not say that he must die, do not crush a heart already bruised and bleeding—he may yet be saved, medicine and kind, devoted attention will soon restore him—oh, bid me not despair, tell me that I may hope, and I will kneel and bless you.'

'Julia,' said the sick man, and in an instant his wife was at his side—'calm yourself, my beloved, and listen with christian resignation to the physician's sentence, be it of life or death. God has been very merciful to us, dearest! Sixteen happy years we have passed together, and if it be his will to separate us now, we must not murmur or repine; and now, doctor, we are ready to hear your decision.'

'I cannot deceive you, my friend, nor would I if I could. I will not deny that your case is dangerous, but while there is life, there is hope, and though your health can never be restored, your days may, I think, be prolonged by a sojourn in a more genial climate. I will not offer you medicines, for they would be useless, but if I can aid you in any thing relating to your journey, my services will be freely tendered;' and with a few soothing words, the kind hearted physician took his departure.

Faint as was the hope he held out to her, Mrs. Cardonnel clung to it with the greatest tenacity, and at length by her earnest pleadings, and moving entreaties, succeeded in gaining her husband's consent. The only obstacle now, was the state of their finances; small as was the salary of a country parson, frugality and economy had enabled them to lay by yearly a portion, to be reserved for sickness or any particular exigence; and to what better purpose could it be devoted, than to the recovery of that dear one's health? To this sum a few of the wealthier part of his parishioners added sufficient to defray the expenses, and having made arrangements to supply the pulpit during his absence, the Cardonnels bade adieu to their home, and ere the winter opened, were comfortably settled in pleasant lodgings in one of the sunny vales of France. To this place they had been recommended by the worthy doctor, who had furnished them with a letter of introduction to a young physician, a friend of his own, who was sojourning there for the benefit of an invalid sister's health. As soon, therefore, as they were settled in their new abode, the letter was despatched to Dr. Maynard's lodgings, and the ensuing day the Doctor and his sister called on the new comers. The visit was one of mutual pleasure; the Maynards came to mark their respect for their old friend by showing every courtesy and attention to his friends, and in like manner did the Cardonnels receive them; but ere an hour had passed, all felt that a nearer affinity than that of country existed between them—the tie of kindred minds; and had a stranger looked in upon them as they sat there on that first visit, he would have deemed them old friends meeting after a long separation. They had a common topic of interest too, in their solicitude concerning the beloved ones who had brought them thus in contact, and they spoke hopefully and cheerfully of the happy change the climate was to effect. For some time their hopes seemed likely to be realized. The warm, genial air, wholesome exercise and pleasant society, seemed to produce a favorable effect upon the feeble frames of the invalids, especially that of Mr. Cardonnel; his step grew firmer, his cough abated, and he began to talk hopefully of returning home; he already looked forward to the happy meeting with his friendly people, and spoke of the satisfaction he should experience in seeing once more his own pretty church, his beloved home, and the little grave-yard where slept the loved and lost. But as the time fixed for their departure approached, his worst symptoms returned; Dr. Maynard would have recommended his travelling still farther south, but the sick man had neither strength nor spirits to attempt it; and at length in a violent paroxysm of coughing, he burst a blood vessel, and all knew that his case was hopeless. Ere the day to which he had fondly looked forward arrived, he slept with the thousands of foreigners who have found a final resting place in the precincts of Pere le Chaise.

With sorrowing hearts the widow and her daughter prepared for their return, and the day after their embarkation, Dr. Maynard and his sister were on their passage to Italy.

Every sabbath since their minister's departure, had prayers been offered in the village church of Heathside, for the recovery of his health and his speedy restoration to his people; the letters that were received encouraged their hopes, and they were gladly anticipating his return, when the tidings of his death reached them. There was sorrow in every dwelling, when the news was spread through the village, and fervent petitions arose from every heart that night, that the bereavement might be sanctified not to them only, but more especially to the afflicted ones who in a far land mourned the loss of their dearest earthly friend. And when in due time, the travellers arrived, each sought by affectionate sympathy and attentive kindness to them, to manifest their love and respect for him who was gone forever.

When the first freshness of the sorrowful sensations called forth by visiting the 'old familiar places,' had in some measure worn off, a new consideration presented itself to Julia's mind, and this was, their future mode of life, and the means by which that living was to be obtained. The first step to be taken was to provide a residence, for though since their return they had continued inmates of the Parsonage, it was no longer home, and the minister who was to be settled in Mr. Cardonnel's place, had a large family, for whose accommodation the dwelling would barely suffice. Several of their friends had proffered to the mother and daughter a home in their own families, but they were far too proud to be dependent; and blest with youth, health and a good education, Julia had no doubt of her own ability to gain a subsistence for both. But how was this to be effected, and in what manner were her talents to be brought into action? This question did Julia ask herself continually, but unable to answer it, she at length resolved to apply to her friends for advice, and abide by their decision. But so various were their opinions, and so undecided their decisions, that the client was as much at a loss as before. One recommended her to enter a genteel family as a private governess, but that would separate her from her mother, and they were all that were left to each other, and must not be parted. Another advised her to remove to the city, and there profit by her knowledge of the French idiom, and the perfect accent she had acquired during her residence in France, by giving lessons in the language. This appeared the more feasible plan of the two, but on mentioning it to her mother, Mrs. Cardonnel expressed such a dread of removing to the city, and such an anxious desire to dwell in the place where her happiest days had been past, that Julia at once renounced the idea, and endeavored to procure employment at fine and ornamental needle-work, an accomplishment in which she excelled. But having soon discovered that the most untiring industry would barely afford them the necessities of life, and as each family contrived to do their own plain sewing, she was utterly at a loss to what pursuit to turn her attention, and was almost in despair at the failure of her projects, when the death of the old dame, under whose superintendence 'the ideas' of the young villagers had for many years been 'taught to shoot,' left vacant the post of village school-mistress; and at a meeting of the principal men of the village, who constituted the 'Committee,' it was proposed by one of them to request the minister's daughter to undertake the charge of the school. Accordingly, with some hesitation and many apologies for offering her a situation so far below her merits and accomplishments, the proposition was made, and having been thankfully accepted, Miss Cardonnel was soon established in her new vocation. Humble though it be, it suffices for all the simple wants of the mother and daughter, and the poor suppliant is never turned, unrelieved, from their door; there in yonder neat cottage they dwell together satisfied, and happy in each other's affection; and any bright summer morning, you may see them working industriously before school hours in their little garden, or after sunset taking their accustomed walk down the lane, and never failing to rest awhile in the church-yard beside the graves of those dear children, and speaking tearfully, but with no vain sorrow or regret, of him whose body rests in a far distant land, but whose spirit they fondly trust, is looking down from its bright abode upon those whom on earth he loved so tenderly.

Julia entered upon her new labors with a cheerful spirit, and an earnest desire to promote the interests of her young charge, and eminently successful she has been. Parents no longer complain of their children's reluctance to go to school, for the first sound of the bell is anticipated by groups of rosy, smiling children, watching for their teacher, and hailing her appearance with unfeigned delight. Perfect order and decorum reign in the school, though the pupils are no longer terrified into submission by the harsh voice and frown of the mistress, or awed by the ominous sound of the ponderous ferule; but a more powerful sentiment than fear influences her scholars, and hardy and reckless indeed would that urchin be, who would barter the sweet smile and kindly commendation of Miss Cardonnel, for the unsatisfying pleasures of disobedience. It is the golden age of our village school, and should any question the beauty and efficacy of Julia's system of instruction and discipline, they have only to follow her in one of her frequent visits to the dwellings of her pupils, and witness the joy her presence creates; to see the group of little ones cling around her, and hear their earnest strivings for the seat of honor on her knee, to feel that her rule is that of gentleness, and that the secret of her sway is—LOVE! In short, I think I have fairly made out that Julia Cardonnel is a nonpareil—the pattern for daughters, and the paragon of village school-mistresses. But, alack and alas! 'How blessings brighten, as they take their flight!' It is now two years since Julia first took charge of the village school, and we had fondly hoped from her indifference to all the beaux, within the scope of whose admiration she came, that despite her youth, beauty and other fascinations, she would remain a fixed star in the orbit where she moved so gracefully and well. But one fine afternoon, some six weeks ago, a chaise was seen entering our village drawn by a beautiful bay horse,—ah! we little thought what mischief it was bringing us! not that there was any thing peculiar about the vehicle, for though very handsome, it was plain, and unornamented, neither did the horse wear any particular expression which could lead us to think he meditated any invasion of our rights and privileges; and for the inmates of the chaise, one was a fine looking young man of seven or eight and twenty, and the other, a fair, delicate girl of eighteen; and the whole cortege, horse, carriage and individuals might have passed through the place, untouched by the breath of suspicion, had not the gentleman reined in his steed at the door of the inn, and inquired for the residence of Mrs. Cardonnel. This unlucky question set the full tide of rumor afloat, nor was the curiosity of the villagers at all allayed by witnessing the cordial welcome with which the widow and her daughter greeted the strangers, by their long stay at the cottage, or by the inability of all to discover who they were, and whence they came. For more than three weeks did this mystery remain unsolved. Every afternoon about the time fixed for dismissing the village school, that identical horse and chaise might be seen at the gate of the cottage, sometimes bringing the lady and gentleman, but oftener the gentleman alone; and very often Julia and the mysterious stranger were detected walking tete-a-tete, and always deeply engaged in conversation. But at length that season of suspense came to an end. The young girl who assisted Mrs. Cardonnel in her domestic duties, gave to a friend as a great secret, (immediately circulated, of course) the information that the visitors were Dr. Maynard, a physician in the neighboring city, and his sister; that they were travelling in France at the same time with the Cardonnels, and were with them at the time of their bereavement. But the satisfaction with which this intelligence was received, was quickly embittered by the additional news, namely, that Miss Julia was going to give up her school, to be married to the handsome young doctor! At first we tried to shut our eyes and ears against the unpleasant conviction, but truth, however disagreeable, will force itself upon us, and the fact is now self-evident, and beyond the shadow of a doubt, that we are about to lose our pretty school-mistress. A lady, recommended by Dr. Maynard, is to take, but alas! we fear not to supply her place; various preparations, ominous of a wedding, are going busily forward at the cottage, and did we need further proof, for two successive sabbaths has our church door borne ample testimony to the matrimonial intentions of George Maynard and sweet Julia Cardonnel. The widow is to reside with her daughter in the city, but a portion at least of every summer, they are to spend at Heathside; and here I would not forget to mention, that time and misfortune have softened the anger of Mrs. Cardonnel's father, that he is forgiving and forgiven, and that his daughter and her child have been joyfully welcomed to the old man's heart and home.

And now, what farther have I to say, unless I inform you that the bay horse still pertinaciously persists in finding his way to the little white cottage; that the bustle of preparation is nearly over, and that we are daily expecting to hear our old church bell chime merrily in honor of the marriage of the young Dr. Maynard and our gentle and beautiful Minister's Daughter.

SONNET TO ENCKE'S COMET.

AGAIN thou comest on thy fiery race,
 Thou vap'ry wand'rer of the upper deep;
 From out the dark and dread abyss of space,
 Thou circlest worlds in thy majestic sweep.
 What is thy mission? Tell us fearful star!
 Dost thou foretell some dire event on earth?
 Does thy approach portend some bloody war?
 Or dost thou herald some illustrious birth?
 Speed round the sun! we'll question thee no more;
 Speed on, and leave us with thy fiery train;
 Go in the track thou'st often trod before,
 And when thou wilt, come back to us again.
 And then we'll ask thee of those worlds on high,
 Which far beyond our own dim vision lie.

CONNECTION OF SCIENCE WITH RELIGION.

BY REV. E. H. CHAPIN.

EXTRACTS FROM A DISCOURSE ON ENCKE'S COMET.

'He telleth the number of the stars; he calleth them all by their names.'

A. 147. 4.

WHY should not the religious teacher open the volume of science, and read therefrom reverently? If everything around us, as plainly seems, is solicitous for the true education of that grandest of created existences—spirit, surely we should open the pulpit to their teachings. We would not bring there our retort and crucible, our fossil and shell, our telescope, and make it the desk of a mere abstract, scientific disquisition; but we could employ the conclusions that these have revealed. We would bring the great fact that the chemist still finds in the mysterious elements, that the geologist tears from the hoary strata, and the astronomer brings down from suns and systems, the great fact, so varied in each and yet the same through all, that ever points inward to the soul, and upward to God.

If they do wrong who lose the vividness and the life of Religion in abstract Science and intellectual pride; so, on the other hand, they do wrong, who refuse the aid that Nature, from her ample domain, proffers to the MASTER-PRINCIPLE. On either hand, it is a divorcement of Science from Religion, a divorcement that is not required, that is injurious, that seems contrary to the practice of the greatest philosophers, and also of those bible-writers, who could mingle their hymns of penitence and their prayers for spiritual aid, with acknowledgements of the mighty handiwork of God, and the beauty and regularity of His agents in Nature.

UNIVERSAL LAW AND ORDER.

We are taught by the comet the great fact—that order comprehends the universe, and that law controls every existence. Whether the story of Newton and the apple be true or not, if the apple, upon becoming detached from the tree, falls downward to the earth—this is a particular fact. But if we carry out this observation to all other bodies without the influence of our planet, we find that they likewise invariably seek the centre of the earth—and this is a general fact. From this we reach the grand principle that binds together all the parts of the universe, from a drop of water to a world, and to systems. But back of the fact lies something else. Why should the apple fall downward, instead of upward, or horizontally? Why should all bodies within the earth's atmosphere tend to the earth's centre; and why should matter attract matter, reciprocally, universally, from the atom to the star? The only answer that can be given is—it is a LAW; the law of gravitation. So, Nature is not a mere congeries of facts, it is a system of law. Chaos would be a fact, and so would anarchy; but they would be lawless facts. Is there nothing chaotic, nothing lawless, in the great system of things that develope and glide and lie and sparkle around us?

In the minds of men in former times, nay, perhaps, in some of our own time, this question, probably, would have been answered in the affirmative. They would have referred to those wispy, ghostlike forms, that with long and gleaming hair, and mystic track come, ever and anon, rushing athwart the firmament, and then plunged into boundless abyses of space, far, far beyond the ken of eye or telescope. These were visitors of dread and wonder—the ready omens of imaginative superstition. * * * * * Without the telescope, without Science, without diffused knowledge, it is no wonder that the men of those times should have regarded the comet as a lawless yet potent body, a flaming prophet of wrath, sent down through the unknown space to speak of famine, pestilence and war. The proximity of a comet to an unfruitful season; the nearness of its time to the birth or the death of a great man—as was the case with Mithridates and Julius Cæsar; its seeming connection with disease—as is said to have been the case when one appeared in 1305, which was followed by a Great Plague; its union with disaster and defeat—as in 1456, when Mohammed the second took Constantinople and thrilled Christendom with fear; *—all these coincidences, either seeming or real, either wholly true or exaggerated, would naturally cause the comet to blaze in the lurid light of a mysterious messenger knowing no laws but those comprised in its temporary commission; or a homeless wanderer, whose track was over the wide, far heaven, through all its depths and through all its courses, without guidance and without purpose. But the eye of Science has discovered that the comet is not lawless. The same power that Newton saw holding worlds in its influence, and binding its spell upon systems—the power of gravitation—this also is a law to the comet, and secures the hairy meteor in its courses. There are comets that have regular orbits about the sun, the periods of their revolution are calculated, their return and departure looked for with unerring expectation. And though others may plunge into eccentric paths, and though they may be affected by the attraction of different spheres, still that all are obedient to a grand law, and move by a confirmed purpose, seems now a certainty.

Thus, then, I say, the comet may teach us that Order comprehends the universe, and that law controls every existence. The most eccentric path in heaven is the orbit of a perfect regularity, and the vacillating meteor vacillates because of a law. Nothing in nature is lawless. The atom that thou treadest beneath thy feet, has sure affinities to some lesser atom that thine eye cannot see; and yet knows its relationship to this vast earth, and to solar orbs that blaze in distant space. The drop of water drawn up in the sun, falling in the shower, curtained in the rainbow, embosomed in the ocean's sweep, pendent from the leaf, or trickling from the rock; is in every place still under a mighty law, still is linked with the universal economy, and contributes its share to the carrying out of an unvarying and triumphant purpose. There are mysteries in the universe, there are, also, deep calls for a humble and devout spirit—but not for a sceptical or despairing one. There is no such thing in nature as confusion, or chance. What thou seest that looks chaotic, or accidental, is only fragmentary—is only transition, or the process of a great design. Thou mayst stand at the centre, or at the limit of created things, and thou wilt thus see only a part—abrupt and perplexed enough, it may be, to thine eye. But couldst thou behold the whole, then would the system of the universe stretch out fair and harmonious; wheels within wheels, it is true, revolving and intertwining in mighty mazes; but still, as little, or as far as thy vision may extend, of that vast wheel that to thee seems to comprehend and drive all the rest, the circumference is ever ORDER, and the motive-power LAW. * * * The comet, a creature apparently so wayward and mischievous under the darkness of superstition, in the light of science how accurate and beautiful does it appear!—a part of the grand whole, with the flower and the planet, the rain-drop and the sun. That ship of flame! Over the unmeasured ocean of space it sails, and the intellect cannot fathom its deep, far soundings. We cannot tell what unseen planet-lands it may visit, through what tides and currents it bears its heady course, or in what air it reefs or unfurls its streaming sails. But we can calculate its time, we can know the distance of its path, we can tell when again it shall loom upon our vision, laden with the mysteries of other worlds, and come rushing down by our sun, scattering the flakes of fire from its glittering keel.

And now does not this lead us up to wonder and adore Him who has made it so? In whose greatness our science dwindles to such a little point, and our pride of intellect falls prostrate in the dust. What know we? What can we declare? He telleth the number of the stars; He calleth them all by their names!

THE WORTH AND IMPORTANCE OF MIND.

The comet may lead us to reflect somewhat upon man's nature and his destiny. If anything can demonstrate the worth and greatness of mind, it is the progress which has been made in the science of Astronomy. Let us turn to the books, and read some of the wonderful results of 'patient and mighty thought,' and we shall be thrilled with astonishment at the power of the human intellect. And perhaps nothing more clearly evinces this, than the vast and minute computations that have measured the times and the motions of comets. Of this we have a vivid illustration in the case of the comet of the long period—Halley's comet.* Added to the preliminary and arduous labors of Halley, were those of Clairaut, Lalande and Madame Lepaute. They entered into a vast computation. 'During six months,' says Lalande, 'we calculated from morning to night, sometimes even at meals;' an 'enormous labor, in which it was necessary to calculate the distance of each of the two planets, Jupiter and Saturn, from the comet, and their attraction upon that body separately, for every successive degree, and for one hundred and fifty years.†' The result was a prediction of the return of this comet, that for seventy-five years had been wandering in the vast abyss of space—a prediction that it would be nearest the sun on the 4th of April, 1759. It appeared on the 13th of March, only twenty-three days before the time set. Here, then, was a triumphant instance of human calculation—a calculation, it must be remembered, in which it was confessed that there might be some causes in existence to accelerate or retard that precise time. The planet Herschell had not then been discovered, and one of the causes alluded to was this—'The probability of an undiscovered planet of our system, revolving beyond the orbit of Jupiter.' 'In twenty-two years after that period, this conjecture was accurately fulfilled by the discovery of the planet Herschell, revolving round the sun one thousand millions of miles beyond the planet Saturn.‡'

The last appearance of that comet was in 1835. The Edinburgh Review, in the article just quoted from, written in that year, announced the appearance of that comet to every part of Europe, about the latter end of August, or beginning of September. What was the fact? The comet was discovered in Rome on the fifth of August, in England and France on the twenty-third, and at Yale College on the thirty-first.§ Again—the Review predicted that on the night of the seventh of October the comet would approach the constellation of the Great Bear, and between that and the eleventh would pass through the seven conspicuous stars of that constellation. What was the fact? About the tenth of October it did approach that spot, only 'passing a little above instead of "through" the stars alluded to. Again—the Review announced that towards the end of November, it would be lost among the rays of the sun, and would issue from them on the other side in the end of December. What says

* For an account of this, let the reader consult the article referred to above. He will be particularly struck with the description of the labors of Clairaut, Lalande, and Madame Lepaute.

the fact? 'Early in November,' says Professor Olmsted, 'the comet ran down to the sun and was lost in his beams, but on the morning of December thirty-first, I again obtained a distinct view of it on the other side of the sun.'*

And now, what is this power within us, that thus can read and predict with such accuracy the comings and goings of those fiery coursers of the sky? What a power has the mind evinced in astronomy! Its vision extends into future ages before which the years of the earth dwindle to nothing. Its calculations are prophecies. It makes a 'chronometer' of 'the sun'—an index of the comet. It sets the long marches of eternity to the chime of the morning-stars. What is this power? Is it a material thing? Does it perish with this earth-body that engirts us? Is the premiss of the Atheist sound? Do we stand upon this little earth, and yet send out our thoughts to fathom without lead or line the ocean of space, and to measure the farthest star, and yet does that thought die, become extinct, while the earth rolls on, and the star blazes forever? It cannot be. Mind is deathless. It stands now but in the vestibule of its existence, darkling or glowing under the lights and shadows of inexplicable mysteries, and immortal revelations. But if the Atheist wrongs the mind, does not he also deeply wrong it who mars its fine powers, who taints them with sin, who keeps his soul back from God and from the Fountain of Eternal Life?

THE CHRISTIAN CAPTIVE TO HER PERSECUTORS.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

GOLD! gold! I hate it! What have I
To do with molten dust?
Go—leave me here in peace to die—
In anguish, if I must!
What? Gold to buy the priceless mind?
Away! ye might as well
Attempt the God of heaven to bind
By some weak wizard spell!
Go breathe the wish to graveyard dust—
The soul is an immortal trust!

Freedom? Alas! its name is sweet,
'Twas near my heart of old—
But why need I the sound repeat?—
The dream is idly told!
Ye'd make me free in limb and breath,
Free o'er the earth to stray;
But not to kneel in my own faith—
Not free to praise and pray!
My body, if ye will, control!
But touch not—come not near my soul!

'Tis long since in my mother's eye
I read love's deep romance,

And my young sister is not by
With her soft, melting glance;
The heart-wrung prayer, the hollow groan
From some adjacent cell,
Are all the sounds that I have known
Since I came here to dwell.
The heart, accustomed to love's tones,
Finds little music in these moans!

But why lament that I am here?
Is not my God here, too?
You may shut out all else that's dear,
But His love will break through!
Bind on the fetters till they break
The limbs ye would confine;
Despite of chains or racks I'll make
This cell a christian shrine!
Here will I worship with my thought
In that pure way my Savior taught!

Then leave me—leave me here to die!
I will not be beguiled;
Whatever woes my heart may try
I still am God's own child.
I am not leaning on a reed—
My Father's arm is strong—
Eased from these earthly wounds that bleed
I shall find rest ere long.
Take back your gold—and buy you bread—
On 'hidden manna' I am fed!

And when with idle mocking words
Ye would breathe freedom's name,
Go breathe it to th' unprisoned herds,
That have no souls to tame;
Or preach it to the wild free winds
That ask it not of you;
But learn that human hearts and minds
Have the same birth-right too.
Foolish! to think faith could be sold
For fetters broken, or for gold!

THE RELATIONSHIP SUBSISTING AMONG MANKIND.

BY REV. O. A. SKINNER.

As THE reciprocal duties required of mankind, grow principally out of their relationship to each other, it is important that this should be always kept distinctly in view; for then they will see the necessity of being faithful in the performance of their duties, and will assiduously guard against the influence of whatever would tempt them to the commission of any wrong. For this reason, when the prophet Malachi saw the people of Israel divided and contending among themselves, he asked—Have we not all one Father? Hath not one God created us? Why then deal ye treacherously every man with his neighbor? These questions were proposed, that the people of Israel might see how their divisions and contentions tended to their injury; for it is a fact that all are injured, more or less, by the general prevalence of vice.

They are injured in their property; for, aside from the immediate loss from the depredations of the vicious, how vast is the amount paid annually for the conviction, punishment and support of criminals. They are injured in their rights; for if one seeks to advance the interests of society by encouraging trade, agriculture, the arts, sciences and good principles, he has a right to demand that all who are to reap the advantages shall co-operate with him, instead of seeking to defeat his purposes; he has a right also, to live secure from those lawless invasions which are constantly recurring in consequence of the reign of sin. They are injured too, by the effect which sin has to ensnare the young, to endanger the virtue and security of the inexperienced, to blunt the moral sensibilities of a community, and to lower the standard of virtue. Indeed, mankind are so intimately connected in their relations and interests, that what injures one, injures all, and whatever benefits one, benefits all. It was therefore, with great propriety that the prophet asserted the general brotherhood of the world as a reason why they should not be divided and contentious.

This, however, was not the only reason. He appealed to this relationship, because there are no ties so strong as those of kindred. How ardently do we love the brethren of our father's household; how pure is the friendship which we cherish for them! Nothing then could have been more likely to heal the divisions or check the contentions of the people of Israel, than directing their attention to their common origin, and exciting their brotherly affection. If we have any doubt of this, let us reflect upon the wide difference there is between the intercourse of the members of a family, and that of the members of a nation. Avarice seldom leads a brother to wrong a brother; but how often does it lead man to wrong a fellow man. Now this difference is chiefly owing to the fact that the ties of brotherhood are more active in the one case than in the other. How wise then in the prophet to show the treacherous and contentious people of Israel, that they were brethren, members of one great family. In no other way could he have done so much to unite them in love.

Keep in mind, therefore, in all conditions of life, that those with whom you mingle and deal, are your brethren; and that whatever you do for their injury, you do against the general interests of mankind, and against your own brethren. Deal not, then, treacherously with any man; be not contentious or unkind; but treat all, of every country, caste, color or condition, as you would an own brother.

MAN. How sad is the picture when we look abroad upon the earth, and witness the strivings and contentions existing between mankind, arising solely from narrow views and jealousy. Men should remember that they are members of one great household, and their mother, earth, the nurse of them all. PR.

CONTENTMENT.

BY REV. SEBASTIAN STREETER.

CONTENTMENT is justly entitled to a high rank among christian virtues. Few, if any, deserve a more elevated station. It is one of the more indispensable ingredients in the cup of human felicity. In its absence, even life itself, however eligible its condition, and prosperous its course may be in other respects, must be dark and burdensome.

Contentment, however, is not a virtue merely, but a solemn duty. In his word, God has expressly and repeatedly enjoined it upon christians; and what he thus enjoins is inseparable from their higher interests, and demands their cheerful and profound consideration.

'Having food and raiment,' says Paul to Timothy, 'let us be therewith content.' 1 Tim. vi. 8. In the epistle to the Hebrews, chap. xiii. 5, the same injunction substantially occurs, though varied a little with respect to phraseology.

'Let your conversation be without covetousness; and be content with such things as ye have; for he hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee.' And in his letter to the Philippians, the Apostle gives us to understand, that he had succeeded in yielding to this divine requisition a cheerful obedience. 'I have learned,' says he, 'in whatsoever state I am, therewith, to be content.' This was surely a high and very commendable attainment. Were he not mistaken in this estimate of his acquisitions, Paul had mastered a lesson which but few, very few, comparatively, have ever been able to learn. 'I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content.' How exceedingly different was the Apostle in this respect from the great mass of mankind? He had brought his mind and his feelings into a state of cheerful acquiescence with any condition, in which the providence of his God might place him; but men in general, and even professed christians, have learned to be content with no condition whatever. A spirit of dissatisfaction and restlessness seems to form their ruling passion, the principal divinity which presides over them by night and by day. A complaint is perpetually on their lips, or a murmur in their hearts. From their general appearance and habits, the conviction can scarcely be repressed, that disquietude and repining constitute the leading business of their existence. In health and in sickness; in affluence and in poverty; when wafted onward by the gales of prosperity, or driven about by the storms of adversity; raised to the heights of power and dominion, or doomed to tread the lowly rounds of private life, they exhibit the same uneasy and fretful disposition. In a word, no condition which the earth affords, can meet their wishes, fully satisfy the towering and ambitious aspirations which reign within them.

Compared with this frame of mind, how beautiful and lovely was that of Paul, and no doubt of all those who had been 'taught of God the truth as it is in Jesus!' They had no will of their own, no ambitious or selfish ends to answer. The ruling sentiment of their hearts was, 'The will of the Lord be done;' and hence they were perfectly satisfied with any station in life, and any state of their affairs, which his holy pleasure might demand. This was a truly enviable attainment, and one to which every christian ought ardently to aspire. Contentment opens to the mind and the heart a source of pure and permanent rest. Moderating the ambition of the powerful, and cheering the depression of the weak, it sheds through the soul of each a serene and tranquil felicity. It is clothed with the peculiarly happy power to raise its subjects above the influence of those fluctuations of feeling, to which other and opposite states of mind are continually exposed. And this is a state, it should be carefully remembered, which cannot be reached without the most resolute and persevering efforts. It is not the result of accident, nor the production of an occasional and momentary exertion; but the fruit of a high and fixed purpose of the soul, steadily and firmly pursued. It is a boon so difficult of attainment, as to allow of not a moment's indifference or relaxation. We are perpetually surrounded by the very elements of alarm and uneasiness. Occasions of discontent, in its incipient stages, at least, lurk in every path we tread, and every position we occupy, in the present life.

From the heights of power and wealth, numbers are every day falling into the vale of obscurity and poverty. The great, therefore, and the affluent, perpetually harassed by the fear of a reverse of fortune, are strangers to every thing which deserves the name of contentment.

Talents and persevering efforts are often seen to elevate their subjects to the very pinnacle of dominion and fame, and hence the humble in birth and in fortune are prompted to incessant and painful struggles, to become identified with this favored number. They are never at rest, but constantly tossed and driven about by the alternate ebbs and flows of the tide of fortune. They are now the victims of fear, and anon the 'prisoners of hope,' as good or ill luck attends their efforts for the time being. But whether prospered or repulsed, they are about equally restless and discontented. Retrogression in their affairs is but another name for torture, and progression tends chiefly to feed a spirit of ambition, which is found to be exceedingly uncomfortable.

Hale and vigorous constitutions are daily undermined and crushed by the power of disease; and hence the healthy and athletic are made to tremble and agonize under the painful apprehension of approaching sickness. On the other hand, the diseased and wasted are not unfrequently raised to a high state of health and firmness, and the sick, therefore, resolutely struggle with the most malignant disorders, refuse to yield to the rigor of their force, and hope to the last, to become the subjects of a similar interposition of restoring power. Now amidst such conflicting scenes, the attainment of a contented state of mind is extremely difficult. It is an acquisition too high and unearthly for the grasp of human reason, or of the boasted philosophies of the world. It is the production of a loftier and holier agency. It is a habit of the soul which can be reached only through the medium of the knowledge of God; of the principles and designs of his moral government; of sober and habitual communion with them; of a high degree of practical virtue.

The ignorant, the thoughtless, the dissolute and licentious cannot possess a contented mind. No; they are 'like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt.' Genuine contentment is based upon just conceptions of the character and government of the Maker and Ruler of the world, and of all things that are in it. He, and he only, who is solemnly conscious that a kind and paternal providence presides over his destinies; that the God who made, and has hitherto sustained him, works 'all things after the counsel of his own will,' and that 'his will is good, and perfect, and acceptable,' can be the subject of a calm and contented spirit. No one else can be truly satisfied with his condition.

But the virtue of contentment, great and valuable as it is, may be carried to extremes. It often has been. Men are fond of speculating; of striking out new tracts of thought; of deducing new and startling results from old and familiar premises; and speculation, it is well known, rarely stops within reasonable limits. Its diseased taste can relish nothing which does not savor strongly of extravagance. With a religion, or a morality, which assumes, not an air of mystery and of wonder, it has no sympathy. Hence the virtue of contentment has been made to appear more like a monster, than an humble christian grace. Nearly every vestige of its native consistency, and truth, and power to win the affections of the soul and subject them to its own dominion, has, either ignorantly or rudely, been torn from it, and by those too, who have professed to be its admirers and friends.

It has been contended by theologians of no ordinary eminence, that we ought to be perfectly contented with our destiny, if God should banish us eternally from his presence and favor, and consign us to the realms of interminable torment. A real christian, it has often been said, would be perfectly contented in hell, were he placed there by the will of the Almighty! What an extravagant folly! What an outrage upon reason and common sense! What a monstrous absurdity! What constitutes hell? Is it not misery, suffering, the corroding and intense agony, produced by guilt? Most assuredly it is. Could there be happiness in hell, then, even to the most eminent christian, were he placed there? Certainly not. Aside from the fact, that a real christian cannot, morally speaking, be placed in hell, not even by the efforts of Omnipotence itself, to affirm that he would be contented there, is as absurd as to contend, that a real christian would be perfectly happy in complete misery; that he would be perfectly holy, though plunged in the very depths of moral pollution; that spiritual honors would cluster and bloom upon his brow, though he were doomed to the blackest crimes and the deepest infamy. But, kind reader, the scriptures involve no such follies and absurdities. According to their teachings, contentment, like every other virtue, is a reasonable exercise, or more properly perhaps, state of the mind. It does not conflict with any law of our nature, with any duty, nor with any relation or interest of our existence. It is the antagonist of every vice, the companion and encourager of every virtue. It is not the spirit of indifference, of indolent ease, nor of a morbid inactivity. These facts should be known and felt, and their dominion submitted to by every christian, and by all men.

The poor man ought not to be contented with a state of indigence, and remain in idleness, if it be in his power to obtain honest and lucrative employment. No one should be contented under inconveniences and privations of any sort, or any amount, if he can lawfully avoid them. No; happiness is, and ever should be, the undeviating end and aim of every man, of every human being. No one should be contented with any species or degree of ignorance, if the means of mastering it, by the acquisition of knowledge, lie within his reach. Nor, above all, should any one be contented in a course of folly and dissipation; of high handed and habitual sin. Surely not. These, and many other things, which I have not room to mention, are utterly inconsistent with the nature of christian contentment. But on the other hand, with all events and all conditions, which result legitimately from the dispensations of Divine Providence, we should learn, like Paul, to be content. Against none of these should a complaint from the lip, or a murmur from the heart, ever be heard. 'The will of the Lord be done.' This should be the uniform language of the tongue, and the deep, ruling sentiment of the soul. There are abundant reasons why it should.

The God who made us, and all things for himself, conducts everything on earth and in heaven after the counsel of his own will; and hence, 'all things work together for good to them that love him.' Under his directing and superintending hand, even the privations and occasional sufferings of the present life are rendered salutary and useful. Among other things, they are admirably calculated to teach us the great lessons of watchfulness, industry, economy, and habitual submission to the will of God. When we shall attain to the same understanding of the ways and purposes of God, which Paul had, and especially as they are connected with the great blessings and hopes disclosed in the gospel of our salvation, we shall, like him, have 'learned in whatsoever state' we are, 'therewith to be content.'

And let me remark in conclusion, that when all shall have been 'taught of God,' and shall 'know him and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent, whom to know is eternal life,' contentment will pervade every heart among the millions of our race. Then will they all see and feel that God, their infinite Father and Friend, hath in deed and in truth, 'done all things well.' The enlightened Universalist has already reached this high eminence. He lives amid the substantial elements of contentment. His life, therefore, should proclaim aloud to all around him,

'The Lord is become my salvation and song,
His blessings have followed me all my life long;
His name I will praise while he lends to me breath,
Be joyful through life, and resigned in my death.'

FLOWERS.

BY CHARLOTTE.

I SING of the flowers—the beautiful flowers!
They've a mission pure in this world of ours;
They minister gently of hope and love,
They teach our spirits to look above,
And we gaze on them, till our thoughts arise
To the glorious bowers of Paradise!

Our garden is only a wee bit spot,
In front of our humble, snow-white cot;
And the haughty florist might pass it by,
As unworthy a glance from his practised eye;
But dearer to us, than regal bowers
To a monarch's heart, are our simple flowers.

We have gorgeous tulips of gold and jet,
And gaudy scarlet, in borders set;
We have gay carnations of brilliant hue,
And the beautiful moss-rose gemmed with dew;
And we look on them with admiring pride,
But our love is for those on the other side.

There, the delicate snow-drop lifts her head,
And the violet peeps from her lowly bed—
And the breath of the lily, the pride of the vale,
Is floating sweet on the balmy gale,
While round our door the green ivy clings,
And the fragrant clematis its odor flings.

Dearly I love the sweet, fragrant flowers—
They have cheered and gladdened my lonely hours,
And many a lesson they bear to me
Of holiness, meekness and purity.
O dreary and sad were this world of ours,
If God had withheld the bright, beautiful flowers!

Fair, gentle blossoms, is death your doom?
Shall ye not rise in perennial bloom?
Have ye not strayed from that radiant clime
Where the flowers are unchilled by the frosts of time?

Are ye fated like us, to be dwellers here,
And sigh for a holier, happier sphere?

Beautiful flowers! when at length I stand
Redeemed from sin on the spirit-land,
Shall I not greet ye, undimmed and bright,
By the crystal streams in that world of light?—
Where they know not the power of death or decay,
And the sentence, no longer is—passing away!

A SISTER'S LOVE.

BY A NEW CONTRIBUTOR.

As a spirit of purity she folds her wings around us, and in her soft breathings of love is forgetfulness of pain, sickness, and sorrow. The dark and lowering clouds that were hovering over us are dissolved in vapory mists, the 'barbed arrow' loses its sting; the bleeding heart is healed by a touch from her magic wand, and we go forth again in the enjoyment of a new and blissful life.

All things are then beautiful. The blue arch of the heavens seems more glorious, the sunlight falls with a softer and more gentle influence upon every tree and shrub and opening flower, and the whole earth is filled with loveliness. The mind revels in the blissful enjoyment of all within and around. Like the fleecy clouds in the calm of a summer sunset-sky, we float along in the atmosphere which surrounds us. All then is good; for the hallowed influences of the being whose spell is upon us has imparted a portion of her truth to every created thing. The heart unconsciously rises from the beauty and goodness of all things created to their Creator, and, with expanded powers and brightening vision, we gaze upon the glorious scenes there opened to our view, and drink of the well spring of life—the fountain of purity and truth. And what has accomplished all this? What has thrown back the shadowy and gloomy veils, dispelled the mists of darkness and thrown over all a mantle of light, imparting to us a spirit that shall guide us in flowery paths, terminating only in unending day? It is the soothing, elevating, purifying spirit of a Sister's Love. It is with us in every sphere, it clings around us in our early years, and time but entwines its tendrils closer and more close as it increases in strength and beauty. Ask the weary, suffering invalid, who it is that most kindly smoothes the pillow, holds the reviving cordial to his burning lips, anticipates his every wish, and, by many an endearing act, renders even the bed of suffering one of comparative enjoyment? and with the quickness of thought his eye turns to the fond, affectionate sister in whose sympathy and tenderness he knows there is no variation. The heart is too full; thick coming memories crowd too fast to clothe themselves in words, but that glance has told a tale of patient watchings and untiring love far more eloquent than language.

Gentle being, if there were a name dearer or purer than Sister! it should be thine. There is none lovelier. There is a sweet, subduing influence in the name of sister which penetrates the innermost recesses of the heart, touching the secret chords of our mysterious being, drawing forth the sweetest tones of harmony and love. Go within the dark confines of yon prison walls to the prisoner's gloomy cell, and if he has ever known a sister's love, stoop and whisper but the name—and the throbbing heart and speaking eye will tell of the vibration of a tender chord thou hast touched. In imagination he is again in the home of his innocent childhood; his parents look upon him with pride and affection; but there is one with a light and airy step who is bounding to meet him—her arms are entwined about his neck—her warm breath is upon his cheek; he is subdued, the stern unrelenting criminal is no longer before you, but a sensitive being whose feelings and sympathies are in unison with your own. Do with him what you will—you have a power to do him good; lead him to the throne of the Lamb of God who taketh away all sin—to the Fountain of Life that he may drink freely, deeply to sustain him in the bitter hours of trial which await him. The image of the sweet companion of his boyhood recalled so vividly before him, has softened a heart rendered callous by its intercourse with a cold and unfeeling world. He remembers her artless manners, her confiding love, her sweet and thrilling tones of affection, and even self is forgotten—his very nature seems changed, and with lowliness of spirit he names the name of his Father in heaven, trusting to meet her amidst the radiant band of angels and archangels which surround the Throne.

A sister's love, what has it not accomplished, what can it not endure? It will suffer wrong and reproach without a murmur or a tear, to shield the loved one from the slightest breath of injury; it will conquer every obstacle, overcome every difficulty; no self-sacrifice is too great to gratify the wishes or ensure the good of its object. It is a spirit of purity in a sinful world to regenerate and bless.

Thanks be to the Giver of every good, for the inestimable gift of a Sister's Love.

Lost wealth may be regained by a course of industry;—the wreck of health repaired by temperance;—forgotten knowledge restored by study;—alienated friendship soothed into forgiveness; even forfeited reputation won back by penitence and virtue. But who ever again looked upon his vanished hours?—recalled his slighted years and stamped them with wisdom?—or effaced from heaven's record, the fearful blot of a wasted life? Mrs. Sigourney.

EDITOR'S BOOK TABLE.

The Universalist and Ladies' Repository. Vol. XI. No. I, for July.

We have heard of editors sending their magazines to contemporary publishers with a notice all prepared, ready to be handed to the compositor, in order that thereby their works might be noticed. We are too modest to adopt this fashion, and therefore do not write this to be copied. The fact is, among the many competitors on our Table, we see none that looks more respectable than the Repository, and in its new dress we are hardly able to recognize it, so we wish to 'do the genteel thing' for it as a stranger. 'A good face,' said or wrote Lord Chesterfield, 'is a good letter of recommendation;' if there be any truth in that remark, we may hope for a good reception for our protegee. Has it not a good face? Verily, it has, and we know of none that is fairer. Read it, and it will be found interesting, intelligent and religious.

We hope we have not ventured upon costly improvements to no purpose, but that our endeavors to present a work worthy of the patronage of the denomination, will be seconded by a generous patronage. We need a large addition of good subscribers to our list, for we have suffered by the establishment of many local papers, and our list is very small in comparison with what it should be. We wish the work to speak for itself, and leave it to plead for us, with the hope that it will beget a deep interest in the minds of many to have it honorably sustained.

The Position and Duties of Liberal Christians. A Sermon, delivered at the installation of Rev. Henry Bacon, as Pastor of the First Universalist Society in Providence, R. I. March 17, 1842. By Rev. E. H. Chapin. Published by request. Providence, B. Cranston & Co. 1842.

This is a timely production, setting forth truths of the most important nature and of immediate application. At the time of its delivery it pleased us much, and the reading has but deepened our satisfaction, and increased our desire to have it widely circulated. It discusses in an earnest and frank manner the position which liberal christians hold in the community, and their obligations to society as the holders of conservative and elevating truth. The term Liberal is used to designate those who, as the author believes, have attained to the most enlarged and benevolent views of the Christianity of the Gospels; and the prominent characteristics of this party are well sketched in contrast with the peculiarities of the 'Orthodox.' The author then states he has no particular desire to conceal his denominational associations, in addressing the Liberal party; but as there are among the Orthodox many sects who, while they preserve their identity, unite upon the same idea, so among the sects of liberal christians, there is also a unity of principle, and it is to that which is fundamental and common in these denominations, that he in the present discourse speaks. Here is, to our mind, a very important particular. Cannot a union be brought about among Liberal Christians on the common ground occupied by them all, as is maintained among the antagonist sects? We hope this matter will be thoroughly and generously discussed.

The preacher now lays down the proposition of the discourse: 'Liberal christians are bound to Affirm, Accept and Exhibit.' 1. They are bound not only to deny error, but to affirm truth. He who truly affirms, is he who takes a position upon some ground, and not discoursing merely upon the strata of earth there, the character of the soil, the extent of the territory, sets himself to work—upturns the moist clods, and drops the golden seed. This is affirmation; the manifestation of a truth in action—productive, regenerating action. And that liberal christians may affirm most powerfully, the preacher advocates union—a union that requires no sacrifice, no compromise of any distinctive peculiarities in the sects. 2. Liberal christians are bound to Accept, that is, they are to remain open to all truth, and wherever they find it, are to acknowledge and adopt it. They must be true eclectics. 3. They are bound to Exhibit, that is, they should maintain the dignity and essential worth of their truth, and manifest it in practical action—in action that shall show forth its divine beauty and prove its harmony with everything good.

We have given but a meagre outline of the prominent parts of the Discourse, yet we have given enough, we trust, to enable the reader to perceive the object of the preacher and to appreciate the importance of his subject. It is one of great magnitude, and must be treated fervently and solemnly, as much depends on the issue. We shall again refer to this discourse, and hope to make amends for present deficiency in our remarks. We close with the just remark, that the author has done a good work, as well as presented a highly creditable composition. He has our thanks—and though the offering is humble indeed, he knows our sincerity and sympathy too well to reject it.

A Series of Sermons in Defence of the Doctrine of Universal Salvation. By Otis A. Skinner. Boston: A. Tompkins. 1842.

It would seem that enough controversial works had already been sent forth, but we should remember that every new one gains a circulation in some respects which has not been given to the others, and thus the truth is borne farther and wider. These sermons are not designed, if we mistake not, for adepts in the doctrine of the great salvation, but for inquirers—for those who have need to refer to the minutiae of first principles, and commune with the why and wherefore of the relinquishment of the errors of popular theology. The series consists of Ten Sermons; in the first four, the goodness and purpose of God—Man's Nature and Human Reason, are treated of, in connection with the doctrines that maintain endless misery as a result. Then we have discourses on 'What constitutes a Christian,' 'Experimental Religion,' 'The Practice of a true Christian,' and 'Objections to Universalism Considered.' These subjects are well and plainly discussed. The language is uniformly well chosen—and the direct and important reference of our doctrinal principles to character, is earnestly set forth. The work is not a volume of protests against doctrines antagonist to ours, but vindications of the claims of our faith to the attention of rational minds, as adapted to the whole nature and highest good of man. It has already been widely circulated.

It is published in a very neat style, and we hope it will be extensively read, and be instrumental in turning many from darkness unto light.

A Catechism on the Parables of the New Testament. By John M. Austin. Boston: A. Tompkins. 1842.

This is the new Sabbath School Class Book which we alluded to as being in press. We have examined it with some degree of care, and feel free to give it our approval. The Parables chosen are the most prominent ones, and are treated in the Question and Answer manner. A great deal of matter of an explanatory and elucidating nature, is given in these pages, affording good themes for instructive conversations between teachers and pupils, and leading the teachable mind into an acquaintance with many peculiarities in the customs and modes of thought in our Savior's time. In regard to the criticisms on the original text, we have a fear that it will do more harm than good in the generality of our Bible Classes and the higher classes in our schools. In this respect it is emphatically true, that 'a little learning is a dangerous thing.' However, the author doubtless did not intend his work to be the all in all to the teacher, but rather a suggestive book—to direct thought and afford themes for free and instructive conversations. Will our superintendents and teachers examine the work, and express their opinions?

The Idea of the Age. An Oration delivered in the Broadway Tabernacle, before the Merchantile Lodge, No. 47, I. O. of O. F. upon their first Anniversary, Jan. 14, 1842. By Rev. E. H. Chapin.

This pamphlet is so poorly published that we relieve the publishers from any announcement on our part, but acknowledge ourselves indebted to the author of the oration for a corrected copy. We are not surprised at the favor with which it was received at the time of its delivery in N. York, and also in Boston, for separate from the additional interest always given by the author's excellence as a speaker, it is a fine performance. It reverences Mind by dealing with great and all reforming Thoughts, and is not a mere pastime for the hour. It opens with a fine allusion to the gathered multitude, whose expectation answered not to the Past when throngs met to witness some spectacle of outward show, but to the Present—the age of Intellectuality and Love. 'Every Age has had its Idea'—that is, it has developed some grand principle which has given character to a movement in which the mass has agreed. But though we are and should be interested in every Age—in all of the Past, yet earnest should be our inquiry with respect to our own Age—its Idea. What then is its Idea? In pursuing the inquiry, we discover that the Age is a Busy one—all is unrest—labor is everywhere. It is an Age of Enterprise—science and wealth are achieving the most wonderful projects. It is an Age too of Discussion—nothing seems settled—everything is controverted, and new theories readily gain disciples. These features of the Age are discerned at a glance, but the great Idea lies deeper than the surface, and is The Melioration of Mankind.

The forest in the hour of stillness is a grand sight, but a grander spectacle is seen when the mighty wind stirs every limb, branch, and leaf; so men interest us as they stand each in their own lot, but more when swayed by the mighty wind of Thought in an age like this—when great masses are moved. The Age has its evils—all is not yet pure, yet above all rises the truth that there is a great tendency to Meliorate the condition of Humanity. The institutions for the education of the people indicate it; so also do the systems for Mutual Improvement and establishments for diffusing Useful Knowledge. So also do the Reforms of the Age—The Washingtonian Temperance movement in particular. Look also at the character of our Literature—the universal reception given to the humanity-endearing works of Dickens. Indeed all the great movements of the day tend to develop clearer the Idea defined as belonging to the present age—in the world immediately around us. There are portions of the globe where the fact is not so, but who can say the movement here does not affect the farthest nations or tribes? We can see some manifestations of this movement far away in distant countries, and can hope on. This Age is in glorious contrast with the Past, and great truths, now operating, will remove old errors and purify and elevate.

This is a very brief outline of a grand train of thought, after which a direct application of the theme is made to the 'Odd Fellows' Institution, the spirit of which the orator identifies with the Idea of the Age. He looks below the outward, and recognizes as the main principles of Odd Fellowship—Mutual Relief—Charity. These cultivate the sympathies and draw man to man, twining the very pulses of their being. Several pages are given in this connection to eloquent pleas in behalf of our common humanity and the mission of the sympathies. The Peroration is beautiful indeed—an eloquent outburst of enthusiastic admiration of the mission of Love.

Very justly has this production received high commendations from truth-speaking adepts in criticism, and it adds another to Mr. Chapin's claims to the laurels of the orator and elegant writer.

Thoughts on Moral and Spiritual Culture. By R. C. Waterston. Boston: Crocker & Ruggles. pp. 316.

Mr. Waterston is one of the ministry to the poor in this city, under the patronage of the Unitarians. He has taken a great interest in Sabbath Schools, and is very successful in addressing children. The thoughts which he offers in this volume are deserving of attentive consideration as coming from one holding these relations, and they have a higher claim in their excellence and suggestive power. We have read the volume with pleasure, and cannot refrain from commending it to parents and teachers as highly valuable. Its truths will breathe a new and more spiritual life in many a soul, and give the best of hints towards desirable success in teaching the young mind the highest facts.

Letters to Frederick T. Gray: being Strictures on Two Sermons preached by him on Sunday, Nov. 19, 1841, at the Bulfinch Street Church. By a Proprietor of said Church. Boston: B. B. Mussey. 1842. pp. 62.

This is a manly production. It is a straight-forward statement, without insinuations or mere inferences, and deals plainly with all persons concerned in the controversy. And we see no possible way for any rational mind to form any other conclusion than the one forced by evidence upon us—that low cunning has disgraced the proceedings of a professed body of christians. We well remember the erection of the Bulfinch Street Church, and how we loved the Pastor of it; and deep is our regret and sorrow that any circumstances should take from us the feelings of respect and reverence which once we cherished towards him. He has sold his birthright and is not of us. But we have not yet yielded faith in the conquest of the Right, and think we see promise of the coming of the time when again shall be given to that church its true name—'Central Universalist Church.'

Cousin Lucy among the Mountains. Cousin Lucy on the Sea Shore. By the author of the Rollo Books. Boston: B. B. Mussey. 1842.

These two very pretty volumes make six of the series of juvenile works intended for girls, as the 'Rollo' series was for boys, setting forth in an attractive manner the progress of young minds in knowledge and virtue. The volumes have been highly approved. The style is simple, and yet the influence of each work is to do something to draw out and lead on the mind by furnishing the intellect with means of activity. We commend the whole to the attention of those who wish really good—interesting and instructive juvenile books.

A Discourse on Matters pertaining to Religion. By Theodore Parker, Minister of the Second Church in Roxbury, Mass. Boston: Charles C. Little & James Brown, 1842. pp. 504.

The two little works just noticed will, in our humble apprehension, do infinitely more good than this imposing volume will ever accomplish. We have read it and value it not. We throw from us the modes of interpretation it inculcates, as we would throw from us a mortal poison. It would unsettle the mind in reference to every thing permanent and satisfying, and give to ever changing feeling what belongs to the highest order of thought and enduring reflection. It denies the existence of wants as deep and ever-craving as any in our nature, and sends us afloat on the great ocean of mystery without chart or compass. It speaks of strong, earnest, agonizing prayer as an attempt to 'coax and wheedle' the Deity; it spurns the idea of a Mediator, denies the Resurrection of Christ, and resolves all the Miracles into mere tales born in the heated imagination of some Jewish peasants. We have to thank the book for not one suggestive thought. It is all old—a reproduction—singular only for the calmness with which a sneer is thrown at hallowed doctrines amid the gravest pretensions to a love of religion, an admiration of a part of Christ's character, and a wish to direct to the divinest life! It denies Christ in every sense in which he claimed to be received, and repudiates utterly the authoritative element in Christianity. We have no sympathy for it, and lay it away as worthless—for its evil infinitely transcends its good.

THE INTELLECTUAL AND EMOTIONAL IN CHRISTIANITY.

BY REV. W. M. FERNALD.

'In whom (Christ) are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.' COL. ii. 3.

In the chapter from which this passage is selected, there is a peculiar and emphatic testimony to the surpassing excellency of the doctrines of Christ. The passage quoted is an instance of the richness of expression with which this fact is set forth to the mind. The vast and invaluable treasures of wisdom and knowledge which are opened up to us in the revelation of Jesus Christ—the adaptation of the truths which he uttered, to the moral and spiritual wants of man—their richness also, even to the surveying intellect, are themes which are all included in the subject of the Apostle's exultation. There is also an emphatic caution in this chapter against sacrificing this knowledge for any of the theories of human wisdom or philosophy. 'Beware, (says the Apostle) lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ.'

It is our design, in this article, to treat of the excellency of the christian religion in its adaptation to the two departments of spiritual being; viz. the intellectual and moral. Such a view of our religion, general though it must of necessity be, it seems to me will commend the teachings of Jesus to our attention, as being at once adapted to the whole man—to the faculties as well as to the sentiments of human nature—to the knowing and reflecting, as well as to the moral powers of the soul.

It needs but a glance at what has been, to convince us that christianity has hitherto been considered by the vast majority of its supporters, as a system of truths affecting the emotions only—as stirring up a train of impulses and feelings, of excitements and influences, mostly of a supernatural order, bearing directly upon the moral transformation of the man, to fit him for a state in this world where nature is shut out, and another life, not understood by us, must form the extra-human accomplishment of our being. Not that a moral transformation should not be the one great object of the christian, but that this is achieved far less blindly than most christians are apt to imagine—that the change in the life which we are destined by christianity to undergo, is not brought about by an utter divorcement of the moral from the intellectual man—that the knowing and rational, as well as the feeling soul, have a rich part and lot in this interesting matter. And to me this appears no undesirable thing. For, to a rational, thinking, intelligent believer, how great is the zest imparted to the joy of his contemplations, by the perceived beauty and understanding of the truth—by the deep, intelligent conviction, that he is not wrought upon by a blind and baffling impulse, or a spirit sacredly unknown and dark, but by light and power flashing and breaking from a source he sees, and which, to his well-accustomed mind, is the ever-present fountain of his joy! Such is our privilege. We have no dark—no unenlightened faith. But with the 'flow of soul,' the 'feast of reason' is an ever ennobling and enrapturing accompaniment. Christ, 'in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge,' comes to us in the character of an enlightened Teacher, and the reason of christianity, or if you please, the philosophy of christianity, is as welcome and beautiful as its spirit.

'Say what we may about it, (said an eminent christian) God has given us a rational nature, and will call us to account for it.' And it is thus that christianity addresses itself to the intellect of man. It is here—let me say it in modesty—that we are happily distinguished from the hosts of christian men. While, in the circumstances of the present age, a disposition is prevalent to enshroud in mystery what relates to our divinity, or the story of our redemption; and to find an apology in the sacredness of the subject, for the unintelligible character of its teachings, and that thus a cloud of mystery has gone forth upon the whole field of our theology, which discourages the rational inquirer away from it; it is ours to rejoice in the clearness of an understanding faith, and to find our highest satisfaction in that happy union of faith and reason, which so strongly recommends the Bible to our reception and embrace. And, if we mistake not, there is a moral profit which proceeds from this. Christianity, as addressed to the intellect, is christianity mingling also with the moral sentiments of men. We cannot, I believe, divorce, in this great work, the moral from the intellectual man. Is an undevout astronomer mad? But why? There is no devotion in the heavens. The spheres as they roll, though they may in truth

do not discourse of piety to man. But they do call into active and involuntary exercise, the devotional powers of the soul in the perception and contemplation of so much wisdom. Precisely so it may be—precisely so it is, we apprehend, in the matters of revealed religion. If a man has reason—if he has intelligence, and consistency, and a love for the beautiful in theory, it cannot be, that a crooked, deformed, unsightly body of divinity, can awake that music in the moral man which the harmonious, the fair, the graceful, the proportionate can. There is a beauty in the truth, and the scriptures recognize this feature of it. ‘Out of Zion,’ says the Psalmist, ‘the perfection of beauty, God hath shined.’ This, I suppose, has reference to that perfection of truth, and proportionate harmony of all, which God in his grace has revealed to us. Now, if such beauty ravished the eyes of those who dwelt in the light merely of the Old Dispensation, what must be the emotions of those who are privileged to look into the New and Better Covenant—to behold the brightness of the Father’s glory in the express image of Christ’s person—and to dwell upon the great scheme of grace which angels desired to look into, and to contemplate the end to which all God’s purposes are tending? We say, the mind cannot, it appears, behold and dwell upon the true magnificence of the christian system—cannot even in a merely intellectual conception of it—of its means of grace and power of accomplishment—its fullness and abundance—its final triumph over all the sin and unbelief, and sorrow of the world—and its far, out-spreading glories in eternity, cannot dwell upon it without a strong and involuntary mingling of the moral sympathies in a sight so pleasing to the mind. It is thus that intellectual christianity is a help to moral christianity. But what? Is not christianity plainly addressed to the whole nature of man? Is there, on record, a system of truths which came from God, which are dissevered, dislocated, disjoined from rational mind? Is not God himself the everlasting fountain of reason? And have we a system of truths from that source addressed to half the nature of man—calculated for blind spiritual impulses, frenzied emotions, supernatural, unintellectual ecstasies, not to say, visions, trances, reveries? Rest assured, this is not the wisdom of him who cast out devils, and restored the maniac to peace—nor of him who, as his manner was, went in unto his adversaries, and ‘three Sabbath days reasoned with them out of the scriptures.’ No, we cannot dispense with the intellectual, neither can we dispense with the moral. We would combine them both, that, as the apostle says, ‘the eyes of our understanding being enlightened, we may know what is the hope of our calling, and what the riches of the glory of our inheritance’ in him in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. There is thus a combined glow of devout and enlightened feeling—an enthusiasm of the mind and heart—a heartfelt consciousness of truth and beauty—an inward and whole souled testimony which none but the rational believer knows, because none but the rational believer feels, amounting to him, to a highly prized evidence for the truth and the excellence of his religion. And the beauty of the whole accomplishment is, that here are indeed treasures of wisdom and knowledge. There is no disparity between faith and reason—no indefinable conflict and clashing with irreconcilable tenets—no enormities of moral principle and government—and no degradation of mind; that, although there may be some things infinitely above our reason, there are none in any way below it, or opposed to it—that all, in fact, while built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, has also the confirmatory approbation of the best and highest attributes of man.

Thus, having seen the intellectual of christianity, it is exceedingly interesting to behold, how, in its strictly moral adaptations, it is fitted for the exigencies of the world. The theme is old, but the influence may be new. Here also are perennial treasures of infinite wisdom and knowledge. What do we understand by the moral nature of man? So long have we dwelt upon the principles of benevolence, justice, and piety, that we have failed to perceive, in the generality of these terms, the minute and interesting situations in which a moral being may be placed. Let us, then, discard principles, and come to details—to individualities. We have, then, to consider man as an active being—ushered into life to work out his own welfare, and provide for himself against all the adverse circumstances which may make up against him—and let us see how, in this struggle of life, he will be met, on every hand, with occasions for the exercise of the moral virtues.

As a creature of benevolence, the warfare which he will experience will be against his own selfishness. The wants of the afflicted—the desires of the needy—the pleadings of the distressed—the demands of the unfortunate; these all, it is true, make powerful appeals to the natural heart. Without christianity, there would ever be a stream of natural benevolence and kindness ready to flow forth to the unfortunate, but O! how mightily augmented that stream to a mighty river of love, by the hearty reception and diligent practice of the principles of true christianity. True christianity, I say, for this begins and ends in love. Should human selfishness, for a time, steel the heart to the impressions of suffering humanity, will not the reflection of the levelling, equalizing love of God—the infinite charities of heaven, break open the fountains of that heart to love and feel again? Who is this, that, enclosed in the wall of his own adamant, and maintaining a firm defensive over the close system of his own good, and his own snug accommodations, can hardly hold out against that most powerful of all applications—the look of genuine and imploring distress, when the thoughts of the free and infinite love of heaven come rushing into the mind to absorb it? Or, for a more powerful illustration, what principle is that, which, even in the distance—far from the haunts of busy men—perhaps in the lone wilderness, or the void and trackless desert, where no eye is present to award the praise of human testimony, what principle is that which in such a situation, flies to succor the distressed, and perform the offices of sweet charity there? Ah! in such a solitude, where all the influence of the hope of human approbation is withdrawn, and no eye but that of God looks down upon the scene, what is it but a deep-seated principle of charity, but nourished, perhaps, and fanned into a flame by the influence of a broad and generous christianity—what is it but this that thus exerts itself for relief to human misery? True, native benevolence may make some noble exhibitions of herself; native sympathy, friendship, humanity may do much. But the point of prominence is—how much more may a christian benevolence accomplish—how are the native qualities of human good expanded, and quickened, and made more active, thoughtful, and considerate, by the help of a powerful and expansive christianity! We cannot deny this inference, without denying some of the plainest and most obvious principles in philosophy. Mind acts upon mind, and the same qualities and attributes of mind act upon each other. Love begets love—cruelty excites cruelty—justice inspires justice. It is thus that a system of religion beginning and ending in love, acts with involuntary power upon the natural charities of man.

But aside from these considerations, there are the examples of the Founder of christianity. 'He went about doing good.' But we can barely allude to it. His living and brilliant examples—his miracles of mercy to the sick, the deaf, the dumb, the blind, the bereaved, alike conspire to affect the christian heart, to touch it as with power from on high.

But again, man is a creature of justice. And I need not spend time to show that the christian religion so admirably adapted to nourish and support this virtue—that the wisdom which we here find recorded of the moral justice of Jehovah—of the equity and impartiality of his government, that this is especially fitted to meet the moral sense of man, and stir it up to high emotions of right and of rectitude. We might instance this point by referring to opposite and erroneous teachings. If a system of religion which rests for its whole foundation upon exposure to infinite hazard for finite crimes; and upon awful suffering poured on the head of one innocent for the deliverance of many millions of guilty,—upon transfer, too, of the sins and virtues of one man to the moral identity of another,—if such a system be perceived unfavorable to the cultivation of true justice between man and man, what must be the influence of a religion which recognizes the truest and most exalted displays of equity through all the mighty plan of the Infinite? It is here, we repeat, that the moral sense in man meets with the finest displays of rectitude in God. And the heart of man cannot habitually contemplate a system of this sort, and not be in some measure assimilated to it. Mind acts upon mind, I say, and the same qualities and attributes of mind act upon each other. This is one of the soundest axioms in the philosophy of mind. How can the man, then, thus wrought upon, find that in his heart to wrong and maltreat a fellow man, while a rational and lively sense of God's equity to all fills and occupies him? Estranged must be his mind, and altogether vain and theorizing the quality of his faith; if, with these reflections, he can yet deal injustice to a brother, or fill community with his wrongs. It is here that our christianity puts a check upon injustice. It is here that the treasures of wisdom and knowledge that Christ opens for us are as finely fitted for the moral as for the purest traits of the intellectual man. They make us wise unto salvation. They stay the hand of cruelty—arrest the arm of oppression—put back the desires of rapacity and injustice to their sources, and protect society from wrong and outrage upon it. Is the shield of the widow defenceless and weak? Is the orphan's arm, as it were, nerveless? Is there no sword in the hand of defenceless innocence? But if the principles of Christ and of God prevail, there need be none. These displays of infinite and equal right to all—these laws of the Highest, if they are perceived, and if they are loved, adored and imitated—these form a panoply for the weak more powerful than coats of mail, or the burnished weapon, for these dry up the sources of injustice, and spread protection over all. How admirably, then, are these treasures of wisdom adapted to the moral nature. Let us heed them—let us receive of their richness, and be thoroughly furnished unto all good works.

But we must proceed to remark that the sentiment of piety or religious reverence is one also, of the fundamental, moral powers of man. And the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hid in Christ, I need not say, are most eminently calculated to increase this feeling. Nay, where these are, in all their richness, there must be piety. For who can contemplate the character of God as thus revealed, and all the gracious purposes of his love, from the goings forth of eternity to the fullest and sublimest consummation, and not be religious—not be reverent, respectful, adoring towards him? As well might we say that gazing upon the everlasting stars would not excite our wonder and our admira-ration. God, as he stands out to the vision of the true believer—God, as he is set forth to him in purposes of glory and goodness—in the character of Christ—in the records of mercy—in all the exemplifications of tenderness and regard for man—this Being, I say, needs but to be known, to command, to extort our piety. And no system of religion on earth but ours, my brethren, it seems to me, can awake the highest and sublimest conceptions of piety of which our natures are susceptible. Treasures indeed of wisdom and knowledge are here presented. But if they are hid in Christ, be it ours to search them out—to acquire and retain them. Go where else we will, we cannot expect to find the treasure which is here secured for us, search where we may, through nature, or all the recorded wisdom of men, yet, we must return, at last, to this one fountain of treasure, this one gospel of mercy, for the knowledge of God, our glory and joy. Here, then, I say, is the soil of piety. It will flourish here—it will here make rich the inner man with the spirit of praise, of resignation, of calm and silent delight. And it will banish, too, all that gloomy melancholy which too often and too absurdly passes with the name of piety. Religious he must be, who has God for his portion—religious he will be, who in the treasures Christ presents, searches for the one much needed good.

Thus do we see the adaptation of Christ's teachings to the whole moral, as well as the intellectual man; to the principles of benevolence, justice, and piety—to these in all their aspects in society. The treasures here opened, are eminently adapted for the whole nature of man.

But, finally, we proceed to observe, that besides these general aspects of the influence of christianity upon the moral and religious powers of the soul, there are those peculiar and affecting circumstances in which humanity is many times placed, where the power and value of this wisdom is conspicuous. This world is varied, sometimes the tide of prosperity, health, and joyousness seems to bear us on to the full allotment of human good upon the earth; at other times, the dark clouds of adversity gather above us, and break and burst, and overwhelm us with earth's gloom. Who has not seen misfortune? Who has not seen that this is but a chequered life, where good and ill are mingled in the cup of human fortune, and we must drink it as it is. Who has not lost a friend? And who, in this changeful scene, has not had the tear of sorrow forced down the cheek, and felt the oppression of grief at the heart? Alas! We may not calculate upon uninterrupted calmness. The voyage of life is tempestuous—it is rough, and stormy, and serene.

Be it ours to prepare for the worst. But what shall fit us for the adventure? I might press this question upon all, individually. You have all felt the hollowness, the treachery of the world. Both young and old, and grave and gay, have had a chequered experience.

You have seen that youthful form—that brother, sister, friend it may be—you have seen it alter, and fade, and laid away. That form so vigorous once, so full of life and agility and spirit, you have seen the crimson glow of health depart from it—the light of the eye grow dim—and the whole that was there, changed, and emaciated, and fearfully ominous. The days now are anxious ones—the hours are heavy, foreboding, watchful. Oh! fast speeding time—that so soon puts the seal upon the lips, and spreads the solemn stillness over the household, till the first gush of outbreathing grief proclaims that the dire calamity is realized, and all is over.

How dreary and cold is all this world now! What little power of consolation in all that it can offer! But alas! these are but common instances. Go out into the sacred receptacle of the dead; two hundred years have added to that mighty congregation of the departed, and the stones that there rise, that there fall and moulder, and obscure the epitaph that affection engraved for the eyes of future generations—these all proclaim how many hearts have been wrung with anguish, how many broken, crushed, and killed with despair. What a field of contemplation there! Count, if you can, the families that have there been broken and scattered, and the mortal footsteps that have there wandered in a sad and solitary way. Count, if you can—but alas, who can number the sighs and tears—the hours and long years of mourning which that ancient and holy ground proclaims upon its mouldering and honored monuments. Two hundred years! And can the havoc still go on? Alas! and has it gone on, through the centuries that have passed, and will it be perpetuated to the sorrows of millions?

Then turn, my soul, from the vanities of time, for its very gaieties are thus dressed in mourning, and its giddy and fantastic joys rebuked. But what, I say, shall prepare us for the worst? What shall fit us for this adventure of life? Do not the young feel it, and put on the airs of meditative manhood? Search, then, the pages of time-honored lore. Pry into the archives of philosophy; and from volume after volume of the dusty relics of human ingenuity, extract the balm of Gilead for the sorrows of life. Alas! 'tis but too evident a mockery! Let the sages of heathen antiquity answer. Scarcely any of them, except Plato and some of his disciples, could stand firmly upon any consolatory ground of hope for a deliverance from these evils. Firmly, did I say?—but even these had no firm support. All was uncertainty, doubt, and fear. All must, necessarily, have been so.

And where shall we come for the true Elixir of Life? You assent to the world's hollowness—you bow down, even in your gayest moments, under the conviction that man is a wanderer, that he is indeed, without some help, a wanderer in a wilderness where there is no way. Come, then, and for these peculiar circumstances of life—for these dark passages in your earthly existence, as well as for the guidance of the moral principles in the ordinary passes, come, I say, and learn of the true Teacher. There is one 'in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.' In this vast storehouse of truths which he has opened to us, may we take to a refuge of hope and of faith, and go on life's way rejoicing. Rejoicing indeed it may not be in the very hour when the cloud of darkest destiny lowers down upon us. And we are not bidden to rejoice; nay, but rather to sorrow, so be it that we sorrow not as those who have no hope. Bold, bold indeed must be the heart which does not feel an aching void when the dearest of earth's treasures are stolen away—friendships broken—the strong ties of nature and of love harshly severed—and family endearments rudely swept away by the stern tyrant, Death. No, we are not bidden to rejoice in this. And even the proffered consolations of friendship fall cold and unmeaning and comfortless, upon the ear in such an hour. It were better to let nature rest awhile. Nay, it will have its course; and like Rachel of old, weeping for her children, and would not be comforted, so the heart of us, my brethren, after such a blow of bereavement, must—ay, 'the heart knoweth its own bitterness, and a stranger intermeddleth not'—must, I say, for awhile, give way to humanity, perchance to a flood of involuntary feeling. But there is balm in Gilead. And to calm the sorrows of a mind now rational—now returned to itself—now past the first shock of frenzied desolation, there is, thank God, a consolation for humanity. It may be, then, that there is no help for the decree that has gone forth. It may be that the cherished form of a brother, sister, wife or husband, must now be surrendered to the dust; or the bright and blushing infant now moulder in unconsciousness away from its parent's arms; but oh! my soul, what the decrees of God hath thus done, the mercy of God hath now made bright and beautiful. Yes, bright and beautiful!

'On the cold cheek of death, smiles and roses are blending,
And beauty immortal awakes from the tomb.'

By the most glorious of all those treasures of wisdom and knowledge which are hid in Christ, is this truth now declared to us. I need not dwell upon the resurrection. It stands, as it ever will stand, the foundation of the hopes of men. And Jesus, the author of our wisdom, did not simply reveal this truth to the world. No, he exemplified it. 'He rose up,' says a fine writer, 'a moral giant from his grave-clothes; and proving death vanquished in his strong-hold, left the vacant sepulchre as a centre of light to the dwellers on this planet. He came forth from the grave, masterful and victorious; and the place where he had lain became the focus of the rays of the long-hidden truth; and the fragments of his grave-stone were the stars from which flashed the immortality of man.'

Here, then, is a fountain of consolation for the world. But I must close this subject. We see the adaptations of christianity. We see how it is fitted for the dark, as also for the bright passages of our earthly existence. We see it, in fact, suited for the whole man. It commends itself to the intellect; it is eminently adapted for the expansion and strengthening of the moral and religious powers of the soul; and it is most gloriously suited to his wants as a being of sympathy, of sorrow, of mortality. In Christ, truly may we say, are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge for man. And they are boundless treasures; they are inexhaustible blessings. Without these, we are poor, we are ignorant, we are foolish, though golden treasures glitter thickly in our way. With these we are rich, we are wise, we are sufficient, though earthly fortune frown, and poverty beset us. Nay, it must yet be learnt, that there is a commodity which money cannot purchase, and which possesses a far more sterling value than all that money can command. It is the wisdom of Christ. It is holy faith. It is heavenly hope. It is the joy of the better affections. It is spiritual riches. Come, then, let us possess ourselves of this wisdom—let us go on our way rejoicing. Soon shall there come a time when earth must cease to satisfy, and when, in the desolations of that time, the subject to which we have now attended, will commend itself to our minds. Let us seize it now, then; and may God Almighty grant that the richness of its treasures may be no longer hid from us, but be our portion in life, our wisdom in the last hour, our consummation in eternity.

THE VILLAGE GRAVEYARD.

BY CHARLOTTE.

Do you see yon spire with its glittering vane,
Through the trees that almost hide it;
And the simple, snow-white village fane
With the green church yard beside it?

'Tis a spot, where oft at daylight's close,
I love by myself to wander,
And on the varied fates of those
Who are sleeping beneath, to ponder!

I take my seat, where the grass hath grown
O'er the grave of some friend departed,
And think of those who have left me lone,
The young, the gay and light hearted.

In this still retreat I can never weep,
Nor give way to one pang of sorrow,
For those who have sunk to their earthly sleep,
And awoke to a heavenly morrow.

'Neath the mound at my feet, a fair child lies—
Our prayers were in vain to save it;
The spirit plumed its wing, for the skies,
And returned to the God who gave it.

Here, peacefully slumbers a gentle girl,
A creature of joy and gladness;
With a laughing eye and floating curl,
And a brow untouched by sadness.

She passed away while the summer flowers
With fragrance the air were lading;
Ah! who that looked on that Flower of ours,
Could have fancied the Rose was fading!

We laid her there in that quiet spot,
And planted bright flowers above her;
Oh was not hers a happy lot,
For, 'none knew her, but to love her?'

And here is the grave of an aged man,
Who was famed in his country's story;
His years, fourscore and ten outran,
And his name is his children's glory.

Here the old and the young lie side by side,
And the turf gay hearts doth cover;
The grave hath sundered the bridegroom and bride,
The blooming maid and her lover.

'Tis a holy place, and I love to stray
Where the quiet dead are dwelling;
For Jesus hath passed through the dreary way,
Its darkness and gloom dispelling!

And blest be our heavenly Father's name,
Whose promise to all is given,
That though 'dust return to dust' whence it came,
The spirit shall live in heaven!

WILLIAM'S WIFE.

BY MISS M. A. DODD.

'Sic a wife as Willie had,
I wadna gie a button for her!'

'FAITH! Will, that was a handsome girl that just passed us! Did you see those ruby lips, and coal black, brilliant eyes?'

'No, Charles, I did not see anything so very brilliant, and I dislike black eyes; for I never knew a black eyed beauty who did not have a proud, deceitful, or jealous disposition. There is Maria G., who has what you would call a splendid pair of eyes; and though her manners seem so winning and gentle, they say she is a complete fire cat if anything opposes her will; and Ellen F., too, with her demure down-cast look, and eyes that like those of the rattlesnake, charm many who come too near their glance, and you know how she wounds with her tongue all who attempt to escape from her toils. Save me from black eyes! If I should ever think of marrying, I will choose me a wife with blue eyes and light brown hair.'

'Whew! Will! one would think you had been jilted by a gipsy, to hear you thus disparaging the distinguishing feature of that race; but now I know, by this same token, that some blonde beauty has made a looking glass of your heart, where nothing is reflected but her own perfect self. Hear the fellow talk! What affectation! "If I should ever think of marrying," now that's good! just as though your thoughts by day, and your dreams by night, did not all centre on that same subject. Did you ever draw on a boot, or tie a cravat, or curl your whiskers, without having your ideas in some way connected with the important event of marriage? What are boots, cravats, and whiskers made for, but to set us off to the best advantage, and help us to "lead captive silly women?" I don't believe we should ever trouble ourselves with such troublesome articles, or pay any regard to dress, and personal appearance, if it were not to gain favor in the sight of the gentle sex. What savages we should be without them! but sometimes I wish them as far off as the stars, they are so bewitching and provoking. But pray, Will, let me advise you in all seriousness, not to choose a wife by the color of her eyes, for you will rue the day, if you do. Never put your trust in mere outside beauty. If a wife was something to be shut up in a glass case, and kept merely to look at, it might do to be fastidious about the color of her complexion, hair, eyes, &c., though time would soon lay his ruthless finger on the fairest face; and we might better have a waxen woman to gaze upon, if we wished merely to gratify our sense of sight. If I ever marry; and hang me if I don't! I shall never be taken in by a piece of painted flesh, that's certain! not but what a beautiful face is a good recommendation, and very desirable if joined to other advantages; but I care not what color my lady's eyes may be, if her soul looks out from them; I should sooner examine her "phrenological developments," than criticise the hue of her hair; and I would not waste a thought on damask cheeks, or coral lips, if her countenance was written over with pure thoughts, and sweet and gentle emotions. When I begin to think of choosing a wife,—deuce take it! I've thought of nothing else since I came to "years of discretion," and I don't know how long before—but what I mean to say, is, if I meet a young lady who seems to possess those qualifications which I consider necessary, I shall be wary in yielding up my heart, till I have met her in other than public places, the gay party, the ball room, or the street. I will see her at home, and at hours when she does not expect me; and if I find that she is always idling away her time, making and receiving calls, and flirting with a train of admirers; and is never engaged in study, meditation, domestic duties, or any improving and useful occupation; were she ever so charming, I would leave her to others, for such an one is not the wife for me. So you see, Will, how I intend to manage, and I advise you to take the same course with your soft, sentimental, blue eyed beauty. Don't marry her till you have seen her mend a stocking. I heard a silly girl the other day, telling some one how she once swept out the parlor, and the broom blistered her hands. Pooh! what a chicken! she told a falsehood, beside making a fool of herself. Such delicate hands would not do for the mistress of a family in our republican land, where servants sometimes cannot be procured for love or money. Save me from ever marrying such a simpleton as that! But I am detaining you, am I not? Where are you bound this evening?

'No where in particular, at least not till I have given back some of your good advice, and let me say first, that very cautious people sometimes get taken in; for the girls will be sure to find out your notions, and you will be deceived by the most artful one among them. For my part, I had rather marry a simpleton, than a deceitful or bad looking woman. Give me a handsome wife or none, for I could love no woman but a beautiful one; and I would rather she should talk to me, if she could not talk anything but nonsense, than have her poring over musty books, or musing and moping in the corner. Now as we have each given our individual opinion, let us take the direction which best suits us, in search of a wife. You turn to the East I see, because the "wise men" came from that quarter, but I shall go West, for beauty dwells with the sunset. So success to you my most wise mentor, and I bid you a kind good even.'

I have often observed that there is nothing held in much lower estimation, by people in general, and young people in particular, than what is called good advice; and therefore, as might have been supposed, William profited nothing by the well meant counsel of his friend Charles. I cannot but wonder why this commodity is so plenty, and so little valued. To be sure, everything besides money, is cheap now-a-days, but this is the cheapest of all. Self conceit must be at the bottom of it; for we all think we know more than our friends or neighbors, and though we sometimes so far condescend as to ask the opinion of another, it is only to act contrary to it, if it differs in the least from our own. If all the wise counsel which is bestowed on young people, by careful parents, and kind bachelor uncles and maiden aunts, were treasured up and put in practice, what patterns of perfection we should see, in every youth who sports a cane, or smokes a cigar, and every girl who flirts a fan, or carries a 'sun shade.' But alas! for the wilful and perverse ones! when shall we see 'old heads on young shoulders?' Alas! for the good advice which is literally thrown away! when will it be thankfully received, and used, even by 'poor folks'?

Hear the anxious father discoursing eloquently to his hopeful son. Does the youth treasure up his words? No, as soon as the good man's back is turned, he throws them all away. See him figuring before the glass, criticising the cut of his coat, and arranging his hat so as to display to the best advantage, without discomposing the set of his curling locks. Is there anything for him to learn from the aged and the wise? Oh no! nothing at all! The Pharisees were not more self-righteous than he is wise in his own conceit. There too, is the young lady; hear her tender mother's counsels and cautions. Surely, she gives some heed to all this! but no, not she; if she takes the advice at all, it is only to wait for a better opportunity to throw it slyly away. She sees her own pretty face and figure, in her mirror, and wonders what more is necessary to recommend her; and she wishes mothers, grandmothers, and old maids, would not be forever 'telling their experience,' for if they will only let her alone, she knows enough to take care of herself. We might go on multiplying examples, but these will answer for the present; and now let us go back, or forward, to our friend William.

He laughed in his sleeve, when Charles turned away to pursue his walk in a different direction, while, without even looking round to see whether his friend was observing him, he deliberately scattered every word of his advice over the pavement; and then, with that self satisfied air, which one is apt to assume when he is conscious of having performed a good action, or made a good disposition of anything; he passed on with a quickened step, and entered a pleasant residence, where, from the manner of his reception, one might judge him to be on a friendly footing. And there he was welcomed with smiles by the 'blonde beauty,' who, as Charles rightly conjectured, had made an impression on his heart: in fact, he had declared his preference for the lady, and been accepted as her future husband. We will not try to amuse any one with what passed in the interval between their engagement and marriage, for such things are entertaining to none but the parties concerned; but we must say, that if Mr. Shakspeare tells the truth in his play book, theirs could not have been 'true love,' for it 'did run' very 'smooth.' There was nothing to obstruct its course in the shape of opposition from friends, painful partings, or even interesting little quarrels, such as sometimes spice and pepper a courtship; and as we do not care to trouble ourselves, or any one else, with a detail of such monotonous proceedings, we will pass on to the time after the two had been made one.

Sarah; for that was the name of William's wife, was beautiful to look at, though many would have thought that a face so calm and devoid of expression, could not belong to one who possessed a very warm and feeling heart; and it was not long before her husband became sensible that the beauty of her face was her greatest recommendation, and that this alone could not make him happy. He might have found it out before, but 'love is blind, they say.'

There was nothing very remarkable in her character to be described; for she was no more vain and foolish, than a thousand other young women, who have been fashionably brought up, and who waste youth's sunny season in pursuing what the unthinking call gaiety and pleasure, while the swift hours hasten on, taking life from the heart and brightness from the brow, without storing the mind, in exchange, with wisdom's precious jewels. Her sensibilities were not very acute; her heart had never been softened by any sorrow of her own, and she did not feel much sympathy for that of others; and when William, wearied with the care and toil of his profession, and weighed down with those despondent feelings which sometimes come to the mind overtasked, would have sought relief by sharing his thoughts with one who should have been the partner of his joys and sorrows, he received no lively sympathy, no sweet encouragement, from his inanimate and soulless wife. In short, he soon learned to his sorrow, that he had made a grand mistake in his calculations; when, in looking for a fair face, he failed to secure a companion possessed of those qualities and affections of the mind and heart, which make a plain person loveable and lovely, and cause even beauty itself to appear more beautiful.

Charles pitied his friend, for he saw that he was unhappy, though he could not know half the pain his unwise choice had cost him; and he has been heard to say, that he would rather be an old bachelor all his days, hard and luckless as he should consider such a fate, than wed a fair creature who had no soul; and that he would not give a fig or a button, for such a woman as William's wife.

GOODNESS NOT PERISHABLE.

BY IONE.

'THAT which now is, in the days to come shall all be forgotten.' ECCL. ii. 16.

It is a solemn and impressive thought, that the cares, pleasures and interests which now engross us, in the days to come shall be forgotten. We ourselves shall lose their remembrance, if our pathway be long to the shadowy valley, and their record will be obliterated from earth, though recorded in uneffaceable characters in the archives of Heaven. Our busy recollections will soon be stilled by the hushing charm of death, and the world, in a brief space, will have forgotten our very names.

With the passing of the breath of life, our ambitious projects fail; our earthly anxieties are hushed forever; the voice of kindred affection lingers on the shore, while we pass over the Jordan with a numerous company, yet fearfully alone; and Time, with its unseen wings, sits brooding over the scene of our departure, often approaching the confines of eternity, but forbidden to stretch its adventurous flight where the spirit only can find an entrance to the throne of God.

Among the uncounted multitude that have passed away, how few have left a name upon the pages of history. The most interested scrutiny can detect no record of their individual thoughts and deeds; and they who once wept and smiled—hoped and feared as we do, have mingled with the common dust. The busy avocations of life which cast around us the heavy chains of care and anxiety, and but too successfully confine those thoughts to earth, which should rise often on the wings of faith and prayer to another and higher home, will lose much of their undue importance by the reflection that in the days to come they shall be all forgotten.

Amid the instability which so often wrecks our happiness, there is solace in the belief that there is a world which shall endure while the ages of eternity roll by in unending succession. The remembrance of gentle words, of elevated and purified affections, of patient toil for knowledge, of thirsting for the water of life, which is given only in answer to earnest prayer, will not pass away from our memory in the days to come. These are the riches which the soul shall bear with humble confidence into the presence of the 'Ancient of Days.' If then, amid so much that is transitory, there may remain within us an imperishable kingdom, what shall we say of the folly—of the madness of him who voluntarily neglects it, and nearly loses the consciousness of high and noble capacities for improvement, in his devotion to sensual objects, which fall back at the prospect of the grave and leave their deluded victim to enter the dark valley alone, with the poor and tattered drapery of neglected virtues! It is not enough that these perishable bodies are protected from the summer's sun and the winter's cold, if the immortal nature be left to pine for proper sustenance, and its high destinies and unlimited capabilities for good and evil are forgotten.

With what solemn joy should we receive the sublime idea of unceasing progression in the spiritual world! With what dignity is our nature invested when eternity must witness its constant unfolding, and its course must be onward, onward through the limitless ages of futurity, while a boundless vista constantly enlarges upon the raptured vision. The faint spark of immortality within us, kindled at the throne of the Almighty, and inextinguishable even beneath the incubus of passion, selfishness and envy, shall be fanned hereafter by the breath of Heaven into a flame, burning brighter and brighter, and gathering new strength and beauty in its unwasting energy. What views more ennobling and encouraging than these! The sun may go down in darkness irradiated by no gentle moon, the stars may veil their faces, the habitable earth may crumble and resolve into chaos, or pass away at the sentence of annihilation, but the soul shall pursue its uninterrupted flight unhurt amid the destruction of material things.

Oh! then let us be truly wise in making suitable preparation for the untried scenes before us. We would not meet an earthly judge without self-examination and earnest desire for his approval, how then shall we stand before the Judge of all the earth, disfigured by sin and willing aliens from the holy influences of prayer and faith. God shield us from the sin of forgetting him in the day of his mercies, and may Jesus confess us his faithful followers before the throne of his Father.

THE GOSSIP BIRD.

SELECTED.

'A BIRD of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter.' ECCL. X. 20.

THERE is a little busy bird,
That everywhere is flying;
Whose notes at morn and eve are heard
On every breeze that's sighing!
'The live-long day' he soars away,
Save now and then alighting,
Where'er the sound of news is found,
His curious ear inviting.

But never will he tarry long,
Till truth can be attested;
But takes that meaning, right or wrong,
Which is the first suggested!
And swift to use the ill-caught news,
He flies in each direction;
Till here and there, and every where,
Is caught the foul infection.

Sometimes it comes in friendship's guise,
With airs so soft and winning,
And warbles out so sweet his lies,
They're trusted from beginning;
Then off he floats—while victory's notes
His merry voice is chanting!
Nor little heeds the heart that bleeds,
With arrows he is planting.

His specious song more times than one,
The dearest friends have parted;
While lovers, cheated by its tone,
Have withered, broken-hearted!
And of the cup, just lifted up,
O'erflowing bright with gladness,
His poisoning lay hath dashed away,
For bitter draughts of sadness.

But all the mischief he has done,
There is indeed no 'telling'!
And still his flight is going on,
And still the record swelling.
How many wrongs shall yet his songs
Inflict on this dominion?
How long soar still, intent on ill,
His dark, unfettered pinion?

Would that some sportsman of the quill,
Whose fame is in 'sharp-shooting,'
This gossip bird's life-blood would spill,
And hush his vile imputing.
Then once again, o'er hill and plain,
The peaceful dove careering,
When twilight comes, shall bless our homes,
With 'Olive-Branch' appearing.

SKETCHES FROM REAL LIFE. NO. IV.

BY MRS. J. R. SPOONER.

ELLEN STRATHMORE.

SO EXTRAORDINARY and unexampled are some of the circumstances that I shall have to relate in this tale, that I have hesitated to place it among these 'Sketches from Real Life,' fearing that some of my readers may accuse me of not being true to the promise implied in the title, in telling so improbable a story as the following. I have, however, good evidence of its correctness, and I would remind those who may still be sceptical, that truth is sometimes stranger than fiction.

Somewhere towards the close of the last century, there resided in Scotland, Sir Graham and Lady Strathmore. He was the last representative of a noble and wealthy family, that had in olden times furnished many a brave highland chief,

'Whose deeds by flood and field are told,
In picture and in song.'

It will not be necessary to say much relating to the history of Sir Graham and his wife, previous to the time at which our narration commences, which is during the infancy of their only child—our heroine. They had, however, been some years married before the birth of the young heiress, and even among their friends bore the reputation of being 'rather odd kind of people.' It has often been said, (and probably in many cases with truth) that women in the higher circles of Europe, frequently evade the duties and cares which naturally devolve upon the mother during the infancy of her child, by entrusting this arduous yet tender task to others. But Lady Graham was not one of these fashionable mothers. When she first clasped her babe in her arms, and bedewed it with joyful tears of welcome, she resolved to devote her future life to her child; and strictly indeed she performed that promise. Her husband, who cheerfully approved of her determination, readily acceded to her request, that they should no longer continue to reside the principal part of their time in Edinburgh, (as they had previously done) but that they should at once give up their splendid mansion, and retire to one of Sir Graham's family estates, Strathmore Place, situated in a beautiful valley, at the base of the majestic Ben Lomond, which though it forms a part of the Grampian Hills, that separate the Highlands from the Lowlands, is by far the most agreeable as to climate, laying as it does in the western part of the county. The most famed and lovely of the Scottish Lakes, Loch Lomond, winds gracefully along the base of the mountain. Its shores are singularly wild and picturesque, and it is studded by a number of small islands, some of which from their minuteness and romantic beauty, might almost be imagined to have once been the homes of wood nymphs and naiads. Ben Lomond too presents a prospect, the interest and grandeur of which is seldom surpassed. But to our tale.

The little Ellen was a beautiful and intelligent child, and her parents soon felt that they were well rewarded in exchanging a life of vain and heartless intercourse with the world, for the pleasing task of watching from day to day, the developments of her young mind, and the increasing loveliness of her person. They loved her deeply, and could scarcely ever bear her to be out of their sight. I must now hasten to mention the singular result of a long series of consultations and deliberations, between Sir Graham and his lady respecting their daughter. But as I am unacquainted with their conversations on the subject, I cannot do justice to the reasoning which I suppose was advanced, before her parents came to the conclusion that Ellen should never marry! I have, however, heard this strange resolution ascribed to various causes; but I cannot vouch for the correctness of any. Some said it arose from the selfishness of her parents' love, that could not endure the idea of a rival in their daughter's affections. Others said no, that they had her happiness in view, believing that those who pass through life with the fewest affections, thus presenting the fewest vulnerable points to sorrow, would be the most free from care. This determination being formed, the next question was, what course should be adopted in order to prevent any circumstances from transpiring that might prevent its accomplishment, or render it difficult to do so—what if the young lady should take it into her head to fall in love? as some otherwise dutiful daughters have done, contrary to the express commands of their parents. Every possible precaution was taken to provide against such an accident. They had an immensely high wall built round their extensive domain, and made their residence in future a kind of nunnery, as it contained no male inhabitants, but Sir Graham, his aged steward, and two men servants, who had also grown gray in the service of the family. They would never admit visitors, or go out beyond their own precincts, except to 'the kirk,' where they had a private door leading immediately into their own pew, which was surrounded by a thick green silk curtain, which effectually prevented either seeing or being seen. Ellen's parents took the sole charge of her education, and as her father was an highly educated man, and his wife mistress of the fashionable accomplishments of the day, they were well qualified to impart instruction to the young mind of their daughter, who from being debarred from the society of those of her own age, and associating only with her parents, was more serious and thoughtful, and manifested a precocity of intellect beyond her years. Sir Graham possessed a very valuable and extensive library, from which he selected with care such books as he wished her to read, and it is hardly necessary to say that such works as treated of love and marriage were carefully excluded. Ellen at the age of eighteen was a very lovely girl, kind, gentle, and affectionate, and was idolized not only by her parents, but by the whole family. As she grew up, she became aware of the singular seclusion in which they lived, and she had occasionally ventured to allude to it, but she soon ceased to do so, as she saw that the subject seemed to occasion some embarrassment. She supposed, however, that some urgent reason existed for it; and it was really singular that by some means or other, she did not become acquainted with the true reason. Although her parents anxiously adopted every means by which they could promote her gratification and amusement, (and as their wealth was great, every luxury that money could procure was theirs) yet Ellen often instinctively sighed for the companionship and sympathy of those of her own age. She would at times tire of her birds and flowers, music and books, and though she fondly loved her parents, and was usually happy in their society, yet youth and age have so few feelings in common, that she yearned for the communion of some kindred spirit, 'even as the hart longeth for the water brook.' And sometimes when her mother would gaze unseen upon her thoughtful countenance, and feel assured by the unbidden tear that trembled in her eye, that her Ellen was unhappy, a pang of regret would steal across her heart for having debarred her child from the society that she so naturally sighed for. She said nothing to Ellen on the subject, until she had spoken to her husband of the change she had observed in her daughter, and she proposed, with his concurrence, to procure a young lady to reside with them as a companion to Ellen. But there appeared an objection to this plan, as probably few young women would be willing to conform to the secluded habits of the family. It was, however, finally decided, that they should employ a friend in London to advertise for a young lady who would engage for a year as a companion, and who would have no objection to pass that time in strict retirement; and as an inducement, a very handsome salary was offered. The notice was soon answered by a lady who gave 'unexceptionable references,' and who was at once engaged, and in a few days took her departure for Strathmore Place.

It will now be necessary to say something of this person. Lucretia Clinton was the only daughter of a wealthy merchant in London, who had received a good education, and though not possessed of beauty, was a general favorite with all who knew her, from her amiable disposition and pleasing manners. She had early lost her mother, and this circumstance seemed to add a double strength to the ties that bound her to a most affectionate father, and a brother, a few years her senior. Mr. Clinton, by one of those reverses of fortune so common in the mercantile world, became a bankrupt some months before his death, and left his two children almost penniless. His son Richard was then a fine promising young man, about twenty-three years of age, and had just finished his studies at the University of Oxford. He had imbibed a strong predilection for a military life, and through the instrumentality of a nobleman, to whom his father had once rendered an important service, he was presented with an Ensign's commission in the 83d regiment of foot, which was at that time under orders to join the Duke of Wellington on the Peninsula. With a heavy heart did poor Lucretia (now in her nineteenth year) assist in preparing for the departure of her beloved and only brother. He would willingly have provided a home for her, had his means permitted it, but an Ensign's pay and allowances, with economy and good management barely suffice for his own individual expenses, when (as in this case) he has no other pecuniary resource. But his mind was at ease on his sister's account, as a near relative of his father's in the vicinity of London, had kindly invited her to reside with her; and taking it for granted that she would do so, her brother bade her farewell, kissing away her tears, and saying that he hoped soon to return, covered with glory, and possessed of means to ensure for her a happy and comfortable home. But alas, these hopes were not destined to be realized, and they parted, to meet no more on earth.

O war, war! Thou art a faithless phantom! Showing thyself to the imagination of youth, with thy bright lances, thy nodding plumes, and gorgeous equipage—attended too, by thrilling sounds of melody, and holding out as a lure in the dim perspective, a crown of laurel, at once the reward and the glory of the soldier. Thou art a 'whited sepulchre!' And those who would see thee as thou art, must follow thee to the battle field, where death, devastation, and destruction, are thy attendant ministers. And the voice of the trumpet, and the pealing drum, are there sounding forth their loudest strains, to drown the cries of the wounded, and the groans of the dying! And see, the laurel crown too is steeped in the warm blood of man, and the cry of the lonely widow, and her helpless orphans, is heard even above the surrounding din and tumult. Glory! thou art most falsely named!

The long marches, and various privations to which troops engaged in active service are constantly exposed, were very tedious and harassing to our young friend, and presented a vivid contrast to the luxuries with which the handsome income allowed him by his father, permitted him to surround himself, during the several years that he trod the 'academic groves' on the banks of the classic Isis. But the hope of distinguishing himself in the career he had chosen, cheered and sustained him under all the fatigue and hardships he was called upon to endure. His kindness of heart, social manners, and gentlemanly deportment, caused him to become a general favorite with his brother officers, and a warm friendship soon sprung up between him and his captain, a young man about his own age.

The wished for opportunity at length arrived; the English under Wellington, and the French under General Marmont, met at Salamanca. The former, it is well known, were successful, but alas! Richard Clinton heard not the cry of victory. Standing by the side of his friend, he was cut down by the first fire of the enemy, and fell mortally wounded. Conscious that his death was at hand, he requested Captain Musgrave to write to his sister, and inform her of his fate, and if possible to see her on his return to England, and then with a half uttered prayer upon his lips, he expired. His friend, who was so fortunate as to escape unhurt, endeavored to obtain permission to inter the body in one of the many cemeteries in Salamanca, but this favor being denied to a Protestant, he was buried in a retired spot on the banks of the Tormes, where a large tree at the head of the grave, is the only monument of the young soldier.

On her brother's departure, Lucretia remained for a short time with her relative. She had, however, previously determined to depend upon her own exertions for a maintenance, and much as she appreciated the kindness of those who offered her a home, she never for a moment thought of consenting to the proposal. She was a high minded girl, and of too proud a spirit to be dependant; and as her education had fitted her to instruct, she had no difficulty in procuring a situation as governess in a private family in the city, which station she had occupied about a year, much to the satisfaction of her employers, when on taking up a newspaper one day, and as usual eagerly searching for news from abroad, her eye met an account of the battle in which her brother fell, and she saw his name in the list of the 'killed.' The shock, as may be imagined, was indeed great, and the poor girl now truly felt that she was alone in the world. And although after the lapse of some months, she had recovered from the bitter and heart-piercing pangs that this blow occasioned her, yet she was so sad and dispirited, that she could with difficulty perform her daily duties to her young charge. It was at this period that she met with the advertisement for a companion for Ellen Strathmore; and after some reflection she determined to apply for the situation. A residence in the country, and change of scene, she thought would be beneficial to her, in tending not only to restore her mind to some degree of its former serenity, but also to improve her health, which had suffered from the shock she had received, as well as from the continued confinement which her vocation demanded.

Before her departure for Scotland, Lucretia had the melancholy gratification of receiving letters from her brother's commanding officer, and from Captain Musgrave, relating the particulars of his death, and mentioning the esteem he had already won from all who knew him, and breathing a spirit of kindness, and sympathy for her loss, that was gratefully appreciated by the orphan girl. Captain Musgrave, however, omitted to allude to his promise to visit her on his return, perhaps because there was no immediate prospect of his regiment being ordered home.

Lucretia had not been long an inmate of Strathmore Place, before Ellen loved her as a sister, and the attachment was mutual. They had both (though very differently situated) felt alone, and sighed for that sympathy which is so necessary to the human heart, particularly where the feelings have been refined by a cultivated and well directed mind. Sir Graham and his lady felt the awkwardness attendant upon receiving a stranger into their family under the singular circumstances in which they had placed their daughter. But they did not consider it necessary to enter into a full explanation with regard to their manner of living, and merely said they had reasons for wishing to remain in utter seclusion, and received no visitors, but they hoped Miss Clinton would be contented during her stay with them, and promised to assist as far as they could, in rendering her satisfied with the change she had made.

More than a year glided away very happily to the two young ladies. Although she had but seldom enjoyed them, Lucretia was an ardent lover of the beauties of nature, and the bold and picturesque scenery of the Highlands had a pleasing and soothing effect upon her mind, which had now regained its wonted buoyancy and cheerfulness, although she often shed many a bitter tear for the fate of her brother. And there is no saying how long the friends might have continued to live thus happy and contented, desiring no change, had it not been for the following circumstance. Captain Musgrave after being engaged in several actions, and winning a medal at the memorable field of Waterloo, becoming sick and tired of the din of war, obtained leave of absence to visit his friends in England. He was the eldest son and heir of Lord Musgrave, who was a specimen of a character now rarely to be met with, that of the 'good old English gentleman.' It must be confessed that he had one prominent failing, or rather weakness, as he prided himself on his Roman descent, one of his ancestors having accompanied William the Conqueror to England, and having secured his favor by the zeal which he showed in his service, he was with many others rewarded by a share of the domains of the English gentry, that William so liberally distributed among his followers. But we must not digress. After spending a few weeks with his friends, Captain. I should have said Colonel Musgrave, (for he had now attained that rank) went to London for the purpose of fulfilling his promise to his departed friend, and to his disappointment, found that Lucretia now resided in Scotland. And as he felt some inclination to visit that country, having some friends in Edinburg, (where he was once quartered) he immediately proceeded thither. On his arrival there he wrote to Miss Clinton, telling her that he should remain for a few days in Edinburg, and would then set out for Strathmore Place.

Colonel Musgrave took an early opportunity of making some inquiries respecting the family of Sir Graham, as he felt anxious to learn something of the people with whom the sister of his young friend was now domesticated. And he was not a little amused and astonished at hearing of the singular scheme with respect to their daughter. He could with difficulty credit so strange a tale; but on being assured of it as a fact, expressed his disapprobation of the same in no very politely measured terms. 'I never heard of anything so preposterous! ridiculous, absurd! selfish old wretches—such conduct ought not to be tolerated in a civilized country! Handsome too, did you say, Percy?'

'Yes, so report says, and that she is not only beautiful, but highly accomplished, and this too with the disposition of an angel; and I am sure it puzzles me to think how this has been found out, guarded as she is by bolts, bars, and high walls, besides for aught I know, a company of dragons hired for the occasion! She is an heiress too, the Strathmores are exceedingly wealthy, and I don't know that if I did not happen to be otherwise engaged, I should be tempted to emulate the heroic deeds of the chivalrous knights of old, by raising the cry of "to the rescue," and after killing the dragons, scale the walls, force my way to the lady's bower, and carry her off mounted behind me on my brave steed.'

'Very well said, but not so easily accomplished, I should imagine; but I must confess that I am not a little interested in the captivity of this fair damsel, and as I am not so happy as to be disposed of in the same manner as yourself, I have a mind to attempt something that may lead to her freedom, and if I cannot signalize myself in the way you have suggested, perhaps I may successfully support a prominent part in the play of "Love laughs at Locksmiths,"'

Thus ended the conversation between these young men, but not so all thoughts of Ellen Strathmore on Musgrave's part. He was much struck with what he had heard of the singular manner in which she had been educated, and the account of her charms of mind and person increased the interest she had excited in his mind, and he made up his mind to gain a sight of her, if it was in the power of man to do so.

On the receipt of Colonel Musgrave's letter, Lucretia was embarrassed as to what course she should pursue, knowing it would be in vain to expect him to be permitted to call upon her. She therefore showed the letter to Lady Strathmore, mentioning her desire to see the young man who had closed the eyes of her only brother, and who at his request, now sought an interview with her. After some conversation upon the subject, and several expedients had been at once suggested and refused, it was agreed that Sir Graham should request the minister to do them the favor to write to Musgrave, and invite him to 'the Manse,' mentioning that they received no visitors on any occasion at Strathmore Place, otherwise they would be happy to entertain the friend of Miss Clinton's brother; and that Lucretia being well acquainted with the minister's wife, whom she occasionally visited, would have an opportunity of seeing her frequently during his stay.

Now, gentle reader, if I was to present you with a circumstantial relation of what took place during the two following months, it would make my tale as long as a fashionable novel; besides I should certainly be accused of giving free scope to my imagination, were I to tell you how Colonel Musgrave drew from Lucretia a description of her young friend, and that they mutually expressed their dissatisfaction that so fair a flower should be 'born to blush unseen,' and how he prevailed upon her to show him a miniature, which he discovered she had just completed, in which Ellen was represented in the becoming and picturesque garb of a Scotch shepherdess—how that this achieved the business of captivating his heart. And how that he ventured upon the bold expedient of writing Ellen a letter, in which with all a lover's eloquence, he duly set forth the tender feelings with which her situation, her character and beauty had inspired him; and how that the lady was at first angry, then astonished (for thus it first became known to her) to learn the true reason of her seclusion from the world; and finally, that she condescended to reply, refusing, however, to listen to any farther overtures on his part. But the brave soldier nothing daunted by a repulse on the first attack, so successfully followed up the advantage he had gained by receiving an answer by no means couched in angry terms, that the result was, an escape from her confinement, and a rapid journey to Gretna Green, where the village blacksmith, so well known as having long officiated there as the priest of Hymen, tied them fast in the bonds of matrimony. Her parents, as might be expected, were well nigh distracted at being thus outwitted, but when Ellen, after a few weeks absence, returned with her husband, and threw herself at their feet, soliciting their forgiveness, it was readily granted, and afterwards they became much attached to their son-in-law. Our heroine is said never to have repented of her singular marriage, and that year after year seemed but to add to the attachment of her devoted husband. We knew a friend who met her one winter in London, where she was then 'the observed of all observers,' no less for her beauty than for the romantic and strange circumstances under which her marriage had taken place. Lucretia also married,—but as the history of her future life may perhaps appear in another 'Sketch,' we will say nothing of her at present.

AMERICA.

BY IONE.

WE love thy broad and rolling streams, fair land!
Thy noble forests in their robes of green,
The restless waves that wash thy pebbly strand,
Thy mountains from the far-off ocean seen.

We love the story of thy wrongs and strife,
Thy battle fields and monuments of pride,
The dauntless men with every virtue rife,
Who fought and prayed for thee, and nobly died!

We love the temples learning's hand hath reared,
And through their portals press with eager foot.
The fount within—by none but tyrants feared—
Sends its pure stream to nourish freedom's root.

We love the consecrated house of prayer,
Where weary spirits find a calm repose;
The peal of Sabbath bells which rends the air,
And all the holy thoughts which round them close.

Thy daughters love thee, for their homes are bright
With pure affection's softly beaming ray;
No tyrant hand with unresisted might,
Shatters our heart-strings in its ruthless sway.

Home of the exile, blessings on thee rest!
Ring out thy watchword till the mountain side
Sends back the tone which fills each freeman's breast,
Till liberty hath claimed its throne of pride!

God of the pilgrim! to thy gracious hand
Our noble heritage we give with prayer!
Encompass with thy love our favored land,
And guard our freedom with a holy care!

MUSIC VISIONS.

BY MRS. L. J. B. CASE.

SAYEST thou, mine own, that there is no music here, that the magician is away, and the spells of our necromancy are dissolved? Nay, believe it not. The piano, with whose tones we once summoned up phantoms, may now be thrilling to other hands, yet knowest thou not there is magic mightier still, and spells that may not be dissolved by any change save that which lays its finger on the mind? Within, ay, at the very fountains of thought, is the throne of the enchanter who controls the shadowy realm, and sends forth visionary throngs that make the living beings of every day sight more unreal than they. Very solemn is his realm, for the dead are there, and those who are as the dead to our hearts; and very beautiful is it also, for he is vowed to dwell only among the true, and the good, though he can raise at will the darker shadows whose office it is to warn and reprove.

There is music even here, and it hath thrilling power. Wherever there are sounds that speak to feeling and thought, that rouse sweet fancies, and vivid emotions, or soft pictures of the imagination, there is music, and it needs not the chords of an instrument to awaken the most touching melody.

Now, draw thy chair to this open window, and shut thine eyes. The breath of this fresh foliage will be as balm, and the sweet sounds that are floating by shall be the spells of the magician I am summoning again to unfold the past.

There! hearest thou not the gathering of the phantom-host? The magician is at his work, and already dim, and vapory forms are flitting confusedly before mine eyes. Hark, to that full, clear note of the bird on yon oak! The visionary forms are assuming a reality. Look now with mine eyes, for the oak and the pines are gone, and we stand in the setting sunlight beneath the shadow of old, drooping elms. Before us is a time-worn mansion, and tall lilacs, and roses are veiling the windows with their fragrant blinds. You have seen it before, many times; but the air grows dim. Twilight is on the scene. There is a dusky gloom on the bending boughs of the tall trees, and the stars come forth. The little yard in front of the mansion is solitary no longer. A tall, noble looking figure advances with a mathematical instrument in his hand. He plants it on the ground. There is a merry group of children playing on the smooth sward; one hath left her companions, and steals quietly to the side of the manly figure. She looks at him with attentive eyes. He shows her what he is doing. Now she is at the instrument, and the high, intellectual head is bent to give instruction to that pale, slender child. He is teaching her to take the altitude of a star. She heeds not the call of her companions. Even that young mind cares not for its common amusements, for it is learning the skies. Night comes on. The direction of the instrument is changed to another quarter of the heavens, and lo! they are watching that glorious wanderer of whose mysterious nature science hath yet all to learn. Doth it not look like a spirit-visitant, with its long, glowing train, sweeping far away into the gloom? In the soft evening light the face of that child is full of awe almost allied to fear. The father is speaking to her of things she will hereafter find in books, and of other things that schoolmen may not teach,—of the soul and its sublime destiny,—how possibly when it is gone from the clay, it may traverse those shining worlds, even as a thought. He speaks to her of the SUPREME who made and controls all things, and bids her love him, and do his will, when he hath gone to be nearer that good and mighty One.

Years hence, when those kind eyes are hidden from her sight, will not the summer twilight be full of their soft radiance? Will not that smile ever come to her on the star-beam, and the comet bear to her ear these words as a message from the dead? Life can never be to her utterly lonely, for the heavens will hold out hallowed companionship. It hath been truly said, that that mind can never be made misanthropic by the heartlessness of the world, whose childhood hath left only pleasant memories.

Hearest thou that shrill whistle of the locust among the trees? It hath ever a sound of intense summer. That too is a voice of the past, that calls upon a crowd of phantoms.

See a darkened room, with a coffin lying near us. A mirror hangs above it, veiled, as if it were feared the shrouded corpse had enough of earthly vanity to rise and view itself in its death-gear. Draw nearer. The lid is raised, and we see a young face, but all beauty hath left it. Livid spots are gathering over it. The process of decomposition is going on. If it were not for our faith in immortality, how would we shrink in horror from that seal of the grave! A few months ago, when thou sawest that form in white satin, and blonde, didst thou dream of this? There were flowers in her hair, but her cheek was brighter, and there was no lighter step in the dance, and adulation was too familiar to be prized;—now the friends weep silently—the short prayer is read over that fearful looking clay, and the hearse hurries with it to its hiding-place. The mourners have all departed, and there is no sound but the rustling of the wind through the geraniums her hand hath nurtured—perchance they too wait for the beautiful, the lost, the dead.

The vision hath gone, but there are sadder ones than those that recall the dead.

This is a sweet, still scene, this long, ridge-like avenue in the summer woods. The branches unite overhead, and down, on either side of our path, are green, shady dells, with a softened gloom our eyes cannot penetrate. Very beautiful is this spot in its dream-like repose—fit nursery for young romance, and those delicious dreams that ever constitute early love the oasis of the mind. Now the path seems at an end—now it stretches away till it is lost in another bend, and then it opens on one of the loveliest ponds that ever mirrored the sky. There are three figures flitting along its windings. Mark that one with the chestnut hair, her laugh rings loudest through the solitude. The gaiety of her innocent heart hath broken all restraint, and will have its own way.

That vision fades, and thou seest a wild spot among the mountains. Fearful precipices crowned with the melancholy fir-tree, are there, and arm in arm, walking almost on their very verge, are a youthful pair.

They heed not their steps. Alas, when did passion ever heed the danger in its path? They are lovers who should only be friends. Honor, duty, all moral and social obligations forbid any other tie, but passion trifles with all these; thou wilt see its inevitable penalty. Look at the female figure. Thou hast never seen her but in vision—thou wilt behold her once again, and then shadows will fold her forever.

Hast thou forgotten the merriment that rang through those summer woods far away, when those auburn curls waved over an innocent and peaceful brow? Alas for her now, for she is trusting, and a worse than serpent fascination is around her—the wiles of artful and reckless selfishness!

The mountain scene hath disappeared. Thou seest now a pleasant chamber that looks out on rich gardens, and luxuriant fields, but she who is sitting there with her face buried in her hands, hath lost the enjoyment of all beauty. The wan, thin hands, cannot hide the furrowed face. Crime and remorse have done a sadder work than years, and the chestnut hair is prematurely gray. Day after day she hath sat thus in listless despair, and year after year. She is mild and docile, but will not look on those she knew in better days. They call her maniac, as she thus mournfully broods over the wreck of her life. She hath long ceased to love him, the seducer—she cares not that he sleeps in the grave his selfishness hath finally dug for him, yet she will quiver like an aspen leaf at the slightest mention of his name. Love, the unsanctified, can meet with but one doom, but remorse grows more vigorously from its decay.

Away, mournful vision, this is not thine hour. Go watch the moments of human weakness, and lift the Medusahead when sin puts on its beautiful mask. Away, poor phantom of the broken-hearted, thy days, thy destiny, are watched by heaven.

Twilight is creeping along the woods, and there is a murmur among the pines. Nature is welcoming the hour of her rest, even as the tired life-journeyer looks to the period that shall end his toils. When refreshed, he shall journey anew, and be weary no more. There is a tranquil voice in this thoughtful hour, the gentlest, the sweetest, the most solemn one of the day, and on its low whispers come the holiest visions of the beautiful past. The shrill noise of the cricket is on our ear; sayest thou there is no music in those querulous notes? I tell thee the harp or flute hath not such potent spell over the phantom-realm.

It is a quiet country village far away. See, how softly the moonlight sleeps on the white dwellings, and the trees are the very emblems of repose. What a spiritual thing is moonlight! How it glides down from above and enters the soul, till every feeling is assimilated to its purity and peace. Look! how that old mansion hath won a cheerful air as the quiet beams find their way through the branches of those towering trees. Thou wouldst think its portals had never echoed to a ruder sound than that of the cricket beneath the worn door-sill. There are two figures leaning over the white paling. Thou wilt recognize those faces so full of tranquil happiness. Surely this is the fit hour, and scene for love the pure, and the betrothed!

There is a change—a darkened room in a busy city, yet no sound disturbs the pale form that is lying there to show how gentle and easy a thing it may be to die. Thou hast beheld the decaying corpse; thou wilt now see the approach of him so falsely called the King of Terrors. Yon sorrow-stricken group will soon be orphans. But look at the dying one. Thou hast known that venerable face in its health and joy; sawest thou ever upon it such an expression of calm happiness as now gleams through the shadows of the advancing grave? The eyes are closed and the breath comes faintly from its failing source, yet that soul hath no thought of pain, or regret, and most blissful are its visions whether of earth or heaven. Well may her death be calm, and gentle, for the beauty of a meek and docile spirit was around her life! Well may heaven send glorious visions to her last hours, for all she sought was to know her duty, and to do it. The feeble flame is yet more feeble. The pulse hath left the pale fingers, that cold hand will never move again, and the breath comes yet shorter from the ashy lips; yet still that peaceful expression tells that the soul is dwelling amidst exceeding loveliness, of which we may only surmise by the reflection that gleams along the clay. And this is Death, the dreaded and the shunned, this peaceful transition of the soul to its kindred! Wouldst thou shun it now, even for the chariot of flame that conveyed the righteous of old to their immortal dwelling place? Wouldst thou not rather pass through the change thy Father hath seen good to appoint, when he calls home his children? Verily we are as on the verge of the world of spirits, and can almost see the disembodied, and hear their exulting hymns. Who can stand by such a death-bed, and ask one other proof of a higher and holier life? What language can shadow forth such blissful assurance?

The last moment hath come. That gentlest of all motion on the lips was the ceasing of the languid machinery of life. Sawest thou ever aught so calm, so beautiful; and hast thou known in the long and fortunate life of that quiet sleeper, one hour of such seemingly unbroken bliss as this last? We will strive to live like her in the 'beauty of holiness,' and pray that death may come to us as lovingly and serenely.

The visions are gone. Night is on the earth, and the magician will no more exert his power though the cricket still sends his notes through the gloom. Sometime again he will awaken the realm of the past, and thy leisure hours shall once more be filled with Music Visions.

VIRTUE AND PLEASURE:

AN ALLEGORY.

ROLAND and Peterkin were twin brothers. They had been educated alike; but their dispositions were dissimilar. Roland was disposed to do that which was right, however opposite such a course might be to his present interests; but Peterkin preferred, on every occasion, that which was most easy and pleasant.

The estate on which they lived had been, for a long time, deteriorating in value, and finally a portion of the sea had deluged the greater part of their land, and swept their mansion from its foundations. It was about this time, that a messenger arrived in that part of the country, having been sent by the Prince of a distant land called Elysium, and it was his duty to inform all those who had suffered from the flood, that joy, peace, and an abundance of every thing that was good, could be found in the land of Elysium, and that whoever chose to undertake the journey and accomplish it, might be accommodated there. He also declared that in this glorious land, the sun never went down, that the air was pure and serene, and so beneficent and beautiful was the Prince that flowers sprang up wherever he trod. Fruits that never palled the sense grew there on trees that blossomed with golden flowers, and beside the crystal streams grew willows under which the most sumptuous banquets were daily prepared by the servants of the Prince, for the use of those who had come from the borders of the sea. Birds of surpassing beauty poured their melody from every grove, and weeping, sighing, pain and sickness were unknown throughout this happy land. Those who had mourned were comforted here, and all tears were wiped from their eyes. These things were told to those who dwelt on the sea-board. Roland and Peterkin sat on a rock by the sea-side grieving over the wreck of their inheritance, when the messenger suddenly presented himself to them—'Why seek ye the living among the dead?' cried he—'Behold I bring you tidings of great joy to all people. Arise and depart from this place, and seek a country which lies far toward the rising sun, and from which I have just come. There, you shall be cheered by the voice of love, and the beam of the sun shall be a crown of glory to your heads.' They looked at the stranger, and saw that his countenance was radiant with truth, while his locks glittered like burnished gold. His garment was of fine linen, and his voice was more musical than the harp that is stricken by the hand of a cunning minstrel. His sandals were not soiled by the slimy ground, and his eyes beamed with happiness. Then the two young men made many inquiries respecting that other country, and finally consented to become pilgrims and strangers on the earth, for the hope that was set before them.

The bright messenger took them by the hand, and led them up a steep ascent, until they had reached the highway, when he gave them a parting injunction, as he must needs return to seek others, and put them on the road to Elysium.

'Continue to walk in the highway,' said the messenger, 'turning neither to the right hand nor the left. Listen not to the daughters of music by the wayside, and pause not to gather the fruits and flowers which grow beyond the path.' Then he blessed them and bade them God speed. The youths stood gazing after him, until they saw him descend the rocks and wend his way toward the plains where the inhabitants dwelt, and they then addressed themselves to their journey.

As they walked along together, Peterkin said to Roland, 'If what the messenger has told us be true, this is no fool's errand that we have set out upon.'

'I should desire no greater evidence of its truth,' cried Roland, 'than the manner and appearance of the good messenger. As a man's face answers to that in a mirror, so does truth find an answer in the heart of those who love it.'

'I am not of a suspicious disposition,' answered the other, 'but there are many plausible deceivers in the world. Why could not this messenger have given us a view of the happy land? At least he might have shown us a chart or drawing of it. Behold we are travelling onward, and every thing appears the same. We see a simple road, and as far as the eye can reach, nothing but a road is to be seen.'

'I find encouragement at every step,' returned Roland. 'Do you not perceive that the atmosphere is pure and wholesome, so much different from that of the plain, that we feel as if we were already in a new world? I understood from the messenger, that this road was called Virtue, and it is certainly a way of pleasantness, and all its paths are peace.'

'The way is well enough,' said Peterkin, 'but I am impatient to see the end of this business. It is not enough that the air is healthy and our spirits are good. Behold, here is a high rock! I will ascend to the top of it, for peradventure I may be able to see the towers of the land whither we are bound.'

'But the rock stands out of our path,' returned Roland, 'and we may not leave the highway on any consideration.'

'I see it is written upon,' answered the other. 'The words are, "This is the rock of Presumption." It can do no harm to ascend it.'

Peterkin then bounded away, and climbed to the top of the rock. He looked around him on every side, and then he called out to his brother, 'Come up here, Roland, and feast your eyes with delights. We must have reached the land of Elysium already. I can conceive of nothing more lovely. Delicious fruits are ripening in the golden rays of the sun, and in the distance are groves of wondrous beauty. A real paradise lies on both sides of us. Yonder are fertile valleys watered by a thousand streams, and the little cascades pour their cooling waters from every rock.'

For a moment Roland was staggered by this burst of admiration, and wondered whether they had, indeed, arrived at the end of their journey. He, however, determined not to decide in haste, but to wait until his brother came down from the rock, and inquire more particularly about the surrounding country.

Peterkin hastily descended; but before he had quite got clear of the rock, Roland saw a copper-colored serpent thrust his head from a crevice, and heard him hiss, as he fixed his fiery eyes upon Peterkin.

'Hasten, brother! descend quickly, Oh! Peterkin!' cried Roland—'for you are pursued by a venomous reptile.'

Peterkin turned and saw the serpent gliding from his hole. He was so much alarmed that he suffered himself to slide swiftly down the rock, with utter disregard of his own safety. In consequence, he reached the bottom of the rock covered with bruises. As he lay on the ground, he cried: 'Help me, Oh! Roland, for I fear I have fallen to rise no more!'

Now Roland recollected that the Messenger had charged them not to quit the high road, and he could not go to his brother without leaving it. Yet how could he think of deserting Peterkin in his extremity?

'Rise, Peterkin,' exclaimed he, 'and come hither. I think you have sufficient strength to gain the road, for it is but a few paces from you.'

What Roland said was true. His brother might, by a little exertion, have gained his feet: but he preferred to call upon Roland, unmindful of the fact that Roland must deviate from the straight path if he came to his assistance. Therefore he cried out again, 'Come to me, Roland—my bones are all broken, and my head is bruised. Come hither, before the serpent devours me.'

Roland could resist no longer; he sprang to the assistance of the fallen youth. He found that Peterkin had fallen into a bed of reeds which grew higher than his head, and from these reeds he endeavored to drag him. But the highway could not be seen from that spot, so thick were the reeds and the underwood. Roland, therefore, conveyed his brother in the wrong direction, and before they could find the highway again, the night set in, and all was darkness on every side of them. Peterkin, who had risen to his feet, could travel but slowly, on account of his bruises, and he at length said to Roland, 'Make me a bed of leaves, and let me lie down and sleep here until morning, for I am weary, and need repose.'

'I would not sleep till we have regained the road,' answered the other. 'O that you had never left it, then this wo had not come upon us. But now we wander we know not whither, and unless we soon regain the path, we may never find it again. Then Peterkin wept bitterly, and he said, 'Now I see, brother, that I ought to follow your advice, and henceforth I will always take you for my guide.'

'Not so,' said Roland, 'I must be a poor guide since I have strayed from the road myself: but let the counsel of the messenger be our guide, for he is true, and we are full of error.'

Now the darkness increased, and Peterkin perceived that they were wandering over rough places, and his feet were sadly cut by sharp flints. Onward they went, groping in the darkness, and hoping to reach the highway, but instead thereof, they now heard the loud roaring of the sea, and feared that they should stumble unawares into its boiling depths, or be dashed to pieces by a fall from some precipice. Then they both feared and trembled exceedingly, and at length, falling on their knees, each one cried in a loud voice, 'God be merciful to me a sinner!' Then a bright light appeared at a great distance in the heavens, and Peterkin was afraid; but Roland said, 'Be of good cheer, brother, for if I mistake not, that is the Star of Bethlehem of which the Messenger told us, which should guide all sincerely repentant wanderers to the path from which they had strayed.'

They accordingly changed their course, and walked in the direction of the star. Very soon they felt the serene and reviving gales fanning their wan cheeks: the air became more pure, and their spirits revived.

When they had nearly reached the highway, they found a high embankment which they must ascend before they could recover the true path. Then they saw that it was more easy to deviate from the path of virtue, than to return to it. While they stood looking for the best place to ascend, they caught sight of a booth, visible in the morning twilight, festooned with flowers, and fancifully arranged under a wide spread tree. As they looked upon it, a man issued from an aperture in its side, and politely saluted the young travellers. He signified that before they could reach the highway, they must climb the embankment which would prove an arduous undertaking. He, therefore, advised them to step into the booth, and take some repose, previously to venturing up the steep ascent. He said that he had wines, cordials, and various fruits which would revive their drooping spirits, and give vigor to their limbs. Peterkin looked wishfully toward the booth, but Roland said to the man, 'we may not tarry a moment until we have regained the highway. We hold all men as enemies who would detain us on this side of the true path.'

Perceiving the firmness of Roland, and having no hope from that quarter, the man began to ridicule the two youths, and several evil looking persons, with bloated countenances, then came out of the booth and joined the man, heaping all manner of epithets upon the two travellers. The name of this man was Dissipation, and those in his train were persons whom he had persuaded to rest a moment in his pavilion, but who having been once saturated with his fruits and liquors, could never ascend the hill and regain the highway.

As the two young men began to ascend the bank, Peterkin halted, and complained of fatigue. 'Stay, Roland,' said he, 'let us rest, if but for a moment, in the bowers of Dissipation, for I am sore and weary.' Hereupon Roland reprimanded his brother, and bade him take warning from what they had already suffered. After a long struggle, they reached the highway once more; and here they sat down, under the shadow of a large tree to rest themselves. Peterkin was now glad that he had not halted in the tent of Dissipation, especially as the leaves of the tree, under which they sat, were found extremely salutary, and healed his wounds. After needful repose, the young men again addressed themselves to their journey. They walked forward together many days, and still they gained no sight of the city. They enjoyed good health and spirits; the air was invigorating, and they enjoyed the consciousness of being in the right way. The birds chanted their melodious songs on every side of them. There were cool and refreshing shades, with streams of pure crystal water in which they slaked their thirst, and bathed their bodies. They plucked excellent fruits from the trees, and enjoyed all the blessings which temperance could desire. But Peterkin began again to exhibit his impatience. 'We have travelled a great way,' said he, 'and yet I see nothing of that country whither this road is said to lead. I fear it will be ever thus, and that we shall find we have been beguiled by an idle tale. I see not the happy land.'

'Forbear these murmurs,' Roland would say, 'and remember that having commenced this journey, we cannot deviate with safety. Dangers lie on the right hand, and on the left hand of us; and we can hope for happiness only by continuing in the path. What have we to complain of? Is not the air salubrious and the travelling good? Are we not provided with food convenient for us; and why should we murmur? Is it because we cannot see the end of our journey? We may not expect to see it until we have arrived thither.'

Peterkin was silenced for a moment by these words; but soon afterward the spirit of discontent was visible. He wanted something more exciting; he wished to be entertained and amused. The complaints of Peterkin rendered Roland unhappy, and oftentimes made the journey tedious; for after the former had seemed perfectly satisfied, he would break out with fresh murmurs, and task Roland's ingenuity to find out new answers to his objections. Thus they had travelled together some time, when they arrived at a delightful watering-place. Here they refreshed themselves, and Roland took occasion to point out the beauties of the place to his brother. Peterkin could not deny that it was a most lovely and romantic spot, and that the waters were invigorating, and the fruits which hung over them were delicious; but a cloud still rested on his brow.

As they came up from the waters, a troop of young women bounded from one side of the highway and crossed their path. They were apparently very beautiful, and arrayed in the most gorgeous manner. They had wreaths of flowers which they waved over their heads as they danced along, and by the most fantastic contortions of their persons, they seemed to invite the attention of the two travellers. Roland himself, at first, imagined that they were some of the bright inhabitants of the happy land; but Peterkin was in ecstasies, and seeing that they were crossing the path, and would soon be out of his sight, he called out to them to stay awhile and tell who they were. 'We are the daughters of Pleasure,' said one of them. 'Those who follow in our train are happy all the day. They drive dull care far from them, and have nothing to do but to enjoy the delights of existence. We dwell in those beautiful groves that you see at a distance, and the insipid fruits that grow here by the highway, we do not taste. We live upon milk and honey, and our bowers are delightful.'

Then Peterkin's countenance brightened, and laying hold of Roland by the arm, he said, 'Come, brother—now is our time; for behold they are moving off, and unless we embrace the opportunity, they will soon be out of our sight.'

'Nay,' said Roland, 'but they would entice us from the highway,' and he endeavored to restrain Peterkin; but in vain. The infatuated youth bounded over the wall, and followed the daughters of Pleasure until they were out of sight. Then Roland sat down and wept. He had wept some time, when suddenly he perceived a great light about him, and looking up, he saw the Messenger who had first put him and Peterkin in the right path.

'Cheer up,' said he, 'and pursue thy journey alone, for blessed are those that mourn; they shall be comforted. Fear not, but continue steadfast unto the end.'

Having said this, the Messenger departed, and Roland felt strengthened to go on his journey, in the full belief that he should reach the happy country, and find it no fable.

Then Roland arose and journeyed forwards many days: but he was not happy. He felt the loss of his brother and companion, and was also fearful of what might befall him, knowing that there was no safety but in the path of virtue. Accordingly he strewed the way with his tears, and continually imagined that Peterkin was in distress, and vainly calling upon him for assistance.

At length after many days, Roland perceived that the air grew still more delightful; the fruits were more luscious, and the brooks were more plenty. He beheld many beautiful birds of a plumage different from those which he had formerly seen. Soon afterward, he beheld golden clouds in the distance, and then the lofty spires of a city. Then he met two bright beings who took him by the hand, and led him through a dark passage between rocky heights. When he emerged from this place, he found himself in a glorious country, more delightful than the heart of man can conceive. He was taken directly before the Prince of this land, who ordered that he should be clothed in fine linen, and receive the honors due to a citizen. When this was done, the Prince said to him, 'Where is he that came out with thee from the sea-shore?' Then Roland told, with many tears, how Peterkin had been seduced by the daughters of Pleasure, and added that he feared he had perished miserably in some morass, or had fallen down some precipice. 'In this land,' said the Prince, 'every desire of the heart is gratified; therefore, mourn no more. I will send my messengers to save the young man, and to bring him hither that thou mayst be at peace.'

Two bright beings were immediately despatched to look for the wanderer. They found him in a wretched condition, surrounded by briars from which he could not extricate himself, while he was covered with filth, and his body was fearfully swollen from the bite of serpents, that had secreted themselves under the rose-trees. They washed him clean, and healed his wounds, before they set him before the Prince. Dreadful had been his sufferings, but all tears were now wiped from his eyes, and in company with Roland and other beatified beings, he wandered through the groves of Elysium, magnifying the good Prince, and enjoying delights which palled not the senses, and which were infinitely superior to any which he had found in the bowers of Pleasure.

LET US PRAISE THEE.

BY MRS. J. R. SPOONER.

LET us praise thee, God of heaven!
Thou hast made this beauteous earth,
And to us thy creatures given,
Heritage of heavenly birth.

Let us praise thee, God of power,
For the gospel's sacred word;
Dark would be the brightest hour,
All thy love and truth unheard.

Let us praise thee, thou hast given,
Christ thy Son, that mortals may Learn of him the path to heaven—
Him the life, 'the truth, the way.'

Let us praise thee, O our Father,
Firm and strong thy promise stands,
'All things' thou wilt surely gather,
From christian and from heathen lands.

Let us praise thee, thou hast said it,
Every human soul is thine;

For thy 'glory' thou hast made it,
For a destiny divine.

Let us praise thee, when the morning
Dawns in beauty on our eyes;
By the lark may we take warning,
Haste to pay our sacrifice.

Let us praise thee, when the evening
Shades are gathering in the sky,
When the setting sun is beaming,
And in glory seems to die.

Let us praise thee, when in gladness
Lightly on the sea of life,
Free from care, and gloom and sadness,
Our bark feels not the tempest's strife.

Let us praise thee, dark and dreary
Though the clouds of sorrow roll—
Thou wilt aid the weak and weary,
Thou wilt stay the fainting soul.

Let us praise thee, in our living,
Worthy of our high estate;
Mind, and soul, and heart all giving,
All their powers on thee to wait.

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF WOMAN'S LIFE. NO. II.

BY CHARLOTTE.

THE MAY QUEEN.

'LEAD us not into temptation.'

I.

It was the first of May, a bright, beautiful, balmy morning, and as the first gray streaks of dawn tinted the horizon, from almost every dwelling in the little village of Lynmere, might be seen issuing youths and maidens in holiday attire, who bent their way through the different lanes and coppices, and in a short time re-appeared; and soon a merry and smiling group was assembled on the green, open space with a large old oak tree in the centre, to which the villagers had given the name of the 'Common.' Each of the party had gathered a supply of the early spring flowers, a portion of which were formed into bouquets by the young men, while others were twined into wreaths by the fairy fingers of the girls. Ever and anon an anxious glance was cast towards one of the by-paths leading to the outskirts of the village, as if they were expecting to see some one approach from thence. In a short time their wishes were answered, and a joyous welcome greeted the appearance of a bright, blooming maiden apparently about sixteen years of age, attired in a simple white dress and a straw hat trimmed with pale pink ribbon, the simplicity of her dress heightening the effect of her rich, glowing and sparkling beauty. Her arrival, it would seem, had been the signal for commencing the business of their little election; and judging from the admiring and affectionate glances cast upon her, it was not difficult to guess upon whom the choice would fall. The vote in her favor was unanimous, and in a few minutes the floral crown, composed of dewy violets, harebells and lily of the valley, interspersed with a few pink and blue hyacinths, the gift of a fair amateur in flowers, was entwined amid the luxuriant raven curls of the beautiful May Queen.

As the first beams of the rising sun gilded the slender spire of Lymere church, the little procession bearing garlands, bouquets and May poles, and headed by their Queen with her flower-wreathed sceptre and crown, the rays of sunlight glittering on the dew drops and making them flash and sparkle like diamonds on her brow, took up their line of march through the village streets, where they were cheered with unaffected delight by the inhabitants, young and old. At length they turned off from the main road, and pursued their way down an elm shaded avenue till they came in sight of a neat, pretty dwelling, with a light piazza in front, ascended by a few steps from the garden, which was already rife with the fragrance of hawthorn and apple-blossom. As they approached the gate, an old man, who had been standing on the piazza, came forward to meet them; and had even a stranger seen the look of devoted affection with which he greeted the lovely May Queen, it would have needed no second glance to tell him the relation in which they stood. The cordial invitation of the proprietor of the mansion, to enter, was cheerfully accepted, and the neat and skilful hands of Marian Shaw soon prepared a simple but plentiful repast, enlivened by the mirthful conversation which was rather aided than checked by their worthy host, and received additional zest from the loveliness of his daughter; for the beauty of Marian Shaw, the woodland rose, was the admiration and toast of the country for miles around.

When the meal was concluded, the party once more resumed their route, and while they are pursuing it, we will endeavor to learn something of the parentage and history of the fair May Queen. At five-and-forty the father of Marian Shaw was still unmarried, and quite undesirous of changing his single estate; and mothers and daughters tired of the vain attempts to captivate him, had at length deserted the old bachelor to open their battery of charms against some easier-to-be won citadel. It was then that accident made Mr. Shaw acquainted with a beautiful Italian orphan, who occupied the post of nursery governess to the children of an old friend whom he was visiting. Therese Cellini had emigrated to America with her father, whose constitution formed and nurtured amid the genial airs of the sweet South, was unable to withstand the inclemency of our more rigorous climate, and a few months after their arrival he died, bequeathing his daughter to the tender mercies of a race of strangers in a foreign land. After many fruitless attempts to gain a livelihood, Therese had been rescued from want and misery by the gentleman in whose family she now resided. Her brilliant beauty and graceful manners attracted the attention of Mr. Shaw; her unprotected, orphan state, called forth his sympathies, and the interest thus excited, soon ripened into a deep and earnest affection. Though no longer in the hey-day of youth, he still retained much of its romance, and with his handsome person, lively talents, gentlemanly deportment, and benevolence and kindness of heart, he could scarcely fail to wake a corresponding emotion in the object of his attachment. Ere his friends and acquaintances had time to wonder, the friendless orphan, Therese, was the wife of the ci-devant bachelor. Mr. Shaw was not rich, but the small fortune which he inherited from his father, had been carefully used; and now that another was to share it with him, he doubted not that the same prudent management would make his modest competence sufficient for all their wants.

The pretty house before mentioned was their bridal residence, and there did they look forward through the long vista of future years, to a life of cloudless happiness. But their dreams were not destined to be realized. One short year of perfect enjoyment was alone allotted to them, and the same hour made Mr. Shaw a joyful father and a disconsolate widower.

Ere poor Therese had been a week an inmate of her narrow dwelling, the officious gossips and busy bodies of the village had prophesied that before a year elapsed, Woodland Cottage would have another mistress, and perhaps it might have been so, had he been a younger man. But could they who thus lightly spoke, have looked in upon that darkened chamber, where by the bedside on which she had died, and from which her dark, loving eyes had gazed with unquenchable fondness upon him, in her last struggle, he knelt in utter prostration of spirit; could they have seen the shreds of gray that mingled profusely among the bright brown locks, which a few days before had been unshadowed, and heard the sobs wrung by his agony from the very soul of that strong man, they might, perhaps, have felt and known that his was the first and only love of a man, too old to change his affections easily.

From that hour of intense anguish, when the low-breathed farewell of her who was dearer than life, had wrung every nerve and fibre of his heart, and the faint, feeble wail of his child had awoke a fount of new and delicious feeling, had he vowed to devote his future life to the little pledge of their love. Faithfully and well did he execute his task; and with a gentleness almost womanly, he watched over her and administered to her wants; all the wealth of affection which he had lavished on her who was gone, now gushed forth in deep and fervent tenderness for the little Marian, a sentiment increased, if that were possible, by her resemblance to her dead mother. But while he watched, with admiring love, the rapidly developing beauty of her person, he never for a moment neglected to cultivate the better qualities of mind and heart; and the Woodland Rose grew up, pure and gentle, simple and affectionate, and reverencing her father with an exclusive affection bordering almost on idolatry. Though motherless, she had never yet realized the full extent of her loss; for though her attention had been first of all directed to the portrait of her young mother, and her beauty, virtues and goodness, had been the theme of many a long and well remembered conversation with her father, yet so devoted and watchful had been his tenderness and care, that Marian could not imagine a relation more endearing. Even as he doted upon her, so did she regard him, and this trait, combined with her sweetness of disposition, attracted all hearts towards her, even more than did her exceeding loveliness.

Never was title more aptly bestowed, than when Marian Shaw was styled the 'Woodland Rose;' she inherited from her mother the brilliant complexion of blended olive and carnation which distinguishes the women of southern climes; she had the same large black eyes, full of dreamy languor when at rest, and when excited, sparkling, passionate and more eloquent than many words; abundant jetty lashes, shining hair and delicately pencilled eyebrows of the same ebon hue, finely cut features, and red, luscious lips, and withal a form of perfect symmetry and a softness of manner that communicated itself in some measure to all who came within the sphere of her influence. Such was Marian Shaw at the time she was introduced to the reader as the Queen of May. Alas! that day was destined to be one of great and eventful importance to her! The May day festivities were usually concluded by a dance in a shady grove belonging to a wealthy farmer, and thither the procession, having completed their route, adjourned to rest and refresh themselves; in the course of the afternoon they were joined by a party from the village, including a few strangers who wished to look on and perhaps share their merriment. Among these were two young men from a distant city, of genteel appearance, and one of them extremely handsome and prepossessing in manner. Marian's beauty instantly attracted his attention, and profiting by the familiarity attendant upon social parties of that kind, he entered into conversation with her, and when the signal was given, led her in triumph to the head of the old fashioned contra dance, to the evident chagrin and envy of numerous rustic competitors.

When at length the falling dews and the deepening shades of twilight warned the gay party to disperse, and Charles Hamilton bade the fair May Queen adieu at the gate of her father's dwelling, it was evident that he had made considerable impression on the fancy at least, if not on the heart of the guileless and simple minded girl. Week after week went by; the elder of the two strangers departed, yet his handsome and more fascinating companion still lingered, a frequent visitor at Woodland Cottage, and the devoted admirer of fair Marian Shaw. At first her father had appeared to enjoy the society of young Hamilton, but after a while, his manner towards him, apparently without cause, became cold and constrained, till finally he expressed to Marian his disapprobation of the young man's principles, and decidedly, though affectionately, forbade her to receive his visits. But kindly and tenderly as they were said, his words fell like an ice-bolt on the ardent and passionate temperament of the daughter of an Italian mother; and for the first time in her life, Marian murmured at her father's will. When at evening she stole forth to keep her tryst with Charles, and with sobs and tears made known her father's edict, and listened with trustful fondness to the eloquent protestations of undying love, from lips whose truth she could not question, it was little wonder, that overpowered by his arguments and entreaties, and influenced probably by her own passionate attachment, she should at length yield to his request to receive his visits clandestinely after her father had retired to rest; for Mr. Shaw was a steadfast adherent to the old maxim, 'Early to bed, and early to rise.'

It is not to be supposed that Marian glided at once and without a struggle into the path of disobedience and error; many a sleepless night and many a bitter pang did it cost her, but as is usually the case, the farther she progressed, the easier became the task of deception.

II.

It was the latter part of August, a clear and cloudless night, and the moon was pouring down a flood of silver radiance on the pretty village of Lynmere. On that evening, in a small, but light and airy apartment of Woodland Cottage, opening by a glass door into the garden, the moonlight streamed in and cast its mellow rays upon the figure of a youthful maiden. Her small head, with its bright raven curls was bowed upon her hands, and though no sound escaped her, it was evident from the convulsive movements of her frame, that she was weeping; while on the table beside her, lay a straw hat and a large, dark bundle. Soon a slight rustling was heard among the bushes in the garden, and a tall, manly figure stepped noiselessly into the room and in an instant was at the side of the weeping girl.

'Nay, my sweet Woodland Rose, this must not be,' said her nocturnal visitor; 'why should you weep, when you are about to unite your destiny with that of one whom you love, and who adores you so devotedly?'

'But my father,' sobbed the girl; 'Charles, I cannot forsake my poor, old, gray haired father! it would break his heart, if his only child whom he has doated on so fondly and cherished so tenderly, should leave him alone in his age. How often has he told me, how my mother, on her death-bed, gave me into his hands, and prayed that I might live to become a blessing and comfort to him in his declining years. And oh, Charles! when he blessed me to-night and kissed my brow, and spoke of my dutiful affection towards him, I felt ready to sink beneath the weight of guilt and falsehood that oppressed me. I could have fallen at his feet, and confessing all my sins, have begged his forgiveness, but I thought of you and hushed my throbbing heart, and left his presence, knowing that I had received his benediction for the last time. But that must not be—indeed dearest Charles, I cannot go, I must not leave my father!" and with a fresh burst of sorrow the girl clung to the arm of her dangerous companion, and looked up into his face with such pleading and earnest eloquence, that for a moment a shadow of self reproach passed over his handsome features; but it quickly disappeared, and by soft, yet passionate terms of endearment, he sought to hush the 'still, small voice,' which was vainly essaying to save the deluded maiden. But the love of a stranger triumphed over the long tried and devoted affection of years—over the tenderness which had watched and shielded her motherless infancy, and the watchful care which had prayed that she might resist temptation. With the tears not yet dried from the soft cheek, and still glistening on the long silken lashes, and firmly supported by Charles Hamilton, the half fainting girl was borne through the garden, the gate of which opened into a by-path leading to the high road of the village, and entering the carriage he had procured, Marian Shaw was an alien and wanderer from the happy home of her childhood.

The widowed and now doubly bereaved old man arose the next morning, unconscious of the anguish that awaited him, cheerful and happy; in his orisons his beloved child was earliest and fondest remembered, and he descended to the breakfast room with a blessing on his lips. He was a little disappointed at not finding her as usual ready to greet him, and fearing she must be ill, he returned up stairs, and was about to tap at her bed-room door, but finding it ajar, he entered. The bed was smooth as though it had not been disturbed the preceding night, and on the snowy pillow lay a sealed note. He opened it, and read—"My beloved father! even while I write to you thus, I am about to forsake you, to break from all the ties that bind me to you and home, to follow the fortunes of one of whom I know little more than that he is handsome and fascinating and that I love him more than life! I have struggled, dearest father, to break from this spell, but it is impossible, and before I go I have a confession to make to you. When first I became acquainted with Charles Hamilton, you appeared to like him, and encouraged our intimacy, and when at length you forbade me to notice him or to receive his visits, I had no longer the power or the will to obey you. For many weeks I have met him, and he has been here unknown to you; he has urged me with an eloquence I cannot withstand, to fly with him, and though "I know the right, I yet the wrong pursue," for something unseen yet mighty, seems hurrying me on to ruin. Farewell, dearest father, do not curse me, for the sake of my dead mother; and even yet your last benediction is ringing in the ears of your ungrateful Marian."

The letter dropt silently from his hands; he did not curse her, but he buried his face in the pillow where she might never again lay her head in the stainless purity of girlhood, and that gray haired old man wept like a child, for the idol of his heart, the hope of his age had forsaken him.

III.

Just ere the dawn of that morning was breaking, a carriage stopped at the gate of a little demesne in a pretty village many miles from Lynmere; it was far from the public road, and as secluded as if it had been in a wilderness, while the cottage itself was almost hidden by a massive grape vine which threw its graceful tendrils over the roof, and hung its rich, tempting clusters almost within the muslin-curtained windows. Thither did Charles Hamilton bring the beautiful and deluded victim whom he had lured from the path of duty, and from the home of purity and happiness; and for many months even the reproachful voice of conscience, whispering of the grief of the deserted old man, was drowned in the overwhelming flood of that all-engrossing passion for her betrayer. But as time wore on, Charles' absences became more frequent and prolonged, and Marian was left for days and even weeks alone; it was then she began to dwell oftener and more painfully on her degraded situation, and her ungrateful desertion of her father. But not till she became herself a parent, did she fully realize the anguish she must have caused him; and even then, she could scarcely compare her own newly awakened feelings with those of an aged man who had reared tenderly an only child from helpless infancy to blooming and beautiful womanhood, only to have his dearest affections outraged and betrayed. Her situation too was now becoming painful in the extreme; her feelings, rendered acutely sensitive by her peculiar circumstances, were continually wounded by the scornful look and ill-suppressed sneer, with which the matrons of the village passed the unwedded mother. They who should have sought out the isolated young creature, and by kindly words and gentle counsel, endeavored to win her back to the path of virtue; for the villagers had long since surmised, and had not cared to keep their conjectures to themselves, that Marian was not the wife of the man with whom she resided. Often did the poor girl turn away with tears of real agony, when the young maidens of her own age carefully avoided her, for they were still pure, and her touch might contaminate them; often did she long to say to them, 'Once I was pure, and lovely and beloved even as ye now are; take heed while ye stand, lest ye too fall and become even the despised and guilty thing that I am now.' As the winter approached, her nervous sensitiveness increased, and she begged so earnestly to be removed from her present residence, that he who had brought her to shame and disgrace could not resist her supplications.

'Take me from this place, dear Charles, carry me any where, so that their dark, scornful eyes can no longer make me shrink and tremble, and I care not what trials and privations may await me.'

Ere the autumn blasts had ceased their mournful requiem among the leafless trees, Marian was established in a narrow street, leading from one of the great thoroughfares in the wilderness of New York city. What a change for the child of nature! Who would have recognized in the pale cheeked, slender young mother who sat in that stived, though luxuriously furnished apartment, singing in melancholy tones to her child the gay songs of her happier days, the light hearted and beautiful May Queen, the pride of the village of Lynmere. For the want of fresh air and the clear sunshine in which she had revelled from her infancy, added to the sorrow and remorse that preyed upon her mind, had soon faded the bloom of the bright Woodland Rose. Still Marian murmured not, and she would have been content, and have striven to be happy, could she have felt that the love for which she had sacrificed all, still remained unchanged, intense and devoted as of old; but she could not shut her eyes against the conviction that Charles Hamilton was no longer the ardent lover, who, with soft words and passionate eloquence, had won the heart of the gentle May Queen. Yet there were times when all his former tenderness would return, and while his arms encircled her and her child, the poor girl would chide herself for having ever doubted his affection, and would look confidently forward to the time, when he would repair in a measure the wrongs he had done them.

Since they had resided in New York, Charles had not only attended many convivial meetings, but had frequently invited his friends to his house, and it was during one of the brighter intervals in his intercourse with Marian, that he requested her to superintend the preparations for a small party who were to dine with him. It was at a late hour that evening, when Marian having watched by her child till it sunk into a profound slumber, and feeling no disposition to sleep herself, stole quietly down stairs to procure a book. The library joined the dining room, and the revellers were too busy with their wine to have heard her, even had her step been heavier; but as she passed into the room, the folding doors were not wholly closed, and she heard her own name repeated by an unknown voice. Startled, she paused, and in another moment the same ribald tones proposed as a toast,—'Hamilton's pretty lady-bird, the fair Marian Shaw.' Then followed the coarse jest, the bitter sneer, and the name and history of the once pure and lovely May Queen were bandied about, and made the theme of jibe and jeer by a set of unprincipled and half intoxicated men. And he sat there, with a smile on his lips, those lips whose wily accents had lured her from duty, innocence, and respectability—he sat there and heard it all, yet uttered no word of rebuke, and lifted not his hand to fell to the earth the slanderer of his victim,—he, the beloved of her girlhood, the destroyer of her peace, the father of her child. Alas! she had not the claim of the insulted but virtuous wife—she could not claim redress, outraged and insulted as she was; she was his mistress, the shunned, despised and degraded, the mother of his child, but not the wife of his bosom.

With a noiseless step she glided back to her own apartment, and threw herself in the wild abandonment of grief beside her sleeping child. It was the embodiment of guilt and innocence. That beautiful young creature, kneeling with clenched hands and dishevelled tresses, the veins in her smooth forehead swollen and distended, and her large, black eyes flashing with terrible brilliancy, while beside her lay the sinless one who was to receive the heritage of a mother's sin and shame. One little dimpled hand lay beneath the fair and delicate cheek, over which floated a single glossy golden ringlet escaped from its confinement, and a sweet smile so like that which had won poor Marian's heart, parted the soft red lips, and disclosed the pearly treasures within. As the heart-stricken young mother gazed on the calm, tranquil beauty of her darling, by degrees that strange brightness left her eyes, that bitter smile forsook her lips, and amid her gushing tears went up the voice of deep, earnest prayer. Since the night she left her father's roof, Marian had never dared to pray, for ever, when she attempted it, the image of the venerable old man would rise before her, and the memory of her disobedience and ingratitude would check the devotional impulse; but now she prayed even as when in the days of her childhood, at that father's knee, she had lisped, 'Lead us not into temptation,' and she arose from her knees calmed and strengthened.

When some two hours later, his guests having departed, Charles Hamilton entered Marian's apartment, she was apparently sleeping, but as the partially shaded light from the lamp fell on her face, he saw that the dark lashes were gemmed with tears, and that their traces were yet left on the soft crimson cheek. For an instant an expression of remorse and pity came over his countenance, and bending, he pressed his lips to hers and murmured 'My poor Marian,' then going towards a table, he took a slip of paper from it, and after pencilling a few lines he laid it on her pillow and left the apartment. Ah! that caress, those few kind words had almost overturned Marian's resolutions; she had been tempted to look once more on that beloved face and to forgive and forget all, but the scene she had that night witnessed returned to her mind. A single glance through the small aperture left by the doors had been sufficient to reveal in the scoffer at her name, the form and features of him who had accompanied Hamilton on the day of their first meeting. With that image came up the well remembered May day party and all that had followed that ill-starred acquaintance, and the temptation was resisted. Marian listened till the last sound of Charles' footsteps had died away, and then with trembling hands she took the slip of paper and carried it to the night-lamp. It contained but a few words, merely informing her that he was to start in half an hour to join a party who were to be absent several days.

'It is well,' said Marian, 'surely Providence is favoring my plans, and aiding me to keep my resolution.'

In a short time Hamilton again descended the stairs, and as the hall door closed after him, Marian felt that they were parted forever. She had determined to leave his house, and to remove with her child to an humble but more honorable home, trusting to gain a subsistence by her industry, for herself and her helpless charge. In all that great city she had neither friend nor acquaintance, for remembering but too well, all she had endured in her former place of abode, she had shrunk with real terror from the coldness and scorn that would follow a knowledge of her situation. But in her daily walks she had often noticed at the window of a very humble dwelling in the suburbs of the city, the pale, meek face of a woman, considerably advanced in years, and had been struck with its resigned expression; the woman had evidently noticed her earnest gaze, and had latterly returned it with a benevolent smile. With her, though not a word had passed between them, Marian felt almost acquainted, and to her she resolved to go, and after making her acquainted with all her history, to ask her counsel and advice. Her breakfast was hastily despatched, and having dressed her child, she put on her bonnet and proceeded to the dwelling of Mrs. Lewis. Her light tap at the door was answered by the same meek-faced woman, and Marian was kindly invited to enter. The benevolent looks of the poor woman, soon opened the way for her visitor's recital; it was listened to with true and earnest sympathy, and the friendless girl felt that she was no longer alone.

'You are indeed young, to have seen misfortune,' said the kind-hearted Mrs. Lewis, as she wiped the tears from her eyes, 'yet I rejoice that you have at length resisted temptation, and broken the tie that bound you. You asked me for advice, and I can only say, return to your father! to the dear old man, who was father and mother both to you in your helpless childhood, and who now requires from you those attentions which none other can repay. Go to him my dear, confess to him your folly and sin, and tell him all that you have suffered—he will forgive you, I am sure he will, and restore you to the place you have forfeited. Alas! I too had once a daughter, as young and almost as beautiful as yourself; tenderly did I watch over her, for she was my all—yet she left me for a stranger, forsook the quiet of our humble, but happy home, to lead a gayer but less respectable life with him who had so basely deluded her. She left me, but she never returned. I never saw her again till she lay in her coffin—on her death-bed she had yearned for my forgiveness, but I was not there to bestow it. Oh how gladly would I have received her again, and have forgiven all, but it was not permitted me to do so. She has left me alone in the world; would you that your gray haired father should be left thus? Return then to him ere it is too late, lest death shall have sealed those lips ere they have uttered the blessed word "forgive;" the fountain of love is not dried up in his heart—the weeds which absence and neglect have allowed to grow there, may have choked its source, but the careful hand of repentant affection will soon pluck them thence, and the full tide will gush forth freely and clear as ever.'

Thus comforted, strengthened and advised, Marian set out on her return home, to make some little arrangements ere she quitted it forever. A small bundle of necessary clothing was hastily tied together, and she was about to leave the room, when a glance at her ungloved hand reminded her of something which in her haste, she had nearly forgotten. In the earlier days of their love, Charles had delighted to adorn and render even more brilliant, Marian's sparkling beauty, and he had lavished upon her many rare and costly ornaments. She sighed as she drew the sparkling gems from her fingers, for each had a little history of its own to her heart; one only she retained—a small pearl ring which he had given her on the night when she forsook all else to cleave to him; that was sacred to the misguided girl even as is the marriage-token to the lawfully wedded wife, and she could not return it, for to her it would have seemed like divorcing their spirits. Her watch, brooch and bracelets were placed carefully in their cases, and but one more ornament remained. Suspended from her neck by a small, exquisitely wrought chain of gold, was Charles' miniature, and as she gazed upon it, the deep blue eyes seemed to look up at her with the same passionate fondness as in the days of yore, and that smile seemed beaming upon her which had lured her confiding heart to ruin. That, too, she could not leave, he had hung it around her neck in the hour when first her young ear drank in the intoxicating words of love; she had worn it ever since, and disengaging it from the beautiful chain, she placed that in the casket, and attaching the picture to a black ribbon she returned it to its former place. Her last and hardest trial yet remained;—she could not go without bidding him adieu, him who for three years had been all in all to her, and whom she was never to look on more. Many a sheet did she commence and throw aside, and at length a few simple but touching lines told him of the events of the preceding night, of her resolution to see him no more, truly and devotedly as she yet loved him, and with one gush of tenderness, one outpouring of sorrow, she bade him farewell! The letter was left on his dressing table, and taking her bundle beneath her cloak, for it was now winter, she cast one lingering look around, and returned to the abode of her humble friend.

IV.

It was early in the evening preceding the good old festival of New England—Thanksgiving, when the stage-coach drove up to the little hotel of Lynmere village, and discharged its passengers. Among those whom the driver assisted to alight, was a female closely enveloped in a cloak and hood and with a child in her arms. She had entered the stage at the half-way house of their route, and appeared weary and exhausted; as the driver handed her a small bundle, her only luggage, he kindly offered to assist her in carrying her child to the place of her destination, but she firmly though gently declined his escort, saying that she had not much farther to go and the child was not heavy, and taking her bundle she proceeded. While she is thoughtfully treading the well-known street, and shrinking from the notice of the passers by, we will take a rapid glance at the neat, comfortable parlor of Woodland Cottage. The fire blazed brightly on the ample and well swept hearth, the curtains were closely drawn, and the light from the shaded lamp fell on the silver locks and lofty, furrowed brow of an aged man; his evening meal stood untasted beside him, and it was evident that his thoughts were not upon the contents of the newspaper in his hands. Ah to him the morrow was no anticipated day of festivity or joy—the memories of the past forbade it—his thoughts were with the long since dead, with the ungrateful and guilty living, the wife of his bosom and the daughter of his old age! Poor old man! he was sadly changed since we saw him last—the hale, hearty look had departed, his brow and cheek had many additional wrinkles, and the lines of grief and care were even more visible than those of time. He was startled from his reverie by a low, gentle tap at the door, and in answer to his mild invitation, a female entered, leading a child some two years old, and ere his perplexity and surprise would allow him to speak, the cloak dropped from her shoulders, the hood was thrown back, and Marian Shaw, pale and wan, yet beautiful still, sank at the old man's feet, unable to utter aught save the single word 'Father.' But that word was enough. It had touched with a master hand the right chord in his heart; the long-sealed fountain was stirred, and the very depths of his soul were thrilled by the imploring glance of those up-raised, tearful eyes, and by the soft, pleading tone of that voice, whose music had been wont to fill with joy and gladness, his now lonely dwelling. He did not speak—words were too impotent to express his emotions; but as he raised the kneeling girl and clasping her fondly to his breast, mingled his sobs and tears with hers, the Magdalen felt that she was forgiven.

V.

Have patience with me, dear reader, yet a little longer, and I will bring my story to a close. I have another scene to present, but in order to do this, you must give imagination a broad sweep, and suppose seven years to have intervened since Marian Shaw was first introduced to you, as the pure hearted, simple minded and lovely May Queen, and three or four since we left her a returned prodigal, a forgiven penitent in her father's arms. It was the sunset hour; the air was unusually mild and balmy for the season, and on the piazza in front of Woodland Cottage, two persons were leisurely and silently promenading. One was a tall, fine looking man, who had well nigh numbered his threescore years and ten. His long silver locks were parted smoothly on his broad, high brow, the ruddy hue of health was on his cheek, and his eye was bright with happiness. He leaned on the arm of a graceful young female, and his features were lighted up with a smile of affectionate admiration as he gazed on the sweet, chastened loveliness of her face. They had paced up and down the length of the piazza several times, when he at length exclaimed, 'Why are you so silent and sad, Marian? For half an hour you have not opened your lips, or raised your sweet eyes from the ground. I remember me of a time when a gorgeous sunset like this, would have called forth the most rapturous exclamations of delight from you; and when the trees, flowers and singing birds furnished you with abundant sources of amusement and conversation.'

'Very true, dear father, but those were the blessed days of my innocence and purity, days to which I look back with such longing and heartfelt yearnings; that happy season ere my feet became entangled in the scenes of the tempter. Yet I have been highly favored, and I sometimes feel as if my sufferings had not been sufficient to expiate my sin. I scarcely dared hope that even you, my dear father, would receive me, gentle, kind and forgiving as you were, and yet not only have I and my little one been taken to your bosom, and fondly cherished, but even my old friends and acquaintances, whom I so dreaded to meet, have never wounded my feelings by one scornful word or look, nor cast one slur upon my child. Very kind have all been to me, and ungrateful indeed should I be, did I not deeply feel and understand it all, and pray nightly and daily for their happiness and welfare. But when you spoke of my sadness, father, you forgot that it is the first of May, and that with that day many mournful thoughts and recollections are connected; my wasted youth, blighted hopes, and the dishonor that attaches, not to myself alone, but to my pure, innocent little Dora.'

'Do not afflict yourself, thus, Marian, or grieve so deeply over the events of the past. Has not your deportment since your return, been such as to call forth the admiration and esteem of all who know you? And I am sure there is not one in the village who does not cordially respect and love you; and for our sweet little Dora, is she not the joy of our hearts, and the pride of the whole village! She is a lovely creature, and yet I cannot help wishing her face were like your own.'

'She is very like her father, and I often think I love her even better for that very resemblance. Poor Charles! shall I never see him again? was that parting indeed forever? has the grave claimed him in all the pride of his manly beauty, or has he forgotten the loving and simple girl whose life was boundless in his love?'

'Do you then still love Charles Hamilton, Marian? were he now to return willing to repair, as far as he can, your wrongs, would you freely and willingly become his wife?'

'Would I not? Most willingly, nay rather, most gladly would I—I should deem it my duty to Dora and myself, and even setting that aside, I love him as deeply and truly now, as when six years ago I sacrificed all else for him. Surely, dear father, you would not have me act otherwise?'

'Not if it would secure your happiness, dearest;—but see, the juvenile May party has dispersed, and here comes my darling,'—and as he spoke, a beautiful child bounded along the gravel walk, and the next moment her arms were entwined alternately round the necks of her mother and grandfather. She was indeed, as Marian said, very like her father. She had the same fair, delicate complexion, deep blue eyes, and regular features, which would have rendered his beauty, perfect as it was, almost effeminate, but for his dark, abundant hair, and tall, manly figure; and as the child stood there, with her straw hat swinging in her hands, her bright golden curls wreathed with flowers, floating on her plump white shoulders, and an arch smile lighting up her whole face,

'She seemed too fair and bright a thing,
To dwell 'mid sin and suffering.'

They had continued their walk but a few moments, when a lad from the village approached and placed a letter in Marian's hands. She started and turned pale as she glanced at the superscription, and leaving her father and child together, she entered the house. She bent her steps towards a small apartment of which we have spoken in the earlier part of our narrative; the same which witnessed the struggle between filial love and ardent passion, and throwing herself into a chair, she opened the letter and read:

'MINE OWN MARIAN:—My best beloved, though bitterly wronged and betrayed,—do not cast this from you till you have perused it, and attentively considered what I have to say. Marian, I am here once more—here on the spot where seven years ago I first saw you in all the radiance of your young beauty; I have seen you now, in your subdued and chastened, but not faded loveliness, and I could have fallen at your feet and asked your forgiveness; and more than this, Marian, I have seen one whom my heart told me was my child, mine—I have looked on ye both, when ye saw me not, and my soul yearned towards ye. Marian! deeply and bitterly have I sinned against you, but could you have known my sufferings from that day when I returned home and found it deserted and desolate—could you have witnessed my agony and remorse when I read the few lines you left, to tell me that we were parted forever—could you have seen me as I lay for long weeks afterwards, on the bed of sickness and suffering, with none but the hands of hirelings to minister to me, and calling even in my delirium upon your name, you would have pitied me, even while you felt that it was but a just retribution for my sins. During my recovery, I had ample time for reflection and repentance, and I went forth once more into the sunshine a wiser and better man. I made vigilant inquiries and ascertained that you had returned to your father, and had been, as I doubted not you would be, joyfully received; but I determined not to seek you or endeavor to see you till I was enabled to do so conscientiously and honorably. From that time no inducements could lead me back to my former pursuits. I was proof against the flatteries and entreaties, as well as the sneers and mockery of my old companions. I foreswore the wine cup and the dice box, and resolved to commence a new course of life. Just then, I received an offer to go out to India, as supercargo of a richly laden vessel, and I thankfully accepted the offer. I have remained in that situation ever since, and by enterprise and industry I have gained, I think, enough to ensure us a competence; and now that I have told you all, will you forgive me—will you be my wife, my own? We have both suffered, Marian; I read that to-day, in your pale cheek and saddened eyes; and by the memory of our early love, and the hours we have passed together—for the sake of our own peace and the welfare of our child, I implore you to accede to my wishes. I do not ask you again to forsake your father; I must have his for-givenness also, and if you plead for me and with me, he will not refuse. We will all live together, and I will emulate you in your attentions and devotion to him. Should your answer be yea, I am yours heart and soul forever—if nay,—but I will not doubt; write to me, Marian, and let your words be ministers of love and joy to

For a few minutes Marian sat motionless with the open letter in her hand, completely overpowered by the rush of emotions that swept over her; then sinking on her knees, she breathed forth in low, fervent tones, that beautiful petition, which seems to comprise in its small limits, the sum of all the wants of the human heart—The Lord's Prayer. As she concluded, a rich manly voice joined in the Amen, and starting to her feet, Marian again stood face to face with Hamilton.

Reader! would you know more of Marian? Go to Lynmere village, for there she is best known, loved, and appreciated; they will tell you of her untiring devotion to her aged father, of her idolizing love for her husband and child—of her kindness to the poor widow, Mrs. Lewis, who has long dwelt in the sunshine of prosperity, in the home of her in whose misfortunes she sympathised, and whom she so kindly and wisely counselled. They will tell you of her beauty, gentleness and benevolence, but far more will they dwell upon her meekness, humility and christian charity, for gently as she has been dealt by, Marian Hamilton has never for a moment forgotten her early temptation and transgression. In silence and in bitterness of spirit has she mourned over it, and her tears and prayers have not been unavailing, for she has come forth from the furnace of affliction, purified and refined. Those whom she most wronged, her father and her child have freely forgiven her, and should others be inclined to bring forward and display on the page of her life the one blot which mars its purity, or deem that her sin was too easily palliated and overlooked—to them we would say, as did our blessed Lord to the accusers of old, 'Let him that is without sin among you, cast the first stone.'

THE BEREAVED MOTHER.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

A SOUND of woe is on the summer air,
A note so fraught with sadness, that the wing
Of the light whispering zephyr seems to droop
In sympathy, and from the wild-flower bells
Wakens low, mournful echos, such as erst
Trembled amid the pale green olive leaves
Of Bethany, when Mary's stricken heart
Breath'd its sad plaint above her brother's grave.

Oh who hath known the agonizing pang
That rends the mother's heart-strings, when the shaft

Of the unsparing archer hath cut down,
In all the pride of loveliness and truth,
Some fondly cherish'd blossom?

Who hath mourned,
When some beloved idol hath been reft
From the fond bosom's shrine, and lowly laid
Within the silent chambers of the grave?
Come drop the pitying tear with her who weeps
Above the fearful wreck of garner'd hopes—
Hopes, that had strengthened with each rolling year,
Twining so closely 'mid her being's cords,
It seemed they could not fail her. But alas!
In the bright blooming bowers of sunnier climes,
Where moan the light winds thro' the orange flowers,
Freighting their pinions with the sweet perfumes,
And nature in her richest vesture smiles
Beneath the ardent sunbeams; stranger hands
Have smooth'd the pillow for her dying son.

Oft when the rosy dawn has spread her plumes
To gild the eastern sky, and herald on
The day-god's flaming chariot, shall she list
To catch once more the deep-toned melody
Of that lov'd voice that trill'd so sweetly forth
His matin hymn of gladness.

Ah no more,
Within the dark, sin-blighted bowers of time,
Its silvery tones shall glad her yearning heart,—
Oft when the gorgeous sunset tints the sky
With the rich hues of glory, and the waves,
Of the glad river gleam like molten gold,
Ting'd with the mellow light, as if the wing
Of cherubim had rested in its flight,
And shed its radiance o'er the glancing stream,
Which, like the tide of human destiny
Rolls swiftly on, to the vast ocean-bourne;
Unconsciously her musing heart shall wait
To greet his well known footstep.

When the shades
Of lingering twilight deepen into gloom,
And the cerulean glows with diamond-fires—
Pure altar-lights, lit by the hand of love
To beautify the solemn fane of night,
And woo the earth bound spirit up to God;
Then how the thronging visions round her press,
As memory backward rolls the vanish'd years,
And brings again her loved one smiling fresh,
In cherub infancy. His merry laugh
Rings on the ear in cadence clear and wild.
The whispering breezes lift the floating curls
That shade his star-like eye, where brightly beams
The mind's immortal signet. The warm gush
Of fond maternal tenderness and pride,
Impearls her drooping lids with crystal gems
More precious than the diamonds of the mine.
But ah! th' enchanter's wand has touch'd the scene!
Chill, chill and dark the pall is gathering now,
Above those hallowed memories. Far away,
Within the stranger's home, the death-scene spreads
Before her aching vision. Pale, and low,
The cherish'd idol of her stricken heart
Is grappling with the fearful conqueror.
No sister near, with kindly ministries

To buoy the shrinking spirit in the strife
Of mortal agony. No mother kind,
To wipe the death damps from his pallid brow,
Or with the fond maternal kiss to close
The glazing eye.

O what a weight of woe,
Of deep and untold sorrow rests upon
Her bosom's quivering cords, as fancy lists
To the dull echos of the falling mould,
That curtains up for aye, from human sight,
The son, so fondly loved! the south wind's sigh
Comes laden with a sadly moaning wail,
That thrills her being's core. The summer bowers
When flowers from every glen and mossy nook
Fling out their perfumes to the passing gale,
Like the sweet incense of unsullied hearts
On nature's sacred altar, wear a gloom,
To her sad vision. In the balmiest hours,
When bloom and beauty deck'd the fragrant vales,
Her loved one perish'd, in young manhood's prime.

Father, thy counsels are unsearchable;
Deep and mysterious, past the scrutiny
Of our weak visions; yet we humbly bring
Our chastened hearts, and rest them on the shrine
Of thy unchanging goodness; for we know
Thy love is never dim or clouded, though we see
In a glass darkly, as we journey on Through this sad wilderness of woe and tears,
Above the atmosphere of cloud and storm,
In glory unapproachable, thy throne
Stands based upon the eternal rocks of Truth.
Mercy's bright angel ever ready stands
To bear thine embassies of love afar,
To all thy sentient offspring; and her tones
Have sounded o'er the dreary wastes of sin,
Where death's dark angel spreads his shadowy wings,
And ignorance and error cast their mists
Above the spell-bound spirit; and thy hand
Hath rent the intervening veil that hid
The glories of our future destiny
From mortal ken. Faith with her shining wand
Hath swept away the interposing gloom
That frown'd above the portals of the grave.

Now through the opening vistas we behold
The never-fading verdure of those bowers
Where in perennial beauty ever shine
The ransomed ones we mourn. The radiant crown
Of glory gilds their ever-beaming brows,
Redeem'd forever from each darkening tinge
Of sin or sorrow, that so often shades
The pilgrim-spirit on life's desert waste.
Beneath th' ambrosial shades of living bloom
They walk the star-paved avenues, beside
The crystal waters of eternal life.
Bereaved one, mourn no more; th' appointed hour
Is hastening on when we may join the chant,
Whose ever pealing echos thrill along
The golden arches of that holy fane
Where Zion's Dove the radiant wing unfurls;
Above whose pearly gates forever waves
The flaming banner of that quenchless love,
Which brought the tidings of salvation down

To guilty, fallen man. Then mourn no more,
The spirit-pinion soon shall be unfurl'd,
And thou shalt join thy loved ones in that clime
Where fall no shadows on the living stream,
Where discord never jars the blissful song,
But living flowers, in ever vernal bloom,
Shed their ambrosial incense on the air.

STUDY TO BE QUIET.

BY REV. HENRY BACON.

'We beseech you, brethren, that ye increase more and more; and that ye study to be quiet, and to do your own business, and to work with your own hands.' 1 Thess. IV. 10, 11.

In the fourteenth century of the church, a peculiar sect arose which were called Quietists—a proper name for such characters, as quietness, devoid of activity, was the whole of their religion. It was their custom to sit for a long time every day, with their eyes fixed immovably on some particular object, and in this situation they professed to receive heavenly visions and to behold a glorious light surrounding them like that which surrounded the Lord on Mount Tabor at the transfiguration, and which sent to their hearts the most delicious sensations of pleasure. They were content with this intense contemplation. It was religion enough for them, and led them to disregard the external world, and care nothing for those parts of religion and devotion which appealed to the senses. They were greatly opposed by other parties, and as their habits kept them from making any outward resistance to their enemies, and rendered them in appearance stubborn and wilful, the opposition triumphed in cruelty, and many suffered painful death.

With neither of these does the christian spirit harmonize; for while on the one hand it teaches us to rightly use the world, it on the other guards us from selfishness and intolerance. It bids us be ever active, and yet requires us to be quiet; and as its teachings are dictated by one spirit, these requisitions must coalesce and be free from any contradictory tendencies. It is important that we understand this, and recognize the true genius of our holy religion.

We turn to our motto. The Apostle had been speaking of brotherly love, declaring that there was no necessity for his inculcating that duty, as they were taught it of God. And indeed it was so. They were taught this of God by the revelation he had made of his nature, of the great plan of Redemption, of human relationship and the necessary means for happiness. In all this the truth was seen—that man was made to love—to love as Jesus loved—to love as human progress absolutely requires. He would not stop to define this duty, but took it for granted that the Thessalonians understood what brotherly love meant, and its beauty. He therefore exhorts them to 'increase more and more.' He besought them to do this, which implies an earnest feeling as active and filling the soul of the teacher with a holy warmth. He would have them realize the grand fact in our nature—the existence of an ever expansive capacity to love. He admitted to them that he knew they exercised love toward all the brethren in all Macedonia, and in the exercise of this amiable spirit, he would have them 'increase more and more'—keep it perpetually active, ever enlarging its expansiveness and warmth, and thus carrying out beautifully the teachings of God.

On this requisition, he knew every thing depended. It was and is the essential spirit of all true progress, infusing so much of its own nature into every mental faculty as to mould and temper it in harmony with the highest good. 'Increase more and more!' is the ever sounding voice of our religion. We have no time to halt—even our sleep should contribute to our growth and strength. The vital spirit should make us like the oak, which at first sprung from a small seed which the light wind could roll as it pleased, and is now a lofty monarch, having braved all seasons, and partook of all influences that contribute to growth and perfection. There it now stands firm, strong, noble, majestic, and yet beautiful. Even so it should be with the christian. The believer should not imagine that he can become an oak in an hour after the acorn of truth finds its deposit in the soil of the heart.

'Here a little and there a little,' must be the order of its expansion. Now and then will come times and seasons when a mighty impulse will be given and the increase be great. But after all, the great hope must be in the continuous though imperceptible enlargement, as a bud unfolds, or a fruit is formed.

'Increase more and more!' is the command—the command of Him who formed the mind, and gave to every capacity the power of expansion, by which there is a greater force locked up in the human soul than is concealed in the bosom of the sea. Man boasts of that science and philosophy by which he dips from the great reservoir a little of the element, confines it as it suits him, and then he stands as the genius of art leading on the mighty train with the speed of the wind. A powerless body that water seemed as it passed from one receiver to another, but science applied its magic, and lo! its expansive force is wonderful! Christianity is a better science. It deals with a better element, in union with more precious and delicate mechanism. It would combine love with our whole being—fearfully and wonderfully made; and so operate as to make man a leader of humanity, with the vast train of social existences, onward over the grand way of righteousness and truth. O it is a wonderful science! coming with its simple and winning proposition to the little child and swelling his young heart with the affections it expands, and giving the mightiest elevation to the lofty spirit of him who has entered into the far depths of Truth's mysterious temple, who communes with the stars as one that reads distinctly the illumined page of Night, and treads the earth as its lord. It has its dew drop for the babe, and its rolling worlds for the philosopher. It has its delicate and fragrant rose for the invalid, and its heavy task to draw out to the farthest tension the muscles of the ponderous arm of the mighty. It is the science of God, of Humanity, of Destiny! To be learned in that is to be learned indeed, though infinitely less is the grandeur and glory of his increase who is but a theoretical student, in contrast with him who is a practical christian philosopher. The least in the kingdom of God—in the ranks of the followers of the Regenerator in the Regeneration, is greater than the greatest under John the Baptist—the pioneer to Truth—to the Way and the Life! 'I beseech you, brethren, that ye increase more and more. And,' continues our Teacher, 'study to be quiet, and to do your own business, and to work with your own hands.' Important matters for consideration—important matters for practice. Let us not turn from them.

The peace and prosperity of the Thessalonian christians were greatly injured by what the Apostle terms 'disorderly walking,' in those who were 'busy-bodies, working not at all.' These busy-bodies worked enough in their own way, as their name implies. But it was work unproductive of good and hurtful in the extreme—hurtful to the individual in the disposition it cherished; hurtful to the church by the dissensions it created; and hurtful to the unbelieving world by the reasons it gave for reproach of the christians. It might well form a subject of concern in the Apostle's mind, and demand from him the counsels it did draw out. These counsels are for our good, for a slight glance at what makes up the variety of our bustling, busy world, is sufficient to teach us that we need the injunctions referred to. There is too much busy idleness in the world around us—people busy in what does not concern them as duty, and idle in reference to what they should do. These are discords in the social hymn, and spoil many a beautiful harmony—as disagreeable as a creaking door when the conversation must be in whispers.

Here I pause to disclaim all admiration for selfish Quietists, who wrap themselves up in themselves and care not for the struggling world around them. These take as wild an extreme as the others, and lock themselves as truly in a monastery as him of the cowl and beads. They know not the great purpose of their being; they judge the world too much from the study, and too little from mingling where they hear the low sound of beating hearts, as the throbbing of far hidden, exquisite enginery. They do not magnetize their hearts with social sympathy, so as to have the spirit of acute penetration. Society would stand still, if they were its main wheels. I speak not of the physically infirm, whose hearts beat strong in feeble casements, though society never hears them. God hears them and they have his blessing. But I speak of the mentally indifferent, who are ever thinking of the lion in the street, and of being slain if they venture out, and who never pray for Samson strength to struggle with the foe, that they may repeat the riddle—'Out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness.' Had they been with Moses in the wilderness, many times would they have been of those who tempted him to return to Egypt, forgetting the command received when the Lord said: 'Speak to the children of Israel that they go forward!'

Let it be remembered that the Apostle does not, in the motto, commend as a virtue the natural temperament which makes quietness a pervading feature of the characters of some—a sluggish movement of the blood and a delicateness of habit which requires a world where no thunder and lightning are generated; for he frequently speaks of the christian as a soldier—a warrior clad in full armor and with great determination of spirit and boldness of courage, prepared for the stern conflict, as well as for the affectionate and silent communion with the God and the Prince of peace.

We must recall Paul's example, as we meditate on his words, and understand the quietness he loved, to be a quietness compatible with the noblest activity—with the exercise of every manly attribute, and full devotion to social good. There must be jars and crashes, and we must prepare our nerves for them. There are fierce spirits to be met, and we must be ready not to quail. There are grievous sights to see, and we must not turn from them. We must be like the true son of the sea. He knows what to expect. He contrasts himself with what he has to deal with and feels humble;—he thinks of God and his promises, and becomes strong. He knows who rules above both storm and calm, and willingly meets them both. And both do him good. They form the variety of his character; and his history is as rich in instruction as in incident. When you see him, you know him. You connect him at once with the sea, and think of what he has been familiar with—face to face. You see one whose motto is—'Duty is ours, events are God's!' and its spirit being made a part of his life, causes him to enjoy richly the soft loveliness of the calm, to find exquisite pleasure in contending with a good spirit with the rude and various powers of the most excited time, and with bold and honest courage to meet the stern trial, waiting the worst and hoping the best, strong through the consciousness of duty done. So is it with the christian and the ever restless and ever changing sea of society. He adds not to needless noise and confusion; he seeks to do his own business, and not leave the work he ought to do to others.

The first duty enjoined—'Study to be quiet,' implies a necessity for effort and continued application. To study requires application of the mind according to certain rules, or appropriate means; and the earnestness of application must be in accordance with the difficulties to be contended with and the importance of the matter at issue. In order to claim the character of a true student, there must be the manifestation of persevering and careful diligence—a willingness to submit to necessary processes of thought and experiment, and a due regard to every step from first premises to final deductions. And more than this;—he must continue his studies as long as he has any thing to study, or power of mind to engage. When he ceases to study, he ceases to be a student. He dreams he is perfect—that he has 'finished his education'—and reads not the great moral of the ever changing of the aspect of society, which requires a continuous studious spirit to understand the application of christian principles to the exigencies of the present time, in view of the future. We must be practical, as well as theoretical students, for thus only can we be of his disciples who bade men follow him in the Regeneration—the remoulding of the social elements.

Thus we must see that the quietness required, is compatible and must be united with an energetic activity, both in the individual and in the social. And here let us think of who wrote our motto, and we shall see the subject illustrated. It is Paul—Paul the ever enthusiastic apostle, continually surrounded with stormy elements and most fiercely opposed at every step—now stoned, now beaten with rods, now clamorously assailed, now imprisoned, now singing and praying amid an earthquake. This taught him that study as he might, he would not be able to be quiet—he could not cease to be an agitator—he could not fold his hands and say—Done! Yet how do we see him act amid this rage of the elements of storm and fury? As doth the son of the sea, to whom we have alluded. He maintains a noble self-possessing spirit, as conscious that if he gives himself to the storm all will be lost—his companions sacrificed, and the ship he commands foundered. The winds must blow, and he must think quick, resolve with rapidity, and act with decision; and as thus he does, he appears the genius of quietness amid the fury around. Thus it was with Paul. He never created a storm through an angry spirit—through a meddlesome disposition—through an idle disregard of real usefulness, but studied to be quiet. Yet when a storm arose, he did not shrink into himself—he did not sacrifice principle for a momentary and deceptive peace, nor did he give up any attribute of manliness. He stood and studied to be quiet. He acted according to his study, and one great moral of his history is—that the true Reformer amid the stormiest seasons of contending minds, will prize dearly what contributes to love and peace, and will aim to win man as well as to advocate principles.

The Apostle thus spake the truth in love, kept to the great objects of his mission or business, and worked with his own powers as one that loved to work, true to his own advice—'As much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men.'

And wherefore is all this enjoined upon us?

1. That we may be men of principle and hold fast to truth as the only conservative spirit that can produce desirable and lasting peace. God is unchangeable, because he is true to principles and adheres thereto through all seasons and all ages. And only thus can our ways be as the ways of God, though evermore infinitely removed in perfectibility. In this we should increase more and more. In devotion thereto, we should possess our souls in quietness; do what we can for the order of home, society, and the church, and rejoice in hope, whatever be the indications of present ill fortune.

This we need in many relations, as continually we are tried by what we cannot control. We may illustrate the application of this truth as it relates to business, to politics, to social life, to the various associations for reforms, by alluding to what, as Universalists, we are called to meet. Against us there is, and probably will be, the most unprincipled opposition—the worst and most disgraceful weapons and means employed, and the most censurable disregard of all honorable modes of mental warfare. We are classed with the vilest of the vile; all true love of spiritual things is denied us; and our name is bandied about with every vulgar epithet, so that we are often compelled to say to our brethren in James' words: 'Do not they blaspheme that worthy name by which ye are called.' Broad upon the folds of our banner, which we erect on the tower into which even 'the righteous' are forced to run in the time of trouble, we inscribe—'Universal Salvation!' The ultimate salvation of undivided humanity from error, sin, and death. And yet we are styled lovers of sin, crying peace to the wicked, and every circumstance that can be used to our disadvantage is circulated with eagerness, is believed with all the colorings given by those who love to paint man as depravity personified. All the evil in their own ministry is wept over as the mournful effects of the lingerings of Adam's sin in the constitution and the violence of Satan's attacks upon the children of God; while all the evil seen or imagined in our ministry, is traced direct to the licentious tendency of our principles. And thus it will be. Thus we must be tortured. Thus our sensibilities will often be outraged, and our hearts sicken at what we hear and read. But what is our duty? Is it to grow weak and despair, because of this? No! Our duty is to fall back upon our principles and by them be strengthened anew. Thus has it been with many a Reformer, when the reverberating echo of a world's laugh and scorn perpetually sounded on his ear. The sneers and mockery of congregated thousands cannot affect the life of great principles of Truth, else christianity were dead when the Lord of life and glory was crucified and slain. O Jesus on the cross was destined to hear and see worse than we do, and never can we be racked as he was. See him there! thou who faintest! Think of what he saw—think of what he heard—think of how he acted—acted when hands and feet were nailed and his head drooped! Think of those eyes whose light no enemy could utterly dim—think of those lips wreathed with a smile of mercy, while agony of body would make them quiver and purple! O my brethren, glory in the spirit of the Cross! Study to be quiet as your Master was. Let the enemy nail us to the accursed tree in company with thieves, if they will; but let us so prove the divinity of our religion, that that cross of shame may be changed to a symbol of conquest and glory.

Thus shall we obey the exhortation following our motto, to conduct ourselves honestly towards those who are without and have lack of nothing.

And we are to think of those within—to study to be quiet in reference to the brotherhood of Faith. Every christian grace and virtue thrives best in peace, and to preserve peace should be our constant and earnest study. Dissensions within will weaken us more than opposition without; and therefore the Apostle often repeated to every church the exhortation, to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace. With earnestness and tears he often called them to think of the humbleness and lowliness of Jesus, how he pleased not himself—thought not merely of his own gratification, and how he labored to illustrate the law of love and union. We must be united in reference to the great objects of our cause, and not permit things of minor importance to distract and confuse us. We must remember that we are laboring for the future—that we are to add stone after stone surely and harmoniously to the walls of the glorious and indestructible temple, in anticipation of the time when the universal cry shall be—'Grace, grace unto it!' Things of the present hour should be lightly weighed, when compared with the importance of those which pertain to the permanency of the church; not that the latter require a relinquishment of principle—a desertion of aught honorable and good, for they do not; and I speak only of matters of feeling and taste, when I speak of things of the present hour.

I should not be misunderstood, and I cannot be, if the general sentiment I have advanced, be candidly considered in union with the present proposition. When we hear of persons who are said to have 'an understanding one way, and a feeling another,' we know what is meant. We know that this explains why professors of the loving and generous principles of christian truth, sometimes allow themselves to be carried into paths never pointed out by Jesus as leading to unity and success. In their hours of calm reflection, they know what their principles require of them—they know what human nature demands of the generous and candid, and they think they realize the beauty of consistency of principle and conduct—the beauty of Christ and the glory of God. But their feelings carry them too soon astray. Before they are aware of it, they have looked as stern and answered as coldly as in the past; and though in the secret retirement they weep in bitterness, yet as soon as they are out in the world, they are again lost, and love's law is violated. The subordination of the sensitive to the intellectual part of our being, is the most difficult portion of the task of properly balancing our powers, but is attended with the most important results. We would not lessen the sensitive, but cultivate the intellectual and religious, and thus control it—thus study to be quiet. The wise man saith—'only by pride cometh contention.' Is it so? I will not venture to deny its truth, but repeat the Apostle's exhortation—I say, through the grace given unto me, to every man that is among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think, but to think soberly—with deliberation and not with undue warmth—with remembrance of one's own failings and not as though he himself were perfect—with a desire not only for individual opinion and taste, but for the general good. There is indeed a holy meaning in the Apostle's language when he bade the disciples to submit themselves one to another in the fear of God. Not that one or some should erect a confessional to which all should come, or a test by which all should be tried, but that the whole should regard their relative duties, be advised and advise, and work together for the furtherance of all that is truthful, good, and blessed. Even so be it with us.

Providence, R. I.

THE WRECKED MARINER.

A LEGEND OF MARBLEHEAD.

BY MRS. C. W. HUNT.

ALL night the fearful storm had swelled
Along the rocky coast,
And high against the blackened cliffs
The foaming billows toss'd.

The booming of the minute gun
Blends with the thunder's roar;
Woe! to the bark that's struggling now
Upon that dangerous shore.

The Indian started from his couch,
As the wild sounds swept by;
Was it a dream? or did he hear
The great Manitou's cry?

The foot of 'pale-face' ne'er had pressed
The sod his people roamed,

Nor tall ship ventured there, where now,
The angry surges foamed.

Again it comes! unknown before
His warrior breast to fear;
But now he quailed; he who had stood
Unmoved when death was near.

Unea, of the sunny eye!
An Indian maiden bright,
Sleepless within her tent had lain,
Thro' the tempestuous night.

She was the glory of her tribe
A beauteous Indian belle;
With eyes—such as are only seen
In the glorious gazelle.

Her step was fleetest in the chase,
And lightest in the dance;
And round her like a halo fell
The light of her soft—glance.

The morning dawned—cloudless and clear
As faith's serenest sky;
She strung her bow and wandered forth,
Unheeding—listlessly.

Her bounding feet had scaled the rocks
Ere she was half aware;
But oh! the startling sight that met
Her hurried glances there.

A being clinging to the cliffs
Formed like her own brave race;
But oh! how different the hue
Of his unearthly face!

Breathless she stood—her dark eyes bent
Full on his kneeling form;
Could it be his—that fearful voice;
Borne on the last night's storm!

Yet there was something in his eye
That brooded like a spell
Upon her wild untutored soul;
Gently her footsteps fell.

As timidly to his side she drew,
He pointed to the wreck,
There lay, between the rifted rock
A fragment of the deck.

With all the quickness of her race
She felt his mute appeal;
And marked the flush of agony
Across his pale brow steal.

She led him to her Father's lodge,
And tended him with care,
With herbs and spells she healed his wounds;
Did not love spring up there?

Oh, yes! she'd say, when in her moods
Of wild idolatry—
I wonder not the deep sea moaned,
In yielding one like thee;

For she could never comprehend
The voices of that night,
But still thought 'twas the ocean's cry,
For the young pale brow's flight.

She taught him with unerring aim
To hurl the fatal dart;
And he—what gave he in return?
The birth-right of the heart!

A brave young warrior long had sought
Unea, for his bride,
And saw with frowning—jealous eyes,
The pale-face by her side.

He sought her tent; the old chief plucked
A wild rose from the tree,
His bride—he said—who hits this flower,
Shall the young maiden be.

Unea, rose; father—the rock!
There let the trial be;
For there begun—and there shall end,
My web of destiny.

Quick thro' the lodge the tidings flew,
And ere night-fall drew near,
A dusky throng was gathered there
With hunting-bow and spear.

The last rays of the setting sun
Illumined rock and flood,
And statue-like within their midst
The young Unea stood.

One hand was resting on her bow,
The other slightly placed
Beneath her robe; a heron's plume
Her queenly forehead graced.

A sapling—crown'd with regal rose
Was placed upon the rock,
Frail flower! not thou—nor maiden's heart,
Can stand the rude spear's shock!

The young brave drew his arrow forth
And strung his pliant bow;
Swiftly it sped, oh! joy! 'twas lost
In the glad ocean's flow.

A murmur broke; the pale face rose,
And all was hushed again.
Again it swells! arrow and rose
Sweep o'er the glowing main!

A wild shriek from Unea broke,
She sprung—but oh! too late!
An arrow from the warrior's bow,
Had sealed young Henri's fate.

Her heart forboded this, she knew
The deadly hate he'd feel;
And hid beneath her star-wrought robe
The swift avenging steel.

Quicker than thought—aye! quicker far
Than lightning words can tell—

She hurled the glittering tomahawk,
And the brave warrior fell.

With one light bound she gained the verge
Of the terrific steep,
Great Spirit! forgive the deed, she cried,
And plunged into the deep.

SKETCHES FROM THE MEMORY. NO. II.

BY REV. T. P. ABELL.

BEHIND TIME.

'Too late! the curse of life! could we but read
In many a heart, the thoughts that inly bleed,
How oft were found
Engraven deep, those words of saddest sound—
(Curse of our mental state!)
Too late—too late!'

PHILOSOPHERS and sages, as well as poets and gentlemen of easy fortunes, are singularly unanimous in the opinion that life is altogether a haphazard affair. Once in a while, besure, we meet with an individual who will affirm that we may at our own will, 'make or mar' our respective destinies,—that, especially we Yankees, may take dame Fortune by the left ear and lead her whithersoever we please. Such persons are unquestionably superb dreamers,—nothing more. And it is a fact worthy of particular mention in this veritable document, that their encouraging visions are seldom realized in their own history. Credit them for their benevolence; they dream for others. Say what they will, life is one grand scene of mishaps and blundering casualties,—generally shifting itself along in a beautiful serio-comico manner, just as the little cogs of the 'wheel within a wheel' chance to match in harmony with their fellows.

It is the part of philosophy to view nothing as strange, however unaccountable it may at first seem. But certainly it was a little strange that Solomon Sleeper was ever cognominated Solomon Sleeper. He was always,—that is in the former part of his career,—an exceedingly wakeful and stirring gentleman. His name was therefore a most glaring misnomer. It was a sort of paternal libel, which he had been ungenerously doomed to carry forever about with him. As the faithful chronicler of some of the most important events of his life, we must here premise that, after long and, we think, mature deliberation on the subject, we are convinced that many of his misfortunes are justly attributable to the undefinable agency of his personal appellative. Ah, what is there not in a name?

Solomon Sleeper, in early life, was a lad of great promise. At least, such was the profound judgment of his parents and the impartial domestics; and who should know better than they? We pass over the history of his earlier school years by noting only, that Solomon was successively eulogized by his kind instructors, though, in conclusion, they generally mingled some hints about 'tardiness' with their superfluous praise. 'Never mind,' the mother would self-consolingly remark, 'his father was so before him, and was none the worse for that.'

In due time Solomon became a sophomore. He sported an ivory-headed rattan,—each ear was buried beneath a brush-heap of chestnut locks,—and a gold repeater laid in his fob on his left breast, and beat beside his beating heart. On the whole, his appearance was rather promising, and he found himself in agreeable company. But Solomon was studious. He did not suffer the novelty of his situation to attract him from his books. Indeed, he was not content to follow on in the regular course of his class. He was ambitious. He therefore voluntarily multiplied his labors far beyond the usual extent. He consequently soon found himself embarrassed for want of time. He was frequently unseasonable in his attendance at the recitations. An occasional lecture from the Professor was found insufficient to cure him of the vice, not of studying too little, but too much. Great indulgence was extended to him. It was acknowledged by the faculty that he made truly praiseworthy proficiency. But he became more and more unobservant of the regulations of the Institution. Such a practice could not be allowed. It would corrupt the 'young gentlemen' who, it was confessed, were generally less book-inclined than Solomon. Therefore, just after entering upon the third year of his collegiate studies, Solomon Sleeper was expelled for tardiness.

'La me!' said the mother, as she placed her glasses across her olfactory tunnel preparatory to reading the letter announcing the fact of her son's expulsion,—'la me,' said the mother, 'Solomon is a genus, and how can they expect him to conform to the petty rules of that little school?' And thereupon the unfortunate young man was affectionately invited to visit his mother.

Students from college,—especially when sent home in disgrace,—are peculiarly apt to fall in love. They want, above all things else, human sympathy. They say:—

'In science do we wildly seek

What only withering years should bring,

The feeble pulse, the languid cheek,

The spirits drooping on their wing.'

The heart yearns for a fellow heart to lean on. Solomon Sleeper had strange sensations of loneliness and desolation. He had been profligate of the midnight oil,—for long days and nights—nay months—nay, again, for years, he had fevered, boiled his delicate brain; and now he had found only degradation and desertion. Of what avail were his heart-wearying toils, while no eye beamed kindly upon him, and no fair, soft hand, in the warmth and truth of friendship, sprung forth to clasp his own? 'O,' he exclaimed, as he laid his lank hand upon his bosom, 'oh for one drop of the waters of affection to quench this parching thirst.' And Solomon Sleeper was ready to fall in love.

The stage wheeled around in front of the boarding house. It was on a bright sunshiny morning in June.

'All ready?' said the gentlemanly driver, as he opened the door of the coach and moved back the end of the centre seat.

It was a very singular phenomenon that Solomon found himself seated directly opposite to a young lady of very rare beauty. He had observed her in the outset of his cursory survey of his fellow passengers. The second survey seemed necessary, which was accomplished with less haste. It was wondrously satisfactory, especially the conclusion, it having been performed in a reversed manner from the preceding, terminating where the other commenced. At first his breath grew slow and heavy. Then he did move. He twirled his thumbs, and then the tassels of his umbrella. He looked at the face of his watch, and then at the face of —. Heavens! their eyes meet. We pass on.

The pleasing predicament was evidently mutual. The use of their tongues seemed a pastime as delightful as it was unremitting. Solomon was confident that he had never met with so many striking qualifications and accomplishments in any one lady before. And when the stage drew up at her father's gate, near sunset, he had positively promised, in passing that way again, which would be soon, to call upon her. The parting glances were flashed off, and on whirled the stage. Solomon took the vacated seat, leaned back his head, and closed his eyes. In a moment more, he was plainly far away among the castles and paradise-bowers of Dream-land.

The next day Mrs. Sleeper welcomed her son. But she was surprised at his strangely altered appearance. Undoubtedly, thought she, his ill treatment at college greatly afflicts him. Ah, what secrets hath the young heart that may not be revealed to the elder generation!

But home had unquestionably lost its charms for Solomon Sleeper. Everything appeared so different. He cared for nothing now that he used to love. All had changed. At length, however, he unpacked his books. They seemed like old familiar friends. He resumed his studies. But alas, not with the same cheerful alacrity and resolute determination as formerly. There was a dreariness in his room which he had never experienced before.

After some few months of fruitless effort, Solomon, at the close of a beautiful autumnal day, while his parents were seated in their snug little parlor, remarked to them in a very indifferent tone, that he had finally concluded to marry.

'Marry!' said the mother, as her glasses, which she had just wiped and was about replacing, fell from her hands upon the floor, which slight accident freed them from a few weeks' service.

'Marry!' said the father, and he overthrew his chair as he rose to pace the floor.

'Marry!' repeated the son, 'and what is there in such an act that should so frighten you?'

It was all to no purpose. Solomon Sleeper had determined to change his condition 'for better or for worse.' And on the next day he was journeying toward the residence of the interesting stage acquaintance of whom we have just spoken. The lady received him very politely, and Solomon thought, with some demonstrations of pleasure. But they might have been equivocal. After an hour's conversation on common topics, Solomon proceeded to make known to his fair friend the object of his visit. She heard him at first very attentively, but soon interrupted him by remarking that she was 'sorry to occasion him any disappointment, but it was necessary that she should inform him that she was yesterday married to a young gentleman to whom she should be very happy to introduce him, if he would tarry awhile and favor them with his company at tea.'

'Tarry!' said Solomon very significantly, as he took a 'French leave' in a very un-Frenchified manner.

'Tarry a while,' he muttered, as he sought the nearest hotel, 'I have tarried too long already;' and from that confession he endeavored to extract the balm of consolation.

Again was Solomon an altered man, on his return home. He now seemed cheerful and happy. No allusions were made to the wife. His parents appeared quite as unconcerned on that subject as he could wish to have them.

Solomon Sleeper, on awakening from his enervating dream, found himself yet without any chosen pursuit or calling. This subject gave him some anxiety. He determined at length to mark out some regular course of duty, and vigorously to follow it. And so, after long meditation, finding himself strongly inclined to the pursuits of literature, he decided on becoming an author! By way of initiating himself into some of the mysteries of authorship, he engaged to furnish the publisher of a very popular magazine with a stated quantity of manuscript matter. But alas, Solomon knew nothing of the voraciousness of printers' imps. He was unfamiliar with the sounds of the eternal cry after 'copy, copy.' He must have 'time,' 'time.' He could not furnish the stipulated supplies without. It was all very delicate work. He could labor only when the god moved within him. Too much was at stake to allow of haste or carelessness. He must have time. But the printer, also, must have 'matter.' Types and steam are impatient of human delay.

Solomon Sleeper was in trouble. He had been in trouble before. But his present difficulties were new, and they were, moreover, quite as annoying as any previous ones. They had a much wider bearing. The public was connected with them, but more intimately, and which was the darker feature to him, the reputation and pecuniary interest of the responsible individuals were also affected.

After occasioning frequent vexations and delays, though great forbearance and kindness were exercised toward him, he received the following laconic epistle from his publisher:

'TO SOLOMON SLEEPER, Esq.—Dear Sir: I have so often reminded you that "procrastination is the thief of time," that I am unwilling any longer to subject myself to this trouble. It is not without much regret that I take this step, but duty to myself and the public requires it. You will therefore consider our engagement hereby disannulled.

Yours, &c. — — —'

Alas, poor Solomon Sleeper! How was he forever wound up in the meshes of his industrious indolence! How were his glorious dreams of scholarship, and of love, and of ambition, turned into wormwood and gall, from the simple fact that Solomon Sleeper, Esq. was so unfortunate as to be a little BEHIND TIME!

THE OFFERING.

BY JULIA.

WHAT offering shall I bring to Thee,
My Father and my God!
Thou who hast blest the varied path
That I so far have trod.
Thou hast been with me in the hour
Of trial, pain and care,—
What grateful offering unto Thee,
Most humbly shall I bear.

I bring not Joy—though few the years
That I have known on earth,
My heart has lost its lightsome mood,
My lip its wonted mirth;
For mournfulness hath dimmed my eye
And shadowed o'er my brow,
And tones that spoke of nought but joy,
Speak but of sadness now.

I bring not Beauty—all too dim
This tearful eye hath grown,
And from my cheek the pleasant light
Of other days is flown;
I bring a prayer for added strength,
Whate'er may be my lot;
I bring an humbled, contrite heart—
Father! reject it not.

THE GOSSIPINGS OF IDLE HOURS.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

HOUR SECOND.

WELL, the idle hour has come again—the idle, dreamy summer hour. Not now am I snugly reposing in the arms of my Tabby-velvet, and gazing out upon that quiet village scene. This parlor rocking-chair, of crimson velvet, (not an unwelcome substitute) commands a far different view—a view of jostling crowds, and brick pavements, and vehicles of every form, and character, and device; of bearded manhood, and budding childhood, and laughing beauty; of tottering eld, and creeping invalidity; of all the indescribable varieties of human being and human action.

What a contrast between city and country life! How different the objects that claim our admiration and awaken our interest. Here Art is queen of the kingdom. She erects her arches, and rears her turrets, and cuts out of the shapeless marble, statuary of surpassing beauty. We look through the dusty pane into the dark and cheerless apartment of the sculptor. Forms of breathless beauty are around him—the creations of his own soul, the visible manifestations of the loveliest ideals of a human spirit. Through the bow-windows of the shopman glitter the costliest jewels, and fabrics of the richest material, and rarest workmanship. Wherever we turn, all is Art.

But there, in the green and breezy country, Nature has established her eternal rule. Her domes are the spreading branches of giant oaks and lofty sycamores; her columns are the moss-painted trunks of century-old trees; her altars are grass-grown banks, jewelled with golden dandelions; and upon every nodding bough and in every tuft of sedge, sit her wild and tuneful minstrels, pouring forth their lays of melting sweetness, or gathering into their little hearts themes for a thousand future songs.

And yet, despite the contrast, one grows, in time, to love the city, even if it be only from a love of his own kind. One grows, even, to love the very streets; not that they are beautiful, save in the living beauty that trips over them; but there are associations—associations without which the most glorious scenes in the universe are dull, and speechless, and tame. It is not the love of the physically beautiful which makes the charm of human existence; it is not outward loveliness and glory which makes one spot of earth dearer to us than another. There is something within, and beyond all this. There is a spirit as well as a form, necessary even to inanimate things—a spirit of memory and of association.

The most magnificent residence in the vicinity of our metropolis, would be less dear, and less lovely to us as strangers, than the dirtiest, and meanest, and gloomiest of its streets, if only kind hearts had beat for us there, if only gentle eyes had smiled, and voices had uttered their words of love, and the feelings of our own souls had been holy and pure, around its most desolate hearthstone.

Those old trees across the street, with their crooked branches and deep green foliage—how well I have grown to love them from the very simplest of associations! I love them because I watch them—because they are ever before my eyes through the day, and the sound of their waving leaves is in my ears through the night. I love them because they are benefactors to the race that bustles around them; because they cast their cooling shade over the dusty and weary plodder; because they cheer the invalid's eye, and speak to finite perishing man, of the Infinite and Imperishable God.

HOUR THIRD.

NIGHT in this great and bustling city! beautiful, glorious night! The country is grand, gloomy, and solemn now, but the city is a scene of most impressive magnificence. Look forth with me from this lofty window, into the long and glittering street. The gas-lights glare on either hand, and floods of radiance stream from the windows of lofty dwellings and gild the black and wavy branches of those giant trees that overshadow the Mall, illustrating in mezzotint as it were, the gorgeous descriptions of the Poets of the Orient.

Night in the city! The billowy mass of human life that has been sounding its ocean-like anthem through the long, midsummer day, is as hushed and quiet now as though its great heart had ceased to beat. The hoarse bay of a watch dog from a neighboring stable, the half-smothered cry of a restless infant, the hollow cough of some sleepless invalid, the heavy tread of the muffled watchman,—these are all the sounds that give token of the presence of life in this great and crowded city. How impressive is this silence! how solemn! It awes me more than the crashing thunder, or the roar of the storm-king upon the ocean. The spirit fancies itself alone in the universe—human life all dead, and no companion save the glittering stars, whose rays of light come to our souls with as sweet an influence, almost, as messages from the absent whom we love. Never do we so truly feel the presence of the Infinite as now. Never are we so conscious of the sway He holds over our spiritual being. Hushed, and reverent, and thrilled with holy love, we bow down before Him, and his blessing fills our souls.

MRS. ABIGAIL HITCHINGS.

AN obituary of Mrs. HITCHINGS has been forwarded to us for preservation, and we are happy thus to let the dead still speak. 'Their path shineth after them'—a glory in the West tells of the brilliant agent of God that has departed, and to give the soul to holy musing is a natural dictate of the feeling heart. It is for the good of the living, that we speak of the dead. It is that we may emulate the virtues that embalm their memory, and from the tomb may come the voice of the Resurrection. Let us heed it, and press on animated by the encouragement—'Be faithful unto death and I will give you a crown of life.'

'Favor is deceitful, and beauty is vain; but a woman that feareth the Lord, she shall be praised.'

'If any woman ever lived in Lynn, who deserved to have "a tomb of orphan's tears wept over her," it was she whose name is at the head of this article. She was truly a "Mother in Israel," and has perhaps done as much practical good as any other woman who ever resided in the town. This is not an unmerited eulogium, poured like a thousand others over the undeserving dead. We say it, because we have known her from the earliest hour of our remembrance, and we never saw more practical good sense, extensive intelligence, and active benevolence united in a woman.

Abigail Robinson was born on St. John's day, 1760; and she was eighty-two years of age at the time of her decease. She married twice. Her first husband was Mr. Isaac Meachum; her second Major Ezra Hitchings, well known as Post Master of Lynn for many years. She had no children of her own, but she had the nurture and bringing up of more than twenty others; nearly half of whom were orphans, whom she took in charity; and the care which she took of their physical, moral and mental culture, has entitled her to the gratitude of numerous families in this and other towns. There are many men living who have been acquainted with her for many years, who will bear witness to the truth of the remark, that a kinder, more intelligent and careful teacher and governess, could not at that period been easily found. Her dignity of person, her sobriety of manner, her purity of moral character, her extensive acquaintance with the world, her intercourse with the best families, her respect for the high, her regard for the poor, her rich understanding, her store of learning, and her uniform propriety of expression, all directed by her plain good sense, rendered her eminently beloved, respected and useful. She retained her faculties to the last; and her society, even at that advanced age, was sought by many of the best informed minds, who appreciated and enjoyed her cheerful, intelligent and soundly sensible conversation. She looked with an eye of admiration on the beauties of nature, and she enjoyed with a heart of love the goodness of the benevolent Creator of all things animate and inanimate. There was a natural vein of piety running through her whole life, and she never neglected that devotion which is of the heart. We regret that the few past hours of her long and useful life were disquieted by the superstitious zeal of a few selfish spirits, who wished to unsettle her confidence of the universal goodness of the Deity, and to send her hopes drifting down the uncertain channels of bigotry. There are some of these rigidly righteous, who talk to us of certain stones being unfit for the workmanship of the temple, because they cannot be wrought into their selfish fabrics; but when the Lord comes he will know what to do with them, and we believe that many of these rejected will be found to be precious gems, fit for the Master's use, and all the more valuable, because their inherent beauty and worth have not been marred and distorted by being wrought into buildings made by men's hands. Among all these agitations her faith remained unshaken, and her reply to their importunities was, that 'Religion was a thing between God and the soul, and that she was willing and ready to settle with Him.' She said that "Christ suffered not for a handful, he died for all." Noble spirit! thou hast gone to thy reward, and transcendently blessed will those who troubled thee be, if they arrive at thy beatitude! May thine eternity in Heaven be as happy as thy days on earth were useful.

In a good old age she has passed away,
And gone down to sleep with her kindred clay,
But her spirit shall rest, in the hope to rise,
With the good and the blest, to her native skies.

ALEPH.'

A HAPPY DEATH SCENE.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

THE following lines were written in the excitement of a death scene at Towanda, more than a year since. They are now first published. The lady to whom they were addressed was a member of the Methodist church—but died in the triumph of that faith which teaches us that God is the Father and Savior of all. She had been much troubled in mind for several days, from a wavering and unsettled faith. The night previous to her decease, she sent for Mrs. Scott and myself to visit her. She told us her doubts—and said that a great many of her Methodist sisters had been there, and had 'worried' her by their talk. She wished us to talk—she could not, could not die so unhappy. We spent the night at her bed-side, conversing with her, and reading from the Bible. 'O don't stop! do talk,' she would exclaim, at every pause—'you don't know how happy it makes me to hear you.' We left her in the morning, calm and hopeful. At night again, we visited her. A group of Methodist and Presbyterian church members surrounded her. She was addressing them in the most affectionate and consoling language. 'Do not weep,' she said, 'do not weep when I am so happy. We shall meet again soon—meet in heaven. God's grace is sufficient for us all. O my friends, I am very happy! I want you should sing with me—sing "I would not live away."' They sang—but with choked and trembling voices; hers rose up clear and strong and triumphant above them all. 'Yes, dear ones,' she said, when the hymn was through—'yes, "the smile of the Lord is the feast of the soul!" It is indeed!' After singing several other hymns, Mrs. S. and I left her for a few minutes, during which time these lines were written; when we returned she was lying so hushed we thought not best to speak to her; she had previously kissed us and bade us farewell—and had taken leave of each member of her family. Perfect peace had possession of her soul; she needed no consolation. Young, beautiful, and beloved, she passed away from the earth without a sigh—passed, indeed, with songs of triumph and hallelujahs upon her lips.

LINES TO MRS. CLEMANA ELWELL,

On the evening of her Death.

STRENGTH! dear sister—God is nigh thee—
His kind arm is round thee thrown;
Sister-angels, too, are by thee—
Feel that thou art not alone.

No, thy Savior will not leave thee—
He has passed the same dark way,
And his loving arm will save thee—
Lean on him—thine only stay.

Soon with happy spirits blending,
Thou shalt see and know his charms—
Guardian spirits round thee bending,
Wait to bear thee to his arms.

There through long, long years of gladness,
Thou shalt live in love and peace—
Not one hour shall tell of sadness—
Songs of joy shall never cease.

One by one thy friends shall meet thee,
Coming from this world of sin,
And with smiles of joy will greet thee—
Thou'lt be there to lead them in.

Farewell, sister—God is nigh thee—
Fare-thee-well!—we'll meet above;
Jesus, ever watching by thee,
Will receive thee to his love.

Do RIGHT. In all thy dealings, reader, do right!—many a serious evil has occurred, from even a very trivial omission of doing right. Be cautious of trespassing on others' rights, and thou wilt secure thine.

INVOCATION.

BY IONE.

LIGHT for my darkened soul,
Father Almighty! 'tis the boon I crave,
These wildering dreams that mock my vain control,
Lead me a blind but unresisting slave!

Strength for the weary wing,
Seeking a pathway that no eye can trace,
To bear the spirit to the living Spring,
O'er the blue fields of clear, unbounded space.

Hope for the lonely heart,
Whose earthly shrines have crumbled into dust!
Bid angel ministers that peace impart
Which fills the doubting with sustaining trust.

A mighty realm within
Each human breast, thou, O our God, hast made;
There can we turn amid a world of sin,
And hear thy thrilling voice, 'Be not afraid.'

Grant that no shadows sweep
O'er the horizon of this world unseen;
May angel-guards its holy portals keep,
While faith triumphant, lends it ray serene!

ELOQUENCE.

PETER the Hermit was a man who spake from the depths of an earnest spirit, and though he knew nothing of the graces of the schools, his eloquence entranced the attention of thousands and swayed the energies of great multitudes as he pleased. True eloquence, therefore, does not originate in, neither does it belong exclusively to the intellect. It springs from the heart—from the seat of emotion—from the fountain of deep feeling. When a man speaks what he feels, he cannot but be eloquent; words, deep, thrilling, moving, burning words, will come forth, to answer the requirements of this emotion which a man cannot suppress. This is inspiration. Truth, felt and endeared to the moral affections, is always inspiring; Christ was inspired as none others ever were, because he felt truth deeper, and it was more fully endeared to his moral affections, than it was felt by, or endeared to others; therefore he spake as never man spake—with an authority before which the teachings of the Scribes were but school boy repetitions of lessons learned. If, then, a man would be truly eloquent—and who does not wish to become so?—let him strive to obtain clear conceptions of truth—truth of the most lofty kind; and this he will find in those subjects which treat of God and man's nature and destiny. Let a man not studiously learn to feel these truths, but let him perceive them—let him realize that they are—and the very contemplation of them will rouse the dormant energies of the soul to the most intense and powerful action.

EDITOR'S BOOK TABLE.

Our own Work. Notice of it.

Of our own work we must speak again to thank the many editors who have generously noticed the improvements and highly commended its literary and religious character. We hope to continue to merit these approvals.

Some of our subscribers have entertained the idea that a plate each month was promised. Where they received such an impression we cannot tell—the Prospectus was plain enough, and that stated plates would be given—as they will be—once a quarter.

Br. Grosh—who has always been our steadfast friend and encourager—faults the work because the plate given has appeared in the 'Rose of Sharon.' We would state that the circulation of that work is very small compared with our own, and few of our patrons have seen the plates. The cost of having like engravings got up expressly and exclusively for this work, would very far exceed the most lavish outlay which could be justified by the present subscription. The Publisher does nobly, as matters now are, and every person that could be made acquainted with the financial concerns of this publication, would coincide with us. Every editor that has noticed the work, save Br. G., has seemed to realize this fact; and we do not in the least suppose that he would advise any more outlays should he look on the subscription books. For his many expressions of generous interest in the Repository, we tender him unfeigned thanks.

'The Rose of Sharon, for 1843. Edited by Miss S. C. Edgarton.'

The Rose for 1843, is passing into the Binder's hands. We have had the opportunity of examining a good portion of the pages, and are well satisfied of the excellence of the literary department. The plates are original, and will be finished in good style, while the whole of the mechanical execution of the work will prove to be of a high order. The paper and print are exquisite; and a new embossed cover has been obtained, more costly than that heretofore given, adding much to the elegance of the exterior. Several new contributors will be introduced to the reader, and from the most, if not all, of those whose articles have given value to the work, papers may be expected. Miss Edgarton still continues as Editor, and she will attend to her duties, no doubt, most faithfully. The cost of the work will be the same as heretofore, although the expenses of publication will be very greatly increased. It will be issued next month by the time of the meeting of the General Convention, that persons from a distance may send for it, who otherwise might not be able to obtain it.

We hope that Editors friendly to the work, will be kind enough to give some notice of the above in their respective publications.

The Life and Times of Martin Luther. By the author of 'Three Experiments of Living,' &c. Pp. 324.

We have just finished the reading of this most interesting work, in which, according to our conceptions of what Luther was, his character is graphically portrayed. It is not a dry detail of the events that developed the energies of the Reformer, but affords fine sketches of his times, historical pictures being linked in with the portrait of Luther in the various positions he sustained. It will carry the interested mind back to the age of darkness, and show the cost at which those privileges were bought, which are now free as air. The work is handsomely executed.

Views of the Architecture of the Heavens. In a Series of Letters to a Lady. By I. P. Nichol. N. York: H. A. Chapin & Co.

Here is a work that does the soul good to read, so abundant is the mingling of fresh religious feeling with the loftiest intellectuality. In this respect it is unlike any scientific work on Astronomy we have ever met with; and because of this peculiarity we wish to commend it to our readers. It is not a general treatise on Astronomy, but is designed to set forth 'what recent times have evolved concerning the vastness of the universe,' and certainly the author has proved himself worthy of the professorship of practical Astronomy which he holds in the university of Glasgow. The work is enriched with many plates—of which the author says: 'In most cases they will amply compensate for the want of powerful telescopes.' The American publishers have added some valuable and interesting notes, and a glossary, which will greatly assist many readers in appreciating the work. It is published at $1.25, and though but 158 pages, duodecimo, it is worth more than many huge volumes.

The Two Admirals. A Tale. By the author of 'The Pilot,' 'Red Rover,' &c. In two vols.

Mr. Mussey has kindly sent us this last work of our greatest American novelist. As the title indicates, it is another of his fine sea-tales—a class of fiction in which he seems made for pre-eminence.

The evolutions of fleets, as well as all the other mysteries of nautical science, are far beyond our ken; but we love the sea—and, doubtless, had we lived in the days of the Skoldmeyer, the stormy Baltic would not have been ignorant of our naval prowess. As it is, we are fain to content ourselves with sitting in a quiet cabin on terra firma, and enjoying, in imagination, the stirring deeds of the naval heroes of Mr. Cooper.

The Two Admirals are masterly delineations;—they are living, breathing, acting men. It is against the rules of sentiment, we believe, to love more than one object at a time; but 'twas vain to resist—we were heartily in love with both Admirals at once;—and after all, it may have been no infringement of the aforesaid law, since these two were in all things inseparable. We should judge Sir Gervaise to have been the favorite of the author—to restore the balance, therefore, we may be allowed to incline a hair's breadth toward 'Dick Bluewater'—God bless him!

Without alluding to characters in detail, we pronounce them every one worthy of their author—and this is praise sufficient. He who drew the character of 'Leather Stocking' could not be guilty of an unskillful delineation.

We will close this brief notice with the following quotation—which is not the first place in which similar sentiments have been expressed by our author.

'I am resolute,' says Admiral Bluewater, 'to see that this world, for once, afford some compensation for its own miseries.'

'Never doubt that, Richard Bluewater,' replies Sir Gervaise Oakes, 'never doubt that. So certain is vice, or crime, to bring its own punishment in this life, that one may well question if any other hell is needed. And, depend upon it, your meek, modest ingenuousness will not go unrewarded.' S. C. E.

The Trumpet and Universalist Magazine. Boston, Mass.

This most popular of our weeklies, has entered upon a new and improved volume. The size of the paper is considerably enlarged; the type is new and handsome, and the mechanical execution is highly creditable to the taste and skill of the printer. We like the appearance of the first numbers very much, and trust that the talented editor will give to it a dignified character that shall command the respect of the liberal of all sects. He has our best wishes for the most desirable success.

Universalist Watchman and Christian Repository. Montpelier, Vt.

Here is before us the first number of a sterling paper of few pretensions. The Watchman has always borne evidence of the industry of its present proprietor and editor—Rev. Eli Ballou. It has always had a good list of contributors, and we should judge that it must be highly valued by the friends of true evangelism in the Green Mountain State. The new volume is an improvement on the last—a smaller type is used. It announces Revs. R. Streeter, K. Haven, L. H. Tabor, and J. Baker, as Corresponding Editors. We hope this will amount to something, and that they will be faithful to their office. We hope that the excellent suggestions of R. S. (second article under editorial head in the first No.) will do good, and acting upon them, may the conductors of the Watchman be the agents of much good to their readers.

Balm of Gilead and Practical Universalist. Concord, Manchester, and Nashua, N. H.

This is another enlargement. A fine sheet in quarto form is now presented to us, printed in good style, and making a very good appearance. It is to be issued weekly, and is to be edited—so it is announced—by Revs. J. F. Witherell, L. C. Browne, G. W. Gage, M. Ballou, and C. Woodhouse—quite an array, surely. We hope that the success of the work will be such as to encourage the conductors to make good exertions to give a truly useful and honorable character to their publication. It has an eloquent name, and we trust it will be eminently worthy of it. Let it be generously sustained.

The Olive Branch. Boston, Mass.

The Olive Branch is a good family paper, albeit friend Norris is a Reformer and a Methodist, and has no great love for Universalism. His paper is always interesting, and is every where well spoken of so far as its literary character is concerned. His co-worker, in his notices of the Repository, has a stereotyped phrase that all our contributors keep their eye on Universalism while they write—intending to carefully set forth that ours is a decided sectarian work. Our name settles one part of that matter, but yet the fact is that 'the most of the pieces' might be published in any liberal religious periodical without being recognized as embodying anything but the essentials of liberal christianity.

Light of Zion and Sabbath School Contributor. Boston, Mass.

Want of space alone prevented us from making honorable mention of this useful work, in our last, and from expressing our satisfaction that it has passed into the hands of Rev. John G. Adams, as editor. He will make it a very useful publication, and adapt it to the interests of the Sabbath School enterprise. It should be made—we think—a distinct Teacher's and Children's paper. Heretofore it has attempted too much in a certain way, and too little in another. It has not copied the excellences in papers of a similar character, and the influence of each article on the young mind has not been thought of. The future will no doubt be an improvement on the past, and we hope the work will not only be highly useful, but well sustained.

Uncle Sam's Recommendation of Phrenology to his millions of Friends in the United States. In a Series of not very dull Letters. New York: Harper and Brothers. 1842.

Here is a book of pleasant things about Phrenology. We love to meet with pleasant faith in any thing, for good humored argument, if it does not convince, will not wake up bad and injurious feelings. It is a unique book, and we commend it to all who love to smile and who desire to know the teachings and tendencies of Phrenology. We are indebted to Mr. B. B. Mussey for our copy. He is the Boston agent of the Harpers.

A Theological Discussion, between Rev. Mr. Henson (Methodist) and Rev. Mr. Ingalls (Universalist).

Held in Southhold, L. I., Jan. 25-8, 1842. New York: P. Price.

This discussion appeared in the columns of the Christian Messenger, and now makes a neat pamphlet of 111 pages. We commend it to those who like this kind of reading. They will find some shrewd answers in it. Br. Ingalls performed his part with great credit. Patience must have had her perfect work.

The Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus, Considered and Explained. By Rev. W. E. Manley.

We have not read this pamphlet, but presume it is a well written exposition of the ever-to-be-debated Parable. It was printed at the office of the Magazine and Advocate. Pages 24.

The Democratic Review. New-York: J. & H. G. Langley, 57 Chatham St. Monthly, with a portrait. Pp. 110. $5 per year.

As a political work, we have no comments to make on this publication, but as a literary journal it ranks high among the periodical literature of the country. Among its contributors are some of the best writers in America, and many able papers, of general interest and great importance, it has sent forth to the public. It is beautifully printed; and a bright constellation of talent will glitter before the reader, now that it is, as we understand, to be united with the Boston Quarterly. The July No. is a rich one, giving a very fine portrait of Theodore Sedgwick. The work can be ordered through A. Tompkins.

Letter to the friends of Rev. F. T. Gray and the Bulfinch Street Society. Boston: James Munroe & Co. Pp. 64.

Some person unknown has sent us the above pamphlet through the Post Office, and we suppose we ought to thank him. However, it has only strengthened our sober conviction that the society matters in Bulfinch Street, can never be straightened without the frank avowal of duplicity on the part of Rev. F. T. Gray's friends. Capital is made out of small matters in this pamphlet, and some of the statements are as lucid as the Egyptian hieroglyphics on a mouldering pillar. The final argument is not yet made, and we wait till it is, before we fully decide on all the controverted matters.

Lectures to Ladies on Anatomy and Physiology. By Mrs. Mary S. Gove. Boston: Saxton & Pierce. Pp. 300.

This is a useful work. The author has made no attempt at flourishing, but has written in a simple style the most important truths connected with physical happiness, and by consequence, of intellectual developement.

We learn from the preface that by continued ill health, the attention of the author was directed to medical works, and she became deeply interested in them, and by diligence acquired knowledge which she felt moved to offer to her sex. She has lectured to ladies with considerable success in many places, and this book is the sum of them. We commend the work to the attention of our readers. It can be had of A. Tompkins. Price $1.

The Twin Sisters; a Tale for Youth. By Mrs. Sandham. From the twentieth London edition. New York: B. Appleton & Co. Pp. 176.

For this—another of the series of 'Tales for the People and their Children'—we are indebted to Mr. Mussey, the Boston agent. Two of our young friends have diligently perused it, and they pronounce it 'Beautiful!' and their decision we regard as of worth and importance. The work is very beautifully printed, and deserves the attention of all seekers after good juvenile works.

THE UNIVERSALIST AND LADIES' REPOSITORY.

SEPTEMBER 1842.

THE SEA.

BY REV. HENRY BACON.

AMELIA. 'To me the sea is dreadful.'

ELLINOR. 'To me 'tis glorious to behold. I revel in its beauties, and great thoughts swell my brain.'

AMELIA. 'Rejoice then—I must weep.'

ELLINOR. 'Weep then as the hopeful weep.'

PASSAGES of scripture singled out as texts, or as suggestive themes, are in one sense like beautiful landscapes which awaken feelings and emotions corresponding to the state of mind with which we view them. Thus a scene which to-day heightened every glad feeling, increasing the vivacity of heart, and kindling elevating thoughts in the soul, may to-morrow have the contrary effect, seeming to sympathize with us in our grief and sigh over our disappointments or affliction; thus realizing to us the justness of the poet's words:—

'To him who in the love of nature holds
Communion with her visible forms, she speaks
A various language; for his gayer hours
She has a voice of gladness, and a smile
And eloquence of beauty, and she glides
Into his darker musings, with a mild
And gentle sympathy, that steals away
Their sharpness, ere he is aware.'

Thus it is with a passage of scripture. We may read it when health runs in merry streams through our veins, and we have nothing to do but be happy, and it will awaken kindred thoughts, breathing upon the soul a power to enjoy more, by giving it a better wisdom to improve the means of happiness. We may take up the same portion of holy writ when sickness has weakened us, and we are pent in the darkened chamber, and it will suggest altogether different, but equally appropriate thoughts and feelings. And hence it is that the Bible is ever the best book—the book to be read in the time of rejoicing, that we may learn the necessary restraint, and to whom we should be grateful for what we enjoy; and to be no less earnestly perused in sickness and adversity, that we may remember that the 'Father of mercies' is the 'God of all comfort,' and that he will strengthen the soul to bear whatever he, in his providence, calls that soul to meet.

Are not these remarks applicable to the views different minds will take of the following passage? 'Thy way is in the sea, and thy path in the great waters, and thy footsteps are not known.' Let us see how different minds will look upon this.

There is a continual coming and going of those who do business on the great waters, and as we listen to their stories of the sea, we learn the vicissitudes of the life of the mariner. One comes to us full of the romance of the ocean, expressing his feelings in the very language of poetry, and in rapture from the remembrances of what he has seen. He has felt that God's way is in the sea, and he has gloried in the manifestations there of Him whose footsteps are not known—whose course of dominion is untraceable. And the memories of the sublimity of the works he has beheld, the infinite variety of changes on the deep in the form, colors, and brilliancy of the waters, and the wonderful creatures that live therein, give him the lip of true eloquence, and we love to sit and hear his tales and marvels. He looks, as the poet and the lover of romance look, upon the sea.

But turn from him and mark how different are the impressions of another. He talks of what a tremendous agent of power the deep is, and how it is the beating heart of the material world, sending the element of life through every vein of nature. He will tell how lofty were his thoughts of the goodness and wisdom of God, as he considered the vastness of ocean's expanse and its relations to the earth. How the exhalations therefrom formed the clouds that give beauty and sublimity to the heavens, and sustain by their bounty all existence through the means appointed of God. He will enter into an analysis of the size, form, depths, currents, tides, taste, and all that enters into the physics of the sea, and from all these he will draw illustrations of the way of God's wisdom being in the great waters. And as he owns the mysteries yet unsolvable, which will afford study to the scientific for centuries on centuries, he confesses that the Deity's footsteps are not known.

Turn from him and consider how different are the impressions of another. He loves the idea of activity, of business, of the commerce of nations. He looks upon the sea as a grand highway by which nation interchanges with nation—by which man becomes acquainted with the vast variety in the human race, learns their peculiarities and the differences of climate and production, and has his ideas of the extent of the world enlarged and enobled. By commerce beauty is found everywhere; what one clime refuses, another yields; and wherever man is hailed, he is discovered to possess one common feeling—the love of country. God's way is thus in the sea, and the lover of the fruits of commerce adores the wisdom of the Creator in the wonderful endowments conferred on man by which he fashions the craft and navigates it to parts known and unknown, spreading the blessings of civilization and drawing out varied talent that otherwise would have slumbered in inactivity. But he confesses that the footsteps of the Deity are not known—he knows not to what all this tends, how the associated evils are to be overcome or corrected.

Turn from him and hear how different are the impressions of another. He loved the sea from a child. He sported with it as a babe doth with a giant. The tones of its voice were ever rich to hear in the distance, like the rumbling noises of a city heard in the quiet country; and not only thus, but when he looks upon the ocean-organ and thinks, as he hears its deepest bass, of the pealing hallelujahs of the redeemed hosts which to the Revelator were like the sound of many waters! And no less doth he love the sight of the sea, reposing in calm, or riding like ten thousand thousand horses and chariots of strength in majesty and irresistible might. He has sported with its foam as with pearls sparkling beyond the jeweller's art, and ran with a shout of rapture up, up the rude rocks where the huge billow came with the thundering crash! and then as rapturously followed it when it speedily retreated in glory, forming a thousand cascades and waterfalls as it rushes back to its home, like glad white spirits from the presence of the dark and repulsive crags where evil might dwell. Thus he learned to joy in the sea—to give ear to every tale of its wonders and beauty from afar or near, and his young heart was early won to delight in the thought of a sea-life.

And now that manhood's soberer years have come, he is no less enthusiastic in his love and in his praises of the sea. He has known of the stern and awful trial when human skill and the mighty storm wrestle for victory, and he has wrought with firmest strength when he thought the next moment would be his last—when as he saw the tremendous wave rising in the distance and sweeping on like a huge mountain removed from its foundations, he felt that it would make and cover his grave; and does he not remember those times? Yes, indeed he does, for he can never forget them, nor cease to marvel how God had a way in the great waters to preserve him. He saw not the footsteps of the Almighty as he walked upon the mountain billows, but he confessed him near; and though it may be he has profaned many times that Deity's name, yet in his heart there are blessings unutterable to him who keepeth alive the exposed and struggling mariner! All this he remembers as he praises the sea—as he exults in the field there spread for noble exploits, for courageous exposure and daring, for the display of skill and the developement of what is in man.

He knows too, what he labors for, and as commerce is essentially connected with civilization, he feels that his mission is an important one, and that few know the obligations of society to the sailor. These are thoughts that make him willing to exult in the sea, though storms must come. He knows that man does not generate them—that man never ordained them, but a higher and an infinitely wiser Being; and that that Being constituted relations between them and the health of the globe, and knew how man exposed to their might, must suffer—how frequently he must be overwhelmed. And as this thought springs up in his mind and causes him to see the tossing and broken ship, whose crew have sunk in the waters, he reverentially looks up to heaven and feels, if he does not utter it, that God giveth his angels guard over the spirit of the poor drowned mariner, as over the soul of him who dieth on the princely couch of down, in the splendid palace, with many in attendance. And this thought reconciles him to the death on the sea, if so it be ordered—with the blue waters for his winding sheet, and the wind to sing his dirge. And he thinks and feels also, that the natural associations of such a death will waken kinder feelings, and keep him longer in the memory of others, than if he died elsewhere. It may not be so, but thus he will think—he will think that as oft as he is remembered, they who remember him will recall the associations of his death—afar from home, on the stormy sea, whose depths are his grave; and that thus they will be impelled to speak of him tenderly and generously, more ready to recite something good than ill of him, and perhaps to say—'Peace to the poor fellow's spirit!' Yes, his heart will feel, God's way is in the sea to save and redeem the soul as on the dry land, and that equally in the one and the other his footsteps are not known! And precious to him will be the song of the Psalmist,—'Whither shall I go from thy Spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in the depths, thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right shall hold me!' God is everywhere, and wherever he is, may we not reverently recall John's words 'God is Love!' And under whatever circumstances we are placed, may we not remember and act upon the direction of Jesus!—'After this manner'—this sentiment and feeling—'pray ye, Our Father who art in heaven!' A true father never—come what will—never deserts the child he has called into being. Therefore does the son of the sea still exult as he views the wide waters; and if you speak to him of storm and trial, he will ask, Where, this side of heaven, are not storms and trials known? In vain, he will tell you, in vain is it to attempt to make heaven on earth—it cannot be. Hope must not rest here; it must take hold of something within the veil—beyond the visible, as the anchor goes down beyond the veil of waters.

He that hath not the christian's hope—the gospel hope—the unspeakably joyous hope, full of glory, is not prepared for life, much less for death, on land or sea. He does not realize that God has a sovereign way throughout the universe, and that often the command is repeated to man—'Stand still, and know that I am God!' This ignorance of God prevents right preparation of soul, christian discipline of heart, and when the storm of adversity comes, man discovers that he has been a dreamer, that he has rested hope and expectation on unstable things—that he has built on the sand, and one wave of change has swept the whole away, beautiful though the fabric may have been. Where shall we go to, to escape from the influence of earth's vicissitudes? Where is the asylum of peace? 'The depth saith, It is not in me; and the sea saith, It is not with me. Neither is it found in the land of the living. God understandeth the way thereof and he knoweth the place thereof.' And he has revealed of his understanding and knowledge sufficient for our good; and to christianity we are to give our hearts if we would rightly number our days, or estimate our life, and apply our powers to the possession and practice of the highest wisdom. Then come storm, come calm, come all the varieties of life—we shall be ready, and strong in the strength of a glorious hope, we shall do our duty and leave events with God!

But we must turn from the ever active and hopeful son of the sea, and hear of other impressions—other thoughts and feelings awakened by the sea. It is recorded of one who has done much to sanctify the affections by song, that 'the sight and sound of the sea were always connected in her mind with melancholy associations, with images of storm and desolation, of shipwreck and sea-burial.' And these associations are by her biographer called 'undefinable,' because 'she had not suffered any calamity at all connected with the sea.' The writer did not think of her strong and intense human sympathies in connection with her powerful and melancholy imagination. She had heard of others' calamities, of hearts rung and homes desolated, and with the suffering she sympathized; and it was these sympathies that brought the images of shipwreck and sea-burial to darken the beautiful and sublime pictures of the sea. She took part with woman's sorrows—with the waiting bride sitting on the lone rock, singing in her grief—

'Come back, my ocean rover! come!

There's but one place for me,

Till I can greet thy swift sail home,—

This lone rock by the sea!'

With that young heart swelling with its grief, she had sympathy that made the same pictures of the sea present themselves to her imagination, as came in terror to her who must wait in vain for the coming of the loved and lost. The deep mystery of God's way in the sea, is thus felt—felt by the wife whose little ones have asked after a father that cannot come to them, and by the parent whose son can no more visit her hearth. Speak to them of the power of the sea, and they feel that it is too mighty, for it drew down the noble ship, and all the might of the brave was but the wrestling of an infant with a monster. Tell them of the beauty of the ocean, and they think only of those who never more can enjoy that loveliness, and who admired it better than they could ever find a heart to. Converse with them of the sublimity and grandeur of the towering waves and the music of the wind in the storm as it plays with the chorded harp of the shrouds, and they think only of that tremendous billow that overswept all dear to them, and the gale that shattered, crashed, and tore to atoms the craft which bore the well known name. Talk to them of the succeeding calm, of the sweet repose of the waters, and how beautifully they reflect the ever-shifting and glorious hues and clouds of heaven, and they will have their mind only on what is beneath that calmness, and that cannot enjoy it. What to them is the beauty of the place of death—of the very instrument of death! The silvery wave might seem to them a lovely thing, if it did not bear the image of a ghastly look—the last of the dying; and the sportive breeze as it comes laden with sweets from many isles 'in lone, wild, beauty drest,' might be welcome, did it not remind them of what it might have saved for them had it come earlier in answer to the prayer of the despairing. And thus with all that the lover of romance, the philosopher, the friend of commerce, or the almost worshipper of ocean glory, might say. The melancholy of their souls would color all that could be remarked, and turning away from all, they would address the sea itself,—

'Yet, O blue deep!

Thou that no trace of human hearts dost keep,

Never to thee did love with silvery chain

Draw my soul's dream, which through all nature sought

What waves deny,—some bower of steadfast bliss,

A home to twine with fancy, feeling, thought,

As with sweet flowers; but christian hope for this

Now turns from earth's green valleys as from thee,

To that sole changeless world, where there is no more sea!'

And thus should the perishing of earthly hopes lead the soul to the imperishable; and the beauty, sublimity and grandeur from which the heart in melancholy turned, will become once more welcome to the mind, as they become symbols of God and eternity! And thou, O ocean, with thy voice of power, wilt speak of Him who limits evil as he bounds thy course; who can give to the spirit of man a life of beauty and glory after the struggle with earthly elements is over, as he breathes peace upon thy troubled waters; and whose mercy is like the ever wasting and the eternal fullness of thy depths, always giving forth for the life of the world, and yet weakened not.

In God's holy word, the might and majesty of the sea are used to symbolize His power and sovereignty; to awaken lofty and honorable thoughts of his control; and to breathe into us a trust in a wisdom that rules for generations and ages, and not for mere times and seasons. And it should be so to us. We cannot trace out the ways of God entirely. We know when he has passed before us, but his footsteps we cannot see. He made and maketh darkness his secret place; his pavilion round about him was and is dark waters and thick clouds of the skies. Clouds and darkness are round about him; righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne! And in that should be our hope and trust reposed—that however much God draweth the veiling clouds of mystery around his habitation, still the foundations of his throne, the glories of his sovereignty, are righteousness and equity; so that if we cry with the prophet, 'Verily thou art a God that hidest thyself!' we may also with the prophet cry, 'O God of Israel, the Savior!'

Look abroad as we may, and note as we can the evidences of the Being and Activity, and Goodness, of God, and still if we honor him aright, we shall confess in humbleness of soul—'Lo, these are parts of his ways, but how little a portion is heard of him! but the thunder of his power who can understand!' Ay, who could bear with the frail union of mind and body that now exists—who could bear a full revelation of the thunder of his power—the Lord God Omnipotent! Who lives that would not be made deaf by it? Not one; for even now some separate illustrations of God's power almost make the brain reel and madden, and these at most are but the whisperings of his might. Yet he has revealed enough to cause us to say with the Psalmist—'God hath spoken once; twice have I heard this that power belongeth unto God.' And it should be in our hearts to continue the singer's words,—'Also, unto thee, O Lord, belongeth mercy; for thou renderest to every man according to his work.' Mercy, as well as power, pervades the acts of the divine Sovereignty, and give character to all his retributions. His mercy is equal to his power! O let the earth declare and the heavens repeat the truth—that Power and Mercy belong unto God—are twin attributes! O believe, man, believe, that where power acts, mercy shines—shines it may be as the sun behind mists and clouds, shines as the glorious stars above storm and cloud shine—but nevertheless shines in divine beauty! Believe that thou shalt see it in due time; for by it he shall awaken the adoration of thy soul, and make thee realize the solemn and happy truths—'He retaineth not his anger forever, because he delighteth in mercy. He will have compassion upon us; he will subdue our iniquities; and will cast our sins into the depths of the sea.'

And when they have been thus cast, we shall be willing to let them lie there. We shall not mourn over them as over much that the literal sea has received. Yet why look to the sea for the departed? Their home is not beneath the blue waters; over the spirit doth not roll the cold and melancholy waves; neither over its abiding place does the good ship ride gallantly, or the merry song of the sailor ring. We may people, as romance and poetry teach us, the coral groves and the gem-lit caves of the deep; we may imagine as we please the symphonies that there might delight us; but the spirits of our dead are not there. The coral branch bends not over them; neither for them do the gems glitter, or the infinite beauties of the deep chambers of the sea reveal themselves. They are with God, and if ever they visited the depths of the ocean with the body, God's way is in the sea to lead the soul upward, as from Mount Olivet he took the ascending Jesus. O brother, whom on earth we greet no more, let the sea keep thy body! we joy that the spirit hath soared to the world where 'there is no more sea,' and where death is swallowed up in victory!

'Roll on, thou deep and dark blue ocean—roll!
Ten thousand fleets sweep over thee in vain;
Man marks the earth with ruin—his control
Stops with the shore;—upon the watery plain
The wrecks are all thy deeds, nor doth remain
A shadow of man's ravage, save his own,
When, for a moment, like a drop of rain,
He sinks into thy depths with bubbling groan.

Thy shores are empires, changed in all save thee—
Assyria, Greece, Rome, Carthage, where are they?
Thy waters wasted them while they were free,
And many a tyrant since; their shores obey
The stranger, slave, or savage; their decay
Has dried up realms to deserts; not so thou,
Unchangeable save to thy wild waves' play—
Time writes no wrinkle on thine azure brow—
Such as creation's dawn beheld, thou rollest now!
Providence, R. I.

PASSING AWAY. Is not change and mutation written as with an iron pen on all earthly things? Do we not witness this on our own bodies? See we not the constant process of matter assuming numberless forms of animal and vegetable life, yet all in a little while to pass away, and be succeeded by similar and dissimilar forms, each hastening on to the goal of decay? Even the waters of the ocean-seas are passing away!

THE STREAMS.

WRITTEN NEAR A WOOD.

WITHIN a solemn woodland's shades
A stream goes chiming on;
And in my solemn soul grave thoughts,
As waters, pass along.
I list the chime of stream and thoughts,
And tears are in my eyes;
I hear a dirge of one pure heart
Who in the dark grave lies.

Bright flowers spring up, as on the stream
Flows with its fruitful spell;
And in my soul sweet hopes spring up,
Whose speech I may not tell.
I cannot tell how much the flowers
Speak of God's love to me;
Words must be weak to tell the joy
Of hope of meeting thee.

Between these mossy banks a stream
Has always flowed on free,
Since here we wept that thou so soon
From our embrace must flee;
And in my heart a stream has flowed
Changing but yet the same;
One burden has these streams e'er sung—
They breathe thy precious name. LEANDER.

DUTY AND HAPPINESS.

BY MRS. N. THORNING MUNROE.

CHAPTER I.

'My dear Ella, as a friend let me say you are too imaginative—too dreamy; you do not consider enough the true nature of mankind; you forget all that is common-place and much that is real, because it may be homely, making a world of your own—enshrining yourself in your own thoughts, so that the world does not comprehend you, nor you the world; and the result will be, if not already produced, you will mutually deride and speak ill of each other.'

'Well I cannot help it, Lucy, I care not for the world's opinion; what to me is the multitude—they are pleased one minute, and displeased the next.'

'Now my friend, I think you are mistaken. You do care for the world's opinion, although you may not be clearly conscious of it; you have feelings which urge you to try to win the favor of even the multitude. Why, if I cared nothing for the world, I think I should wish very soon to leave it. I know there are some who say they care nothing for the world, nor its customs, nor its opinions, nor its rumors, nor aught that belongs to it, and yet are its veriest slaves. Even as the fair Quakeress will lecture against the vanity and pride of the world and its fashions, and yet will look as demure from beneath her small, and as she doubtless thinks very becoming cottage, and step as gracefully in her well fitted garb, as the most devoted votary of fashion; and I question if there lurks not as much pride in the one, as the other. O we are very apt by being "wise in our own conceits," to deceive ourselves.'

'You are inclined to be severe in your remarks.'

'But am I not just? I trust you will not be offended at my freedom. I know very surely, that a mind like yours, if not regulated and biased aright, will be the cause of much unhappiness. You are not alone, there are many with just such views as yourself, and you will not be offended if at some future time I open my mind more fully to you upon this theme. You know I am very common-place—an every day sort of a person, although my dearest friend, even yourself, may be one of the most imaginative beings in existence. But for the present, adieu. I wish you all manner of prosperity, with a little more taste for every-day life.'

And so saying, Lucy Clifford left her friend, and pursued her walk. Ella stood at the window and watched her retreating figure. "A little more taste for every day life," and a smile, almost a sneering one, curled her full, red lip. 'Yes, true enough, I have not much taste for it now. Why I really believe I should go into a fever in a week, from mere mortification, if I were obliged to go through the daily routine of domestic duty with which so many women are occupied from morning till night. Now just to think of it,—just imagine that I was sitting busy with my writing, perhaps in the poetic vein, soaring on the wings of imagination beyond this dull world,—then to have my thoughts broken in upon, and brought suddenly down to earth, by my husband's coming in and inquiring if the butcher had left the loin of veal, or the market boy had brought the potatoes and cabbages, or some such real, sensible question! O Lucy Clifford, I love you very dearly, you are my very best friend, but I pray thee not to sound again the praises of matrimony, and its duties in my ears; it is very romantic to be in love, but it is too much of reality, too much like other people, to be married.'

Ella Morton spoke the real sentiments of her heart, so she thought when she soliloquized thus. She had a great love for the romantic, and all works of the imagination; this love she had indulged to its full extent; not that her education had been confined to these. No, she had been educated for those days thoroughly, and had been as familiar, in her school-days, with the problems of Euclid, as the lives of Moore and Byron. Her intellectual powers were vast, and with a tighter rein upon the imagination and a little curbing of the wild leapings of her girlish heart, her mind would have grown stronger and more fitted for the world in which she was to bear her part, repugnant as many of its ways might be to her. She was the youngest, and the pet of her father's family; from her childhood every whim had been gratified. Her mother had been in feeble health ever since her birth, and all the discipline she had received was from her elder sisters. Her father's care for her education was only shown, by having her sent to the best schools, and enjoining upon her diligence towards all the branches taught therein. She had, however, an ardent love of study, and ample means were afforded her to gratify it. She did not wish, she said, to be a thing to be looked at, therefore she pursued other studies than those which are sometimes considered to accomplish a lady; and when she returned from school, she could keep her father's books, make out his bills, and as he remarked, she would be very useful in his counting house. She was not one of your love-sick, affected maidens, fit only for the heroine of a novel; no, she could argue upon religion, and politics even, and with the latter she was pretty well versed; but her most serious fault was this, a great distaste for domestic life and its duties! She looked with aversion, almost with disgust, upon the duties which are considered to belong exclusively to woman. She was one that would please in conversation, and prove a delightful companion for those who had time and taste for intellectual pursuits, versed as she was in many departments of literature. The gentlemen considered her as the model of a lady, and the ladies looked up to her as one above their common minds, and paid her due deference. It may be her vanity was flattered by this, for there was a little of that quality lurking in her heart, as well as in the hearts of humbler ones of her sex.

But I must not pause to speak of her disposition farther, hoping in the progress of my simple narrative, to persuade or convince the reader, that domestic duties are not incompatible with aught that may tend to the cultivation of the intellect, or the developments of genius.

Lucy Linden had been married some three or four years previous to the commencement of my story, to Henry Clifford, the cousin of Ella Morton, and it was in this manner that the two became acquainted. She had said of herself, that she was an every-day sort of a person; I would that there were more of such persons in the world. She ever looked upon the bright side of things, her heart was full of affection and sympathy towards all. The world was to her a place for action, for the cultivation of all that is good in the heart, and all that is noble in the soul. Seldom was her brow clouded—ever gentle and kind was she. As light was her step within her home as when she trod in festive halls; as joyous and sunny was her smile when none saw her save her husband and her two cherub children, as when the many were around and beaming eyes met hers, and song and music floated on the air. O gentle Lucy Clifford! pure was thine own heart, and upon the world thou didst look with an eye of love and a heart of charity! The wretched blessed thee as an angel upon earth, and the happy hailed thee as a kindred spirit, and to thy husband and children thou wert the light, the joy, the spirit of affection, of gladness, and of love. The world would be bright and joyous indeed, were a spirit like thine enshrined in every form.

Mrs. Clifford owed much to a good mother. Her powers had been directed aright, her appetites were well disciplined; all that was good had been called into powerful action, and all that was of evil tendency, had been restrained and subdued in a good degree, and a harmonious and loveable character was produced. O, we owe much to a mother's guidance! We may smile at what we call maternal over fondness and anxiety, but there is not on the wide earth one heart that beats for us, and that will ever cheer us through weal and wo, so fondly and truly as a mother's. True, there was a wide difference between the natural dispositions of Ella Morton and Lucy Clifford, but a different guidance of heart and mind, and the regulations to which each had been subject, had made the difference still wider and more perceptible.

CHAPTER II.

Now let us turn and follow the steps of Mrs. Clifford. She left the dwelling of her friend, and turning down one of the narrow streets which abound in a large city, she stopped before the door of a small and very humble looking dwelling. It seemed in truth the abode of poverty and desolation. There were little children, ragged and dirty, playing in the street, and as she paused they stopped and looked at her with eagerness. There they stood with bare feet upon the brick sidewalks and stone pavements, and rags of all colors hanging loosely round their little forms, boys and girls with locks all uncombed, and faces unwashed. 'Yes, it is the lady come to see little Fanny Temple,' said one rather older than the others, with freckled face and light, blue, staring eyes. One little girl, rather tidier than the rest, with curly hair, and a face which would have been fair if clean, drew near to the lady, and looked curiously up in her face.

'Ah, my little Rose, how is your mother to-day?'

'She is better, ma'am,' was the reply, 'and says she shall be able to come and wash for you to-morrow.'

'I will call and see her before I go home, and Rosy dear, speak to your little playmates, and tell them not to make quite so much noise, for you know Fanny is sick.' The child went quickly to the group, and spoke a few words to them in an eager tone, and they all withdrew to the farther end of the street and went on with their amusements.

Mrs. Clifford now entered the house. A man of about forty or forty-five, met her at the door. 'Good morning, Mr. Temple,' said she, 'how is your daughter to-day?'

'She is better to-day, thanks to your kind care.'

Mrs. Clifford went to the bed which stood at the farther end of the room. The sick girl was asleep—she appeared to be of about fourteen years of age. Her features were exquisitely beautiful, the long black eyelashes fell upon her thin, pale cheeks, the mouth was small, and well formed, and slightly parted, disclosing a set of pearly teeth.

'Her sleep seems to be very easy,' said Mrs. Clifford, bending over her, 'did she rest well last night?'

'She did, and the doctor has been here this morning, and says he has no doubt of her recovery.'

'I am very glad to hear it. I suppose you long once more to hear her light laugh and glad voice, and see her tripping forth to meet you when you return home.'

'Yes, Fanny is a glad-hearted thing enough when well,' and the father bent over his loved and only child. 'And she is the image of her mother,' and a tear fell from his eye, and coursed down his brown, hard cheek. He turned his head away as if ashamed. 'Mrs. Clifford,' said he, suddenly, 'you know not how I love that child, she is indeed all on earth I have to love and labor for; no wonder, then, that when I thought her dying, I murmured at the decrees of Providence, but'—and he paused, and turned to the bed—his daughter had waked—'Father,' said she, and he was at her side.

'Fanny, here is good Mrs. Clifford come to see you.' The child's eyes shone with joy. She stretched out her small thin hands to her, saying, 'I am much better to-day—and father is so happy, all will now be well again.'

'But Fanny, you must not talk too much, for you are still very weak; I have brought you some cordials to strengthen you.'

'You are very kind indeed. I do not know when we shall pay you, but a heart like yours repays itself for its good deeds.'

'Well, well,' said she, laughing, 'I will fetch in my bill one of these days; but now I must be going, and Fanny dear, you must be careful, for I should be sorry to have you get worse again, lest my bill might be too long.' So saying, she left the two she had made so happy by her kindness, and pursued her way homewards.

Mr. Temple had ever been what the world calls an unfortunate man. He had married early in life a very lovely girl, whose health was ever delicate, and whom he loved with deep devotion. He was a stout, healthy man, and he watched over and toiled for her with untiring zeal. Time passed on, four children were born unto them, but they followed one after another to the grave, till there were none but the little Fanny left; and in a short time after the wife and mother died also. Mr. Temple was now a lone man; there was but this one being on earth he loved, and for her alone he toiled. She was a beautiful creature, 'so like her mother!' the fond father would say, as he parted the silken curls on her fair brow. He was poor, sickness had ever been in his dwelling, and all he could earn had gone to defray the expenses attendant thereon. But the little Fanny cheered the lone and almost broken-hearted man. She would sit on his knee when he returned from his hard labor, and her innocent prattle would win his heart to cheerfulness, and he would thank his God that still this one blessing was left to him as a bright star in a dark night. When she, his last, was taken sick, his heart rebelled! It was hard to think that his only one must die! He sat by her bedside with hands clenched sternly together, his lips closed firmly, and there gazed upon his child's fevered cheek and pale brow, and listened to her hard, disturbed breathings and moanings, and his heart murmured! There he sat and gazed and gazed, till her breathing grew more calm and quiet, till the form before him seemed to be the wife of his bosom, her whom he knew was in heaven, and then his heart grew soft as a child's, his stern lip quivered, his hands unclasped, and he knelt down and buried his face in the bed-clothes, and sobbed aloud. The stern man prayed—prayed as none but the poor, the afflicted, the almost broken hearted can pray—as one who sees his last hope failing, and the light which has cheered him through the long wintry darkness fading away and sinking into gloom and desolation. That prayer was answered. Mrs. Clifford heard of them in her visits to the poor, and she came and saw that Fanny had good care taken of her, and at last she had the happiness to see her wholly recover. And as the beautiful child wound her arms around her neck and laid her soft cheek to hers, she felt that within that young heart, there was too much of gentleness, of goodness and love, to be left where vice might corrupt its purity. She was removed to a more genial sphere. Her father thought best to accept Mrs. Clifford's kind offer to take Fanny to her home, as an attendant upon her children, and to be educated for usefulness and happiness. True, he should not have her smile to greet him when he returned at night, but he could see her as often, and with true self-sacrifice he gave due credit to the goodness of heart which dictated the generous offer, and Fanny was duly established in the home of Mrs. Clifford.

CHAPTER III.

AND now, gentle reader, if you have rambled with me enough in the foregoing chapters, we will turn aside into this little dwelling to rest us awhile. It is a pleasant spot, without the noise and bustle of the city, though we can almost fancy to ourselves, we hear its hum and tumult in the far distance. But while we listen, the birds sing in their wild freedom in the boughs overhead, the brooks go babbling by, and the soft west wind just stirs the trees enough to make a lulling noise, and shake the odor from a thousand blossoms. Ay, it is a fairy spot,—fit place you would say for the dwelling of a poet. But poets have seldom such a romantic situation, and such beautiful scenery to inspire their Muse. More oft is their dwelling in the dull, crowded city, with its heat and noise and tumult; or the dark, close, stifled room, where poverty speaks from every article of homely furniture, and pale want looks in at the broken window, and wretchedness is in the poet's garb and care upon his brow, and stern reality comes in at the door, in the shape of an angry landlady, calling for her quarter's rent! This fairy spot, with its soothing sounds and beautiful scenery,—the very spot we picture to ourselves of 'love in a cottage,' is in sooth, strange as it may seem, the dwelling of a poet! Not that he lives by that occupation. No, if that had been the case, this spot would never have been his. He is a poet from choice, not profession. It is the home of Clarence Lindsay. He was a fortunate man, when by the most lucky of all occurrences, he chanced to save the life of an old, rich, maiden aunt; who, when she died, wishing to pay up all her debts and among the rest, the debt of gratitude due to her nephew, left to him the very pretty property we have been admiring, together with considerable money invested in a bank in the neighboring city. Such accidents do not happen every day, more especially to poets; and to celebrate the taking possession of the property, Clarence wrote some very feeling lines on the death of his aunt.

But seriously, had Clarence been obliged, as some people express it, to 'live by his wits,' he would doubtless have been a great man. For it raises one's ambition and powers to be obliged to buffet a little with the world and struggle hard at times. We are apt to grow indolent and sink into indifference, when we stand afar off and merely watch the games that are playing, and take no part in the contest. But as it was he attended to business when he pleased, and when he pleased he sat in his study dreaming vague dreams, building fairy castles, rearing strange theories, and invoking the Muses.

At the time of which we speak Clarence was alone in his study—a small room very elegantly furnished—sitting upon an ottoman before an open window; the servant had just entered and handed him a note. It was a very small note of rose colored paper, and contained but a few lines, requesting the pleasure of his company the ensuing evening at the house of Mr. Morton. He read the note, folded it very carefully and put it in a small rosewood writing desk inlaid with pearl. A smile of satisfaction was on his handsome features, as he said, in a low voice to himself, 'I will not fail to be there.'

It was the eve of the party, and the elite of the city met at the house of Mr. Morton; he was fond of being noticed by the great and literary, and was proud of the notice bestowed by them upon his youngest daughter. And among the rest was Lindsay. He had been acquainted with the family for some time, and he and Ella had read together, and discussed the merits of various authors, criticised and admired, and spoken of the love described by the poet, the love which binds congenial souls, and breathing less of earth than heaven. They had not spoken of love for each other? No, and if the image of Ella Morton sometimes rose up before the mind's eye of Clarence, he told himself that he thought of her merely as a very gifted female, one with whom he loved to converse, because she was so unlike other females, with a soul to appreciate all that was high and intellectual—as he deemed it. And so on the eve I have mentioned they met. The time glided rapidly away, and one by one the guests departed. Clarence still lingered, he sat by the side of Ella, and as he rose to take his departure, a blush stole to her cheek. Very low and very tender was his voice as he bade her good night, and the small white hand lingered long in his own—and when he was gone, she stood like a statue silent and immovable. A merry voice broke on her ear. 'Look Henry, if here is not our Cousin Ella looking as though she were under the influence of some powerful magnetizer. I was not aware there was such a person present this evening.' Ella turned quickly, and met the laughing countenances of Mrs. Clifford and her husband. They were just preparing for home, and as they bade her good night, Lucy whispered that she should expect to see her in the morning.

The morning found Ella on her way to her cousin's. She entered unannounced, and soon found herself in the midst of the happy little family. On the carpet sat two little children, one a little girl, with merry eyes and light, curly hair, was laughing right joyously, as Ella entered unperceived. Her little hands were clasped in her delight, and her voice rose clear and glad as a bird's. Beside her, sat her little brother, a child of about a year, and it was his innocent, infantile prattle that had so excited and gladdened the little girl. Mrs. Clifford was sitting near by, and watching with delighted fondness, the sports of her two cherub children, and on the sofa, busy with her needle, sat Fanny Temple. Very beautiful had she grown since health had once more visited her cheek. Her face was one we would love to look upon, so pleasing was its expression, so exquisitely lovely was the whole countenance, that we might not stop to praise each separate feature, but the whole seemed the perfection of beauty. Little Mary was the first to perceive and salute Ella, as she stood gazing on the beautiful group. She started up, put her little arms around her neck, and 'O, aunt Ella, I am so glad you have come, and you will stay all day, and make my doll a new gown—wont you, Auntie dear?'

A very pleasant day did Ella spend with the Cliffords, and when she retired at night to the little room which was always at her disposal, her heart was glad and her spirits joyous. A slight tap at the door, and Lucy entered. 'May I come in, Cousin Ella, I want to have a long talk with you?'

'A talk with me, Lucy! What do you intend to scold me for, my sins of omission or commission, for either I shall take kindly.'

'I am glad to hear you say so, for it is on both scores I have somewhat to say to you; but first, I must listen to a confession from your own lips; you know that between us there is nothing hidden, so tell me, Ella, how stands matters between yourself and Clarence?'

Ella did not answer, but drew a letter from her bosom and gave it to Lucy in silence. She read and asked, 'Have you seen him since you received this letter?'

'I met him last night.'

'Well Ella, how does your heart feel in view of this happiness—shall I so call it?—of being the beloved of Clarence Lindsay—does it not beat wildly in its prison house?'

'Lucy, I will tell you all about it, and you must advise me. I can scarcely analyze my own feelings. I love Clarence deeply, devotedly, I look upon the earth and the heavens in the stillness of night, amid the reign of beauty and grandeur, and there is but one thought within me, and that is of him. My love is indeed an all-absorbing passion. You know not, Lucy, how our affection has been nursed and fostered. Ours is not the love of the person, it is not the affection which is poured forth from the lips, causing the heart to swell with rapturous joy. It is more a union of the soul and spirit; we have dwelt in blissful dreams, we have conversed together upon those glorious subjects which seldom enter into the hearts of lovers. We love spiritually. Our affection has not been fed from the same fountain as others; we have drank from purer streams, from more intellectual sources. And when I think how pure and how refined is our affection, can I doubt but that we shall be happy? And yet there is a something that I dread—it is the familiarity of wedded life, this constant association, this descending from the high and sublime flights of fancy and thought, to the common walks of life. I dread it, Lucy, I fear it will break the illusion. I feel that the beautiful garb in which I have clothed the ideal, will slowly fade away, and the being I have so loved, almost adored, will be, after a short time has passed—after the romance of wedded life has faded, but a mere man, with all a man's passions and failings, and I be to him merely his wife, with whom he must live, and not the beautiful being, the realization of his glowing dreams and youth's romance.'

'Ella, my cousin,' said Lucy, 'is this your theory? Let me tell you it is this that hath wrecked the happiness of many a heart; your thoughts, your reasonings are worse than vain. Why in the married state do you think that all romance must fade? Why do you imagine that in the duties which belong to every home, there is something so at variance with all the high and glorious aspirations of the soul? Ella do not let these wrong ideas take such hold upon your imagination, I will not say your reason. Have as much of romance as you please, invest your beloved with all good qualities, let him hold as high a place in your heart as possible. Share with him in all his intellectual pursuits, but at the root and spring of all, let a deep love of religion and usefulness prevail, and ever let charity be active. Without this, Ella, without this feeling of love towards all, real usefulness, active goodness, I warn you, as your dearest friend, that your happiness will rest upon a slight foundation, the slightest breath of misfortune or calumny will overthrow it, and you will mourn over bright hopes faded and crushed!'

'Lucy, I thank you for your kind advice, you will be near to advise me when I stand in danger.'

'But you will need a surer safeguard, a nearer and holier presence, even the direction of your Father in heaven, which you must seek for by prayer and supplication. And my cousin, begin now and ask of God to direct you in your future path that you sink not, that you chase not phantoms.'

It was with a sad heart, and with eyes filled with tears, that Lucy left her cousin to repose. And Ella's heart too was slightly clouded, though the bright dreams and hopes of love soon chased her fears away.

Lucy feared justly for her cousin. She knew her heart so well and the motives which ever actuated her, that she might well tremble for her. And Clarence too, gifted as he was with the powers to please, ardent as he was, in his love, his first, romantic attachment, yet he, she feared, had no fixed principle of action. He acted from the impulses of a heart naturally affectionate and kind, but passionate and dangerous when aroused, and she feared that if trials should come, and he, who had been so favored by fortune and the world's smiles, might give way to wrong principles, and let his passions gain the ascendancy of his conscience, and so fall a victim to temptation.

CHAPTER IV.

WE will not pause to describe the wedding the reader has anticipated. Suffice it to say, that the bride looked as all brides do—very lovely and interesting. The father gave a parting kiss to his youngest and favorite daughter, and Mrs. Clifford took her hand with sisterly affection and saluted her as Mrs. Lindsay. She was Ella Morton no more. She had entered upon the untried scene, she was her husband's for weal or woe; they were to tread together the same path, but with what feelings they could not tell now. O how often is it trodden by those whose hearts are far separated, whose affections are all wasted, and whose souls all discordant. The beautiful cottage, sweet Lindsay House, had now a mistress. Clarence loved his wife well—he was proud of her. He had won the prize which many had coveted—one who had been flattered and praised, and permitted to be the centre of a brilliant circle; when she was present, beauty might lavish her charms in vain, for before her wit and brilliant conversational powers, and depth of mind, they passed unheeded.

A year has passed, and we will look in upon the little study—that cool fragrant retreat, where the honey suckle climbs in at the window, and the wild rose lends its freshness to the air, and the soft west wind fans the brows of its occupants. A happy picture truly! Upon a seat by an open window, before which stood a table loaded with books and papers, sat Lindsay and his wife. She with her dark hair all drawn back from her forehead, excepting a few stray curls which had escaped from their confinement, with one hand on her brow, the other holding an open manuscript; she was reading in a low, earnest tone. Clarence sat beside her, all attention; there was an expression of pleasure upon his features, as he gazed upon his wife and listened to her voice. When she ceased, he was eloquent in his praises, ‘Ah, that is beautiful, Ella, just the thing, a good beginning is made, I doubt not, and when the work is finished, it will do you much honor.’

‘Honor, I care not for, Clarence, only as it reflects lustre upon yourself.’

‘Why should we care for the world, Ella, when the means of so much happiness lie in ourselves? As for me, it seems as if I could live forever in this quiet spot, with your sweet spirit for my minister, but I know you have not been used to solitude, and I mingle with the world for your sake—even there I am happy in seeing you so.’

‘Clarence I have something in my heart and I will tell it to you, if you will not be offended.’

‘Offended? No,’ said the proud husband, as he gazed upon his young and blushing wife.

‘Well, then,’ said Ella, and she parted the hair upon his forehead, and took his hand within her own and looked steadily up in his face. ‘You might, Clarence, if you chose, be a great man; there is that within you, which if you but attempted to develop it, would lead you on to fame and greatness. For myself alone, I care not for honor, but it would gladden my heart to see the world look up to you and do credit to your powers. Only your wife knows now of the great worth of your mind, she only knows the richness of your intellect, the depth of your knowledge; you hide it from the world, and keep it locked within its storehouse. I know how vast are your powers, and but a little of ambition is needed to stir them up and make you a great man and your name glorious to future generations. Will it be so, my husband, or will you still seek to hide your talents in obscurity, and let others, less deserving, bear away the prizes you might gain so easily?’

The husband sat in silence; his countenance had assumed a serious expression as she proceeded, and he was now lost in thought. ‘But Ella,’ said he at length, ‘Should we be any happier, could we be any more useful than we may be here, would our love be stronger, our hearts more closely united, or our affections increased? If our path were more dazzling, would it not be less tranquil and happy. Very blessed has been our lot in this pleasant place, and I fear to break its present security. We have a good field that we may cultivate, enrich and adorn.’

‘Nay, your implied fears are imaginary. Even Cousin Lucy—and she, you think is a pattern of women—even she thinks that one should mingle with the world, and that it is our duty so to do, and not confine our usefulness to too small a sphere.’

‘Yes, Ella, it is well to mingle with the world as she does, to rationally enjoy society—to go among the poor and the distressed, to stand by the couch of the sick and dying, to do good with a cheerful heart, a glad smile, and the words of consolation ever upon her lips. Truly her children will call her blessed!’

‘Every one has their own way to be useful. All have not the same gift, and I feel that you were born for better things than to sit here and strive for no higher aim than to make your wife happy. Ella said the last words with a smile upon her lips, but she meant them in earnest. Her eye fell upon Clarence, and she saw that she had made some impression; for though, as she said, he had that within him, which would make him a great man, yet some stimulating power was necessary to bring his talents into action; but rouse his energies, show him the goal he is to reach, and no one could press on with more vigor. Yet, far, far beneath all was a love of retirement, a shrinking from observation and a desire to stand afar off from the noisy crowd. His romance was of a peculiar and pure kind. His heart was one which loved the meek and retiring virtues in woman; he wished to have her mind cultivated, but still, he wanted her his own, and above all a kind and gentle creature, with no wish but love, no ambition but that which centred in him; one whom he knew loved him for himself alone. So far Ella had been to him all he could wish. Naught had yet occurred to disturb the romance of their wedded life. Their circumstances were such that her time was wholly at her own disposal, and the monotonous duties, which she had ever associated with wedded life, had not yet come upon her. She had not descended to those employments which she ever regarded with contempt, and she was determined not to so long as she could possibly avoid them. Nor was this all. She wished that Clarence should occupy what she deemed a higher station in life. She knew he could do it; she knew if she but roused his ambition her wish would be gratified. She wished the world to know how talented he was, and how well she had chosen when she had given him her hand. And her task was well performed, the chord vibrated to her touch, the spirit was made ambitious, and Clarence entered the arena as a competitor for fame and renown.

But I must not linger here. Lindsay was stricken down with a fever. His situation was considered very dangerous, and Ella watched long and affectionately by his side; well was her duty performed during the term of doubt and uncertainty. But at length the crisis came, the danger was passed. Yet he was left very low and feeble. Long, weary hours he had to pass ere health again would come to his frame. And how were they passed? As the great danger passed away, Ella began to tire of her exertions. It was, to say the least, very irksome to sit hour after hour in the darkened chamber with no one but her sick husband, who was forbidden to talk much on account of his feeble state. She had watched him with all a wife's affection during the excitement of the danger, but now she longed for freedom to pursue again her customary vocations—to be with her pen and book. Sometimes she would steal away and leave him alone; but then her conscience would upbraid her for so doing—therefore one day when talking with Mrs. Clifford, concerning her husband she gently hinted that she should like to have Fanny Temple come and stay with her till he should recover, if she could be spared. Mrs. Clifford, ever kind, consented, though as she did so, she cast a searching glance at Ella, which made her cheek crimson and her eye turn away. Fanny became an inmate of her home, and Ella thought she could now leave her husband with safety, for Fanny could supply her place, and she, herself, could see that his interests did not go behind. Thus she reasoned, but it was dangerous reasoning for a wife. The place she should have filled was given lightly to another, and she herself had committed the first act towards breaking their wedded happiness.

And did not Clarence mark the change? He did. He had borne his sickness patiently, even the lingering hours of convalescence had glided imperceptibly away while his wife sat by his side. He had thought that perhaps the time might hang heavily on her hands, but he thought too, that her love for him was strong enough to make even those hours seem sweet and pleasant, when she knew that health, though it came slowly, still might be his. The first day the young nurse took her seat in his room, was a sad day to him. Fanny's step was as light as his wife's, she arranged the pillows for his head as well as even she could have done, her voice was as soft and as musical, and she handed him his nourishment with as sweet a smile as even Ella—but all these were unheeded. She but supplied the place of a dearer, and though all things that he needed were as ready as ever, still it was not the same. Ella would step in once in a while, and with her own sweet smile, would ask how he was, and kiss the cheek of the fair, young girl, and tell her she was just fit for a nurse. Fanny had a quick and sensitive mind, and she knew Clarence had much rather have his wife's company than hers. But she had been stationed there by that wife to do his bidding, and she had nought else to do, but perform her task as well as she might in her love to do good. To beguile the time, she read to the invalid, and sang him her own sweet songs; she would bring flowers from the garden, and sit at his feet when he called her, and he would teach her their language, and then would wreath them amid her luxuriant curls, till she looked like a very flower queen, and her glad ringing laughter would resound in the sick chamber, till the sick man himself would smile as he gazed upon the fair, lovely creature, and almost forgive his wife for turning him off to her care. She was just fit for a flower queen, so fairy, so sylph like her form, and so merry the glance of her bonnie blue eye. Clarence was a lover of beauty, and Fanny's was so innocent, so pure, and so child-like, that no one could look upon her and yet harbor a thought of evil.

Clarence's health gradually improved under the care of his young nurse, but he manifested no wish to leave his chamber, he did not watch as heretofore for his wife's coming, nor sigh when she departed. At first, he had felt grieved at Ella's conduct, although he said nothing to her upon the subject; then followed a feeling of indignation, and as he turned to his lovely nurse, he felt almost consoled; then came indifference, and Fanny's company was more requisite to his happiness than even his wife's. Yet still he lingered in his chamber, although he was well enough to go out, and the physician advised him to do so. But one day it was too warm, another too cool, and another he had the headache, and so he put it off till he should feel stronger.

One fine, summer morning, he sat by an open window, and Fanny was by his side reading from Byron. She finished the poem she was reading, rose from her seat, and looked out of the window up into the blue sky, and down upon the green earth and bright flowers, and then turning to Clarence, she said, 'Mr Lindsay, why do you not walk out to day? I am sure it would do you good, and I should think you would be tired of staying in the house with such a simple child as myself.'

Clarence started, and the blood mounted to his forehead at her simple words. 'Yes, no,' said he, 'I don't know but I will go; perhaps a walk will do me good, it is indeed very pleasant.'

She was surprized at his broken words, but said in glad tones, 'I am glad to hear you say so, and I will get your coat and hat and call your wife to accompany you.'

She was already nearly to the door, when he called her back; 'No Fanny, you had better not call Mrs.

Lindsay, she may be busy and may not like to go; your company will be sufficient.'

'No, indeed sir,' said she gaily, and with an arch look, she added, 'your nurse knows what is best, and she knows that a walk with one's wife is much better for a sick man's health than anything else.' And so saying, she went skipping out of the room.

Clarence went slowly about his preparations. 'Yes, she is but a child,' said he. 'Yet why do my thoughts so dwell upon her? she is so like what I fancied of all that is lovely and gentle in woman, and I would'—but here he was interrupted by the entrance of his wife, ready attired for a walk.

'Where is Fanny?' said Clarence.

'She has taken the opportunity to go and see her father, who is at work but a short distance from here. But come, we will be going, as I have not much time.'

'Ever busy,' said Clarence rather pettishly, 'I told Fanny she had better not call you as you might be engaged, I hope you have not put yourself to any inconvenience.'

'None to speak of; but come, do not look so mopish about it, or I shall be obliged to call back your nurse, and ask her how she treats you when you have such turns.' And so half in earnest, half in jest, they went forth.

CHAPTER V.

CLARENCE had now no excuse for remaining in his sick chamber, and accordingly Fanny, as her duties of nurse were ended, prepared to go to her home at Mr. Clifford's; she sat in the parlor ready attired for the ride, and Mr. and Mrs. Lindsay were to accompany her. At length Clarence entered in a state of painful excitement, and casting his hat upon the table, he threw himself down upon a sofa and buried his face in his hands. Deep sobs came from him, and the frame of the man shook like a child, Ella went to him and asked him the cause of his agitation. Clarence raised his head from the sofa, and looking his wife steadfastly in the face said—'I am a beggar!'

'A beggar! Clarence! what do you mean?' exclaimed Ella in amazement.

'I mean what I say—the Bank has failed, and my property is gone!'

'All is not gone, we still have this place, this house and these lands, it cannot be that we are absolutely beggars.'

'Why, as to the matter of that,' said Clarence bitterly, 'we have to be sure a house over our heads for the present, but we must work to keep it there, ay work like the veriest slave. I could do this, for I have now, thank God, good health, and could toil if need be; but we must dismiss our servants, we must lessen our expenses, we must live simply as poor people live; and how could you do this, you who,'—Clarence was proceeding in this excited strain, but he chanced to glance at his wife, and saw the deadly paleness of her countenance, and the words died on his lips, and he sprung forward just in time to save her from falling to the floor.

Fanny ran for the needed restoratives, but it was long before Ella returned to consciousness.

'You have spoken too plainly,' said Fanny, in a reproachful tone. 'You should not have made your situation appear so hopeless.'

'It is hopeless, Fanny,' said the disappointed man. 'I did think once, that I could bear, even poverty cheerfully with her, but the experience of the few last months, have told me the contrary; she cannot bear it, she detests those duties which must now devolve upon her; she could not—Fanny, you know she could not—cheerfully watch by her husband's side during his hours of convalescence, then how can she make a good wife for a poor man, to cheer his toil and gladden his heart. I had rather, Fanny, that she had your gentle heart and disposition, than all her talent and love of study.'

'Mr. Lindsay,' said Fanny, raising her soft eyes, full of tears, reproachfully to his face. 'You forget, surely, of whom you speak, you forget that it is the wife of your bosom, whom you have sworn to cherish and love.'

'No, I do not forget, I know it too well, would to God, that I did not.' And with gloomy brow and heavy step, he left the room.

Clarence was from that day an altered man. Real trouble had never visited him till now, there had been nothing to try his temper, nothing to call up the deep passions of his heart. He tried for and easily obtained business in the city, and his whole soul seemed to be absorbed in his employment. At home, a cloud ever rested upon his brow, which his wife tried but little to clear away. He had said in the first hour of excitement, that their expenses must be lessened and their servants dismissed; but since that time, nothing had been said by him on the subject, and they still lived as formerly. Clarence had thus erred in his conduct towards his wife; he should have told her that it was impossible for him to indulge in his former luxuries, without involving himself in debt; he should have given her his confidence, and asked her advice, as though he considered her worthy of being consulted; and it may have been that then she would have aroused herself to noble exertion and calm endurance. And this would have been done, had his feelings been in the same state as in former days; but the conduct of his wife during his sickness had changed him greatly—it had sunk deep into his heart. We do not say that he did not love her still, but it was not with that fresh, ardent and confiding affection of former days. He grieved that his feelings were so changed, that he could no longer look upon her as all perfection; and though he treated her with respect, though no unkind word ever passed between them, yet they both felt that there was a bitter change.

And Ella sought not her husband's confidence; she gave no token by word or sign that she thought she had done wrong, and though she felt that much of happiness had gone, still her proud spirit would not humble itself, even to her husband, and own that she had erred. She gave no more thought than formerly to domestic duties, her servants were still around her, and could attend to these, and Ella lived as she had lived, though she might have known that her husband's resources were but scanty and insufficient to defray the expenses of so numerous a household. She thought sometimes of her conversation with Lucy Clifford; she had not regarded as she ought her good advice, she had not made religion her trust, nor prayed to God to enable her to discharge her duties aright; but she had gone on trusting in her own strength, and of late making none her confidant. She desponded at times, she looked back upon former days with feelings of sorrow, and the hot tears would course down her cheeks; she thought how those days had faded, even as she had feared, but the cause was not the same which she had looked upon with so much dread before marriage. It was not the familiarity of wedded life that had destroyed her happiness; it was not that the ideal had vanished and stern reality had taken its place. Her bright hopes had indeed faded—much of affection seemed dead and forgotten; but within her own heart lay much of blame, her own conduct had tended much to produce the dreaded result. As a wife, she had not done her duty, and its neglect was bringing its own bitter consequences. And Clarence too had erred, but still had she done her duty, had she when trouble came upon him, borne the burden with him, had she soothed his weary spirit, and been ever ready with gentle smile and willing hand to minister to his good, affliction might have been, yea, would have been blessed to them, and the deeper riches of the heart would have been revealed.

CHAPTER VI.

It was a dark and gloomy night without—a stormy night of autumn; fearfully the blasts swept by, cold and relentless in their fury. The stormy winds of autumn! They speak of desolation and of sorrow, of bright days gone and dreary days to come; and to Lindsay, as he sat in his study alone, they sounded like the dirge of all that was good and holy on earth, as the funeral notes of all his hopes, his joys, and all that had ever gladdened his heart. How sadly, how fearfully had that man changed within a year! Deep lines were on his forehead, and round his handsome mouth were traces of fearful mental suffering; his dark lustrous eyes, were sunken in his head, his cheeks were pale, and his temples throbbed and burned with unnatural heat. He was alone—in the room where we first met him, when manhood had just set its seal upon the lofty brow; there, where he sat with his wife, the chosen of his heart; there, where she had urged him on to fame; where she had roused his ambition and told him of powers that none but she knew. Yes, there in that room, so associated, he sat now, alone, despairing in bitter misery, of which he had never dreamed.

The table before him was strewn with papers, and he glanced over them one by one, until each had met his stern and dreadful gaze; then gathering them all together he exclaimed—'these are the evidences of my guilt! Guilt! Clarence Lindsay, didst thou ever think thy proud name would ever be associated with guilt and crime? Yes crime—have I not taken that which was not my right? Have I not defrauded? Am I not a thief, a villain, ay, all that is base and sinful! And for what have I done this? Was it for myself? Could I not get enough by honest labor for a maintenance? It matters not now, it is done, and to-morrow's sun will tell the tale to a gaping world. And what will she say? She who prided herself upon her husband's noble intellect? What will she say, when she knows that her husband is a defrauder? She will say that I have a gift, that even she knew not of.' And the wretched man tossed his arms wildly into the air, and laughed aloud. Reason tottered on her throne, madness was staring him in his face, horrid shapes were round him. He arose and hurriedly paced the room: his eyes glared wildly, and at length they chanced to rest upon a miniature of his wife, suspended in the room. He stopped and gazed upon it. It represented her as she was when he first called her his bride, young and beautiful. Thoughts of the past came over him; he took the miniature from the wall, sat down and gazed upon it a few minutes, and then burst into tears. His wildness had vanished, and he wept as he had not wept for years. He felt relieved, he kissed the miniature and laid it on the table. 'I may not do it now,' he muttered, 'with that before me, I have not strength now, I will go look upon her once again.' And he took the light and proceeded with stealthy steps to his wife's apartment.

Clarence stood for a few minutes gazing upon his wife. She slumbered not easily, her breathing was hard, and a few tears trickled down from her closed lids upon her cheek. That cheek was not as sound and as fresh and glowing as in former days, he thought, as he stood there shading the light from her eyes. The heart of the wretched man grew softer, and he whispered to himself—'May God bless her, and make her days happy. She is my wife, and I would not make her miserable. What I have done, was done that she might not feel poverty; but now I have doomed her to feel a worse pang, to feel that her husband is a villain and a defrauder! Just God!' he exclaimed in bitter agony, 'Why was I left to such a miserable fate?' and he threw himself upon a couch, and lay as if in a trance for a long time.

The bright morning sun was shining in the apartment when Clarence awoke. It was some time before he could collect his senses, and comprehend his situation. He slowly arose and looked around the chamber; his wife had stolen softly out some time before. He walked to the closet, unlocked it, and taking from thence a pistol, he examined it carefully. A stern, rigid expression was on his countenance; at that moment he heard his wife's step, and hastily concealing the weapon, he sat down upon a chair.

'Mr. Lindsay,' said she, 'there is a man in the parlor below, waiting to see you.' Clarence said not a word, but went down. It was as he expected, an officer come to arrest him. Calmly, and without any visible agitation, he heard all he had to say.

'I will accompany you in a few minutes, allow me to step up stairs and speak to my wife?' The officer bowed assent.

He went into the chamber, took the pistol unnoticed by her and then going up to her, put his arm round her neck, and straining her to his bosom, whispered—'Good by, Ella, and God bless you.'

She looked up amazed in his face, and started at its fearful expression. 'For heaven's sake Clarence, what is the matter, and why have you that pistol in your hand,' and she reached forth to take it from him.

'Nay hinder me not Ella, death or dishonor,' and so saying he put the pistol to his heart. Ella seized his arm, but her strength failed, and with a shriek she fell fainting upon the floor. Her shriek, together with the report of the pistol, brought the whole family to the chamber. There lay Lindsay weltering in his own blood, but still not dead, and close by his side lay his wife in a state of insensibility. She quickly returned to consciousness, and assisted the servants to carry their master to bed, and then sent for a physician. The wound was not mortal.

Long did Clarence lay upon that bed of sickness and pain, and he knew not how well, nor how tenderly he was watched; he knew not how his wife hung over his pillow, and watched his fevered breathings, while the tears fast flowed from her eyes, as she listened to his wild ravings, that told how he had been led on to commit the wicked deed, how, rather than that she should upbraid him with bringing her to poverty, he had yielded to temptation, and taken that which was not his own. Yes, Ella learned a wise lesson by her husband's sick bed; she learned how her first act of unkindness had entered deep into his heart, how it had first led him to think unkindly of her, and then to almost turn from her with indifference. But we may not dwell upon this; suffice it to say, that Lindsay recovered, but with returning reason came a sense of his degradation, and a knowledge of how deeply he had fallen. 'And justly too,' said he to his wife, as he spoke with her for the first time upon the subject. 'What is your husband now, Ella, he whom you once urged to seek for fame, and the world's applause?'

'He is my husband still,' said she, 'and had I performed my duty as a wife, he might never have fallen!' And tears of repentance came to her eyes, and she leaned her head upon his bosom and wept. Clarence tried all in his power to comfort her. 'Let the world go as it will,' said he, 'we will be all the world to each other, even as we were in happy days. Look up my own wife, and say, should all the world cast me off, and brand my name with infamy, wilt thou then still call me thine, and make me sure one heart loves me, guilty as I am.'

'Clarence,' answered Ella solemnly, 'did I not swear to love thee? Deeply have I erred, but you shall see how deep is my repentance. God will answer the prayers of a penitent heart and enable me to do what is right. Am I not thine in life or in death? When you seemed upon the bed of death, I prayed that I too might die; but now, thou livest, I pray that I may live to prove my love and affection.'

I must hasten to the conclusion of my narrative. Lindsay was tried, according to the forms of law—tried in the face of the world, as a defrauder! Deeply was he humbled as he stood before the judge with downcast eyes and a throbbing heart. He who had once stood as high as they, who had been looked up to as a man of genius and learning, was fallen! Alas! how weak are human mortals! We know not our strength, till we are tempted; the man of honesty and good character, when he looks at his poor, fallen, sinful brother, knows not how great was his temptation, nor how long and painfully he strove against it.

Lindsay was sentenced to pay a heavy fine. This was paid by the kindness of Henry Clifford, who was now a man of wealth and willing to do all in his power to assist the husband of his cousin. Clarence was deeply grateful for his kindness, but he could not stay among his former associates, when he fancied that every one who saw him, looked upon him with contempt. And in a short time from his trial, he with his wife, assisted still by the kindness of Mr. and Mrs. Clifford, started for the West, poor in purse, but rich in lessons of experience.

Letters often passed between Lucy and her cousin Ella, in which the latter spoke of happy days, for she had found the pearl of great price—and had taken religion for her guide. They were very contented in their western home. 'You will wonder,' said she, 'how I get along with the duties of housekeeping, but I like them much; there is a charm of novelty and that is a good deal, and Clarence is pleased with every thing I do. I have, my dear cousin, found more true happiness here in our rude western home, than I ever enjoyed even in our own sweet cottage.'

And time passed, and letters came from the West, telling of little cherubs and prattling boys and girls, and the delights of the home circle, and all the cetera upon which happy parents so love to dwell. 'Indeed Lucy, you must come and see us, for our little boy we have named for your husband, and you must come and own his relationship, and I don't know but I shall call upon Fanny; she has helped you rear your little ones, it is but fair that my turn should come now.'

MARY.

BY CHARLOTTE.

How CAN I sing of thee, Mary,
My beautiful, my own!

For thou liest low, where the violets grow,
And the turf is thy headstone, Mary!

Yet mourn I not for thee, Mary,
I would not call thee back!

Though my home is lone, and the music tone
Of thy voice I ever lack, Mary!

I think of thy gentle smile, Mary,
And thy pure, unsullied truth,
And I call thee blest, who hast gone to rest
In the morning of thy youth, Mary!

Though other lips may smile, Mary,
And eyes with lustre shine,
Yet still to me, there's nought like thee
And those blue orbs of thine, Mary.

And oh 'tis a pleasant thought, Mary,
To cheer the sorrowing, given,
Though the flower is crushed, and the love tone hushed,
We shall meet in heaven, Mary.

But I cannot wait the time, Mary,
Till I shall meet thee there!
I must see thee now, with thy holy brow,
And thy face so meek and fair, Mary!

Come in night-visions, Mary,
With thy soft, seraph smile;
Oh speak once more, as thou didst of yore;—
Come and my grief beguile, Mary!

'SHE IS NOT DEAD, BUT SLEEPETH.'

BY REV. DARIUS FORBES.

A Discourse delivered in the Universalist Church in Belfast, on the occasion of the death of Mrs. LOUIS WHITE, wife of Robert White. June 19, 1842.

LUKE viii. 52: 'She is not dead, but sleepeth.'

WHAT a dread and mysterious event closes man's earthly career! What a solemn mystery hangs about the bed of death, the coffin, the shroud and the grave! There lays the familiar form which we once loved and revered—the form which we cherished as the apple of our eye, and upon which we delighted to gaze, but how changed! It is wrapped in a dread and mysterious slumber! We speak to it, and it answers not! We place our hand upon it, and we start back with indescribable feelings! It is as cold and lifeless as the marble, and its touch sends a chill through our frames!

We gaze upon the mortal remains, but what we loved is no longer there! The form is before us, but something is gone! Death has laid his withering hand upon it, the countenance is changed, and what we loved hath escaped! What has death done? Who can tell what has departed from that familiar form, which, but a short time since, was full of life and animation? What hath escaped from that countenance, which was radiant with smiles and affection; with intelligence and wit, that it is now so desolate and dreary? We have seen nothing go away; yet something hath gone—that which made the form lovely. O death, how deep the mystery in which thy doings are wrapped up! We cannot penetrate the veil which thou spreadest over thy works, and no voice comes from thy dread abode to tell us what thou art, or what thou doest! Dread visitor of our firesides and homes, what art thou? Whence didst thou come? Who hath sent thee forth to desolate our homes, and make them the abodes of melancholy and gloom?

Death answers not such questions as these. And we may search beneath the shroud and in the grave with the most prying curiosity and penetrating eye, but no light is there to remove this mystery. All is impenetrable darkness and silence. It is only when we open the volume of Revelation, that a clear and unclouded light shines upon this darkness and mystery. We there learn, that when the body crumbles to dust, the spirit goes to God who gave it. Revelation tells us, that it is the spirit, the inspiration of the Almighty, which makes human forms beautiful and lovely; and that when death comes, it is only at the bidding of the infinite One, to call that which we love home to mansions on high, while the form is left to sleep in silence. It tells us, that although the casket is broken, it was only to remove the treasure it contained to a place of greater security. While we know it can no more return to this changeable and mutable world to comfort and bless us, Revelation tells us that in a few short years at most, we shall follow it to that better land 'where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest.' Oh! what a blessed consolation is this, in such a changeable, mutable, and dying world as ours!

Our text was uttered beside the death-bed of the young and beautiful, by him who 'spoke as never man spake.' Death's mysterious slumbers had taken possession of that young and sprightly form, and the friends had gathered around, weeping over their bereavement. All was agony and grief. Every heart was sad, and every eye was wet with tears, as they gazed upon the form once so beautiful and lovely, now wrapped in the dread and mysterious slumbers of death. But the Savior of the world came. He spake, and the maid arose from her slumbers, and sorrow fled away.

How beautiful the thought—'She is not dead, but sleepeth!' She was weary of earth's cares, anxieties and sorrows, and she has laid down to rest, and what rendered her lovely has fled away, but not perished. Mysterious slumbers have taken possession of the body, but the spirit still lives. It has gone away where are 'many mansions.' How quiet and peaceful are her slumbers! No frightful dreams disturb her repose; no anxious thoughts invade the mind. All is calm, and quiet, and peaceful.

After a day of toil and fatigue, when the body and mind are wearied with their labors, how grateful is sweet slumber. How does it refresh and invigorate; and how do we long for it, when wearied and exhausted by earth's labors, cares, anxieties and perplexities! When health courses through the veins, how sweet are our slumbers! Look upon the countenance of the little child when wrapped in peaceful slumbers, and how pleasant the sight! How sweet its expression!

Such is the thought to be associated with death—that of quiet and peaceful slumber. To die is only to fall asleep for our refreshment. We become weary of the world and its anxieties, and cares, and labors; the decrepitude of age comes upon us; or our bodies are worn down with disease or sorrow, and then the slumbers of death come to our relief. If the duties of life have been faithfully performed; if the soul is purified and strengthened by faith in God and human immortality, when age, or sickness, or misfortune makes us weary of life, how does the soul desire to be freed from its prison! This slumber comes over us like quiet sleep over the little child. It is pleasant, and only to refresh and invigorate. It is only to raise us to a higher and purer state of action, where fatigue shall no more be known forever—where immortal energy and activity shall be the lot of man.

Such were the thoughts presented to that mourning family by our text. How must the declaration—'she is not dead, but sleepeth'—have sounded in the ears of that mourning circle! To what conflicting thoughts and feelings must it have given birth! Some would receive it with a half doubting faith, and rejoice with trembling, while others would treat it as a chimera. But soon would its truth be verified. At the voice of the Son of God she awoke. And at the same voice, all the human dead shall awake, no more to sleep forever. 'For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive.' Not one of all earth's millions shall be missing from the vast assembly.

Hence the sentiment of our text is as true now, of every one that dies, as of the individual to whom it primarily referred. Standing as we do over the remains of a beloved sister in the gospel, we may not only say, but believe—'she is not dead, but sleepeth.' True, she will not return to us as did the person concerning whom our text was uttered; but it is no less certain that she only sleepeth. Nor is it any the less certain that she shall awake—aye that she hath already awaked in the spirit-land, the home of the human soul.

The world had lost its charms to her; her frame was worn out with disease and pain, and now she hath fallen asleep in Jesus. Her sorrows are all ended. She quietly sleeps here before us—no dreams disturb, no anxious thoughts or feelings invade the mind, no fears alarm, no terrors distract. No more will she spend sleepless nights, or anxious days. No more will she be tortured with pain, or fatigued with labor.

The body is about to be consigned to the dust as it was; but according to the word of God, and as we believe, the spirit hath returned to Him who gave it. And it went not as a criminal to the prison, or the slave to the place of labor; but it went willingly as if going home to rest. It went with the confident expectation of meeting us all in that better land for which it had started, where sin and sorrow can never come. How grateful the thought, while we feel she can no more come to us, that, when we have completed our mission on earth, we shall go to join her society and that of all we love in heaven! It is a thought full of consolation.

Here we are all strangers and pilgrims far away from home. We have no abiding city here. And the only road that will lead us home, is through the gate of death. But while it is a gate so narrow, that it strips us of all we have of earth, and brings upon us much pain and suffering, how delightful the thought, that as we see one after another of our companions and friends whom we love, disappear through this gate, that they have been called by a Father's love to go, and are taken by a Father's hand, and led through the dark valley, to a blissful and everlasting home!

How little is the mind accustomed to dwell on the idea included in this expression! A false theology has covered that world with darkness and terror, and placed a fierce tyrant on its throne, instead of the infinite Father, and so the true idea of that spirit-land has been almost driven from men's minds. Man has too generally looked upon it as a world of uncertainty—a state where darkness and doubt spread their mantle, and some terrible doom will or may await us, rather than the home of the human soul. But so the Scriptures do not speak. They speak of it as the land of rest, 'where the wicked cease from troubling;' the abode of purity and blessedness unalloyed and unending—as man's everlasting home.

Let us pause and think of this expression for a moment. To go home—what is it? It is to go to join the society of the Father who made and the Savior that redeemed us, without anything to hinder our communion; to rejoin all our parents, and brothers, and sisters, and friends who have gone before us, and where one after another of those we shall leave behind shall join us, until not one shall be missing from any circle of friends; to go where all is harmony and love, and there is nothing to mar or disturb our enjoyments, and where we shall no more be separated forever.

Those who have been called to go from their native land and live among strangers, can feel something of the meaning of the word home. When away where we do not purpose to make a permanent residence, how uneasy, restless and dissatisfied do we feel! There is something wanting to complete our enjoyments, even though we are surrounded with everything this world can produce, calculated to please and gratify! We forget the splendors with which we are surrounded; are deaf to the music that sounds in our ears, while the heart wanders away to its own native skies, and fountains, and streams, and woods—the lowly place of its birth. And when we are prepared to start for home, what emotions fill our hearts! What feelings are stirred up within us! We have sensations of delight which no pen can describe, no tongue can tell!

At home! There is the venerable father who led us up to manhood and toiled for our sustenance and education! There is the mother who bore us, watched over the helpless period of infancy and youth, with all a mother's care and solicitude! There are the brothers and sisters, born of the same parents, fed from the same board and by the toil of the same hands, nourished and cherished by the same care, led up to man and womanhood under the same roof, and all the nameless associations of youth! What indescribable feelings do such thoughts as these awaken in our hearts! Language is too feeble to give utterance to them!

Thus it is with the soul. In this world it is uneasy, restless and dissatisfied. Give it all the world can afford, and still there are the same restless desires, the same longing after some unattained good, perpetually agitating it. It feels away from home. And as it is with the sojourner in a foreign land, when he starts for home his mind is filled with delight, so it is with the christian when he is about to die. He looks forward to the spirit-land, with the same ecstasy and delight, as the stranger does to the home of his childhood. He feels that that world is the birth-place, the home of his soul. He feels assured, that when he arrives there, he shall meet with his parents, brothers, sisters, friends, and all he loved here, in the society of the infinite Father, that Savior who died to redeem his soul from sin, holy apostles and prophets and the 'spirits of just men made perfect.' Such thoughts and anticipations

'Can make a dying bed
Feel soft as downy pillows are.'

Thus died our sister whose remains are here before us, ready to be consigned to the dust, and whose departure we mourn. She felt that she was going home to meet her parents and friends who had preceded her, and that dear sister* whose departure she mourned with us, but a few short months ago; that there she should await the arrival and welcome us all home too, where all our sorrows shall end, and our days of mourning be no more. She has fallen sweetly to sleep in Jesus. Peaceful be her slumbers, while the spirit has winged its way on high. O what consolation is there in such thoughts as these! Under their influence, severe as may be our bereavement, who can mourn as those who have no hope? Such truths are the balm which is given by a merciful God, to heal the deepest wounds made in the bereaved heart.

The event which claims our attention this afternoon, seems to have lessons peculiar to the different classes and relations of us here present. The death of this sister seems to speak in an emphatic manner to the husband, brothers, and sisters, and all the connections; to the members of our religious society, and particularly to the female portion of it; and the community at large. And I may be allowed to present these teachings in the form of a personal address to each.

TO THE HUSBAND: My beloved brother, what can I, what shall I say to you? The Lord hath indeed come very near you. He hath taken your companion in her youth, and left you with two pledges of your affection, deprived of a mother's care, they so much need. A companion is taken from you, whose worth you well know, and whose loss you are yet more deeply to feel. Your home is left desolate, and new cares and duties are imposed upon you. You have no longer one with whom to share the cares and responsibilities of your domestic duties. Ah! there is a melancholy blank at your fireside, that is painful to us all. We feel your loss and tender you our sympathies and prayers. This is all we can do. How soon we may be called to experience a like fate, no one can tell; and then we in our turn shall need your sympathy, which you will well understand how to give. But while you mourn your bereavement, you know what you have lost, your companion has gained. Happier is her peaceful state in that bright world where she hath gone, than in this world of peril and sin. 'She is not dead, but sleepeth.' Let this consideration be a healing balm to your wounded spirit, and a source of comfort in your solitude. You have much to comfort you beside this. The remembrance of her many virtues, and the spirit with which she fell asleep. She was the guardian spirit of her family, a faithful wife and a devoted mother. You can remember the days you have been permitted to spend together, with but little except unmingled pleasure. And then the close of her life—it was that of the righteous. She did not leave this world with shuddering dread and horror, or reluctance; but she went with a willing spirit. She fell sweetly asleep. O there is something exceedingly soothing to the spirit, when our friends are called away, to see them go in peace and hope, and with a willing spirit. And when we add to this the belief that they have gone to a better world, how much we have to cheer and comfort us, under our bereavement and sorrow! Well may you bow with resignation to what God has been pleased to cause you to suffer, with so much that is consoling connected with it. But I need not press this matter, for I know, although deep is the wound inflicted on your spirit, you will not mourn as those who have no hope. But while you have consolation in your sorrow, this event has lessons of wisdom to teach. It tells you of the uncertainty of life and earthly sources of enjoyment, and of the importance of being prepared for trouble and sorrow. It also points you to new duties. Look on those children, deprived of a mother's counsel and care. It is to you alone they are now committed. Great and responsible is the charge. And let me charge you to, as I know you will, perform that duty in the fear of God. Train them up in the nurture and the admonition of the Lord. I feel, my dear brother, deeply to sympathize with you in this matter, for I have lived in apprehension of having a like charge imposed upon myself. And it is my prayer that God may give you wisdom to enable you to discharge this great duty aright, and me too, should such be my melancholy fate.

TO THE BROTHERS AND SISTERS: You have been called to part with a sister to whom you were tenderly attached, and here you must take your leave of that form in which was treasured up an excellent spirit. Ah, how has that form changed since it was last here before! Scarce one vestige remains of what it once was. The destroyer has done his work but too well, and it now becomes our melancholy duty to deposite it in its place of rest. But blessed be God, we perform this last office in hope. 'She is not dead, but sleepeth.' Let this hope comfort your hearts, my beloved friends. While you mourn over your bereavement, I know you do not mourn as those who have no hope. And while you have hope and comfort, through that glorious faith it is our privilege to possess, let this event of divine Providence speak lessons of wisdom to your hearts. Let it suitably impress your minds with a realizing sense of human frailty, so as to stimulate you to earnest endeavors to faithfully perform all your duties. Let it lead you to emulate the many virtues of your departed sister. Remember that you and I have but a short time to tarry here at the longest, and let it stimulate you to labor to be of benefit to mankind. Let not the few days allotted to you on earth be wasted in idleness, or in misdirected labors and efforts; but let them be zealous and well directed. Especially remember your duties to the religion of Christ, as we understand that religion, of which your departed sister, in common with yourselves, was a professor. And I may add a consistent professor, an unwavering friend and supporter. Her example in this respect, as well as others, is worthy of imitation from you all, and let not its influence be lost upon you. It will be a happy consideration to you, when you come to the close of life, to feel that you can say with the apostle—'I have fought the good fight, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the righteous Judge shall give me.' But this cannot be the case unless you earnestly devote yourself to the practice of duty and faithfully adhere to what you regard truth. Then when God calls, you will go away in peace—you will fall sweetly to sleep, and go to meet your beloved sister who has gone home but little before us all.

The same reflections would I commend to all the connections and friends, for their comfort and instruction. Let this event speak words of wisdom to all your hearts, and serve to inspire you all with that charity which abideth forever. You have lost a valued one from your circle, and let it speak to you, saying, 'be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not of, the son of man cometh.' Let your minds and hearts be filled with that grace of God which bringeth salvation to a lost world; for it is by grace ye are saved, not of works. Trust not in your own goodness—your irreproachable character to find you admittance into heaven. Trust rather in God. For all our best deeds are mingled with imperfection and sin, and it is only in the pardoning love of God, that such sinful mortals as we are, can hope for salvation. All that we can do, is but hewing out to ourselves cisterns, broken cisterns which can hold no water from the wells of salvation. 'Hope then in God' alone, and have that faith which works by love and purifies the heart, founded on the redemption there is in Christ, and you are safe for time and eternity. You cannot be plucked out of his hands.

To those who usually worship in this house, I address myself: How often has the destroyer come among us! More than one half of us are now clothed in the habiliments of mourning, and thus it is constantly. One after another of our number is disappearing from our midst, and we are called to pay the last deed of respect to departed worth, and come to this temple of God for consolation. One seat after another is vacated in this house, and thus the work will go on until we have all passed away, and another generation succeeded; and indeed so long as its walls shall stand and these seats be occupied. And now another is gone, and we are here again as mourners. A seat, that has ever been constantly occupied since worship was established in this house, is now vacated to give place to another. May it be filled by one as faithful and true. This sister whose remains are before us, was one that was ever true to her principles, and gave her entire influence in favor of what she believed the truth, regardless alike of the smiles and frowns of friends and associates, and of fashion and popularity. She never wantonly neglected the house of God on the Sabbath. Let who else might be absent, I ever felt sure of meeting her here to join in the worship of God. But she has gone home to enjoy the fruition of those hopes she so fondly cherished here below, while we are left to mourn over her vacant place.

When I remarked on a similar occasion, whose turn it would next come to take their place among the dead the Lord only knew, little did I think the shaft would fall where it has. Little did I then think I should ever be called to stand over the mortal remains of the one before us, wrapped in the dread and mysterious slumbers of death; much less did I think the time so near at hand. And whose turn shall it be next to leave us? The Lord only knoweth. It may be one we should the least suspect. Let us all then, endeavor to be ready, for it matters very little who is next called, if so be that they are ready. And this uncertainty, so forcibly illustrated in the instance before us, should admonish us faithfully to endeavor to do our duty in life; to be true to the great cause of religious truth, as was our beloved sister, in all our ways; to steadfastly adhere to what we believe truth, through both good and evil report; and never wantonly neglect the house of worship on the Sabbath.

This event seems especially to admonish the female part of the worshipers here. A strange mortality seems to prevail among their sex. How large a portion of the deaths among us and in our community are from among our wives, mothers and sisters! All the vacant seats here, are made by the removal of the female members of our congregation. Shall not this admonish you in an especial manner, to be also ready? And shall it not stimulate you to a new and deeper interest in the great cause of religious truth? Shall it not stimulate you to renewed diligence, to promote the interests of what you believe the truth? But a short time may be allotted you to contribute to this cause. O then, let me beg of you to consider well your duties and do them, ever forgetting self and all selfish considerations. Let not the example of devotion, given in the life of our departed sister, and faithfulness, be lost upon you. But as you see one after another of your number pass away, may it serve to arouse you to new zeal and energy, and thus make you all blessings to the cause of Christ. We are all bereaved. We have met with a serious loss in the death of this sister, and may you endeavor to compensate for it, in as far as you are able, by your renewed industry and zeal, in behalf of the truth of heaven.

But it is not only the bereaved husband, brothers and sisters, connections and friends and our religious society that have suffered loss in the death of this sister. She is a loss to the social circle—the community. And her life and her death have words of instruction and admonition for this whole congregation and community. They tell us all of the uncertainty of life, and the importance of being constantly prepared to meet death ourselves or part with our companions and friends. And what shall prepare us to die or be bereaved but faith in God? We are all sinners. We have no excellence of our own to recommend us to God. If we place our hopes in the goodness and mercy of God alone, we shall have them founded on the rock, and the winds may blow, and the storms of earth may beat upon us, but we shall remain unmoved and unshaken, and lay down at last, and fall into sweet slumbers.

'THOU SHALT HAVE NO OTHER GODS BEFORE ME.'*

BY MRS. L. J. B. CASE.

MORN slowly broke on Sinai—not as erst
With bright, soft gleam upon the desert sands,
Sprinkling the waste with gold, but with a pomp
Of fearful grandeur. Lurid lightnings flashed,
And thunder rolled along the awe-struck air.
The earth was hushed, and still. The very-leaves
Of the scant herbage on the mountain side
Were stirless as with fear, and nature owned
A nameless, powerful thrill unfelt before.
A cloud lay on the mount, and from its folds
There rang a trumpet-tone, and the camp woke
And trembled. Then the fearful lightnings gleamed
More fearfully—and louder rose the peal
Of the loud thunder, and the assembled hosts
Went forth to meet their God. They saw the smoke—
For he had come in flame—they heard the tramp
Sound long and loud until the mountain quaked
In his dread presence, and from out the gloom
Came forth a voice, and they were faint with fear.
What said that voice? What was the first command
Jehovah spake amid such awful signs?
'Before ME thou shalt have no other gods!
Thou shalt not make an idol!'

Did they heed
The high command? No. Ere the cloud forsook
Their tent, the fiery pillar from their path

* Exodus xx. 3.

Had faded, they had reared an idol-shrine
And bowed in the vain worship.

Ever thus
Doth man lose sight of heaven, and rear a god
Of his own workmanship, and bend the knee
In his idolatry, until the fire
Goes out upon the altar, and a hand
He hath forgotten hurls the image down,
And dashes it to dust, and then he learns
It is but of the earth, and turns to heaven,

There is a mother—she is holding fast
A tiny hand in hers, and bending low
To catch each lisping word, and watch each smile
That speaks of growing intellect. Her eye
Sees nought but that young, cherub face, her heart
Looks but to him for all it knows of heaven.
Mother! fond mother, pause! A serpent's tongue
May lie in those soft lips, and future years
May see it sting thy spirit to its core;
Or thou shalt call, and call for one kind word,
One tone of fond affection, and the grave
Shall give thee answer—Thou dost worship clay!

And thou, fair girl, in thy dark eyes lie tales
Of thy heart-secrets—dreams, bright, lovely dreams,—
Yet all delusion; and soft shadows sleep
Within their speaking depths, and what say they?
What saith the changing cheek, and trembling frame
Shrinking from one lone thought? That in thy heart
Is reared an idol-shrine, and all thy hopes,
Thy thoughts, affections, ay, thy life of life
Are laid thereon. Turn, fruitless worshipper
Of a frail idol, turn to God ere yet
The altar fall, and thy poor, bleeding heart
Lie crushed beneath its ruins; turn to heaven!

The clarion sounds—the tramp of fiery steeds,
And war-clad men is near. A glancing plume
Waves o'er a noble brow, an eagle eye;
High in the distance Glory lifts her shrine,
And calls her worshippers, and in the van Rushes a manly form. That noble brow
Rests where the birds of prey are wheeling low,
And sleep that never more shall pass hath sealed
That eagle eye.

So the pale student bends
O'er the dim page of ancient lore, to wring
From sleepless toil the blessing of a name.
It comes, but the long-sought within his grasp
Hath turned to ashes.

In yon cob-webbed room
Pale Avarice leans above the figured page
That tells his millions. Not a weeping eye
Grows bright at his approach, and not a pang
Of human suffering ever was made less
From his full coffers. See, his haggard looks Tell that his god hath turned a cold, deaf ear
Upon his worship.

Ever thus, in vain,
Shall idol-homage end. Our Father wills

The creatures of his hand shall bow their souls
To nought but Him, shall rear no earthly shrine,
Or desolation of the heart shall fall
Upon that worship. Stern Iconoclasts
Shall come, and then, amidst the mournful wreck,
The poor, mistaken worshipper shall lift
The tearful eye, and sinking soul to Him,
Who said on Sinai's terror-smitten brow,
'Thou shalt not bow to other gods than Me!'
Portland, Me.

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF WOMAN'S LIFE. NO. III.

BY CHARLOTTE.

CAROLINE.

'AND then her face, so lovely, yet so arch,—
It haunts me still, though many years have fled,
Like some wild melody.'

I.

I WOULD fain ask your attention, dear reader, to a few passages from the romance of real life—a few inklings in the history of Caroline Temple, my early and well-beloved friend. Our acquaintance commenced at school, and during the years we remained there our friendship became closely cemented. Of her family, in those days, I knew little, save that her father was an idle, dissipated man, who harassed and abused his wife, and was indifferent and cross to his child; while her mother, a heart-sick, weary woman, wrought early and late, and feeble as she was, by her own single exertions maintained her family. Caroline was her idol, and I believe had she consulted her own wishes alone, she would never have allowed her to leave her side; but she shrunk from exposing her child to the contamination of her father's presence and example; she trembled lest her pure ear should catch the sound of his blasphemous language, or her young eye be blasted with the sight of his beastliness, and she did not refuse her consent when I used to plead for Caroline's company during many hours when we were free from school. Our intimacy continued unbroken till we were nearly sixteen, when my parents removed from the city and for a considerable lapse of time I heard nothing of her till the news of her marriage reached me. But I am anticipating my story.

It was a cold, dreary evening in the winter of 183—, and the noisy northeast wind rattled the loose sashes of the windows in an old, rickety building, which sharing the fate of many similar domicils, has long since ceased to mar the beauty of our goodly city. The house was situated in a dirty, narrow lane, and tenanted by several families, but it is with the inmates of a meanly furnished upper apartment, that we have now to do. On a cot bed in one corner of a miserable room, lay a pale, care worn woman, whose features wore an expression of intense anguish—can you wonder?—for many long, weary months had she lain there, a wretched victim, writhing beneath the scourge of that most terrible disease that flesh is heir to—a cancer! Her eyes were bent anxiously on a young maiden, who sat at a table drawn closely to the stove, busily sewing by the light of a small, ill-fed lamp, on one of those coarse garments by the manufacture of which, so many poor, lone females in our populous city, earn a scanty subsistence. The girl was apparently ill at ease, for though her eyes were bent upon her work, the tears stood upon her long lashes, her lip quivered, and her trembling fingers were scarcely able to guide the needle. She started and brushed the tears hastily from her eyes as the feeble voice of the invalid was heard;—‘Carry, dear, I cannot bear to see you plodding so at that tedious work, to gain such a miserable pittance, and even that, you say, is about to be stopped; it makes my heart ache to see you thus wasting your best days, toiling for and attending upon me. O could I but have seen the fulfilment of my wishes—could you have brought your mind to regard the subject in a different light, you would not thus be wearing out your health and energies.’

‘Do not urge me thus, I entreat you, dear mother; it grieves me to give you pain, but in this affair I cannot comply with your wishes. I am willing to toil, to suffer hardship and privation, but I should deem it little better than legal pollution to give my hand to a man whom I do not love.’

‘But think, Caroline, how desolate you will be, when I am gone; an orphan with neither brother, sister or any relative, able and willing to assist you. You are young too, and I fear not to say to you, very beautiful; dangerous gifts, these, to a poor and unfriended girl—God grant that they may never lead you into trial or temptation! I cannot conceive the reason of your dislike to George Wilson. True, he is not rich, if he were, I should be less forward in urging this matter; but I am told by those who know him, that he is an industrious, enterprising young man, and an excellent workman, and industry and application cannot fail to ensure him success. And then you allow him his full quota of good looks and agreeableness; neither do you deny him a large share of intellectuality and talent, and you must know, Caroline, for it does not require a very acute eye to detect it, that he is ardently and passionately attached to you; he is kind and gentle, frank and generous, and if you do not love him now, you will soon learn to do so.’

‘I have little faith, dear mother, in the theory of “Love after marriage,” and I can conceive nothing, more dreadful than to be condemned to pass my life in the society of a man whom I do not love. I am sure no fetters could be so galling.’

‘There is a far worse bondage, Caroline, that of a true hearted loving woman linked by the closest ties to a worthless and brutal husband! From such a fate I would save you by bestowing you on one who will tenderly cherish you; my beloved child, the dearest wish of my heart, is to see you the wife of George Wilson.’

‘Mother, dear mother, spare yourself, and me; you are exhausted with talking so long and earnestly—I will adjust your pillows, and then you must rest awhile.’

‘Caroline, I cannot rest—night and day, sleeping or waking, my thoughts are constantly dwelling on your future destiny. Come nearer to me, dearest, sit here, so that I can see and feel that you are near, and listen to a short and simple record of my experience. I was the only girl in a family of seven children, and was constantly the pet and favorite of the whole. My parents were not richly gifted with this world’s goods, but they were frugal and prudent, and contrived to save from their limited income sufficient to afford their children the best educations. Of my six brothers, three chose a collegiate course and professions, one pushed his fortunes in the far West, another entered the mercantile line, and the youngest became a hardy, daring sailor, while I remained at home, the companion of my mother and the darling of both parents. As I grew to womanhood, I acquired the fame of a beauty, and this reputation soon drew around me a crowd of suitors and admirers. I was alike indifferent to all, but I was not long in perceiving that my family encouraged the attentions of a college friend of my oldest brother, who was a frequent visitor at the house. It was then and has always been matter of wonder to me, that the highly educated and gifted Alick Hervey, should ever have dreamed of loving, still less of marrying the simple, bashful and little accomplished girl, who looked up to him with awe and reverence as to some “bright, particular star,” respecting and fearing him, but never daring to love him. But so it was. For many months he paid me the most unwearying and exclusive yet delicate attentions, which I had neither courage nor self-confidence to repel, till he poured into my ear the declaration of his attachment. Then I was compelled to nerve myself, and with trembling words I acknowledged my inferiority to him, and the utter impossibility of my ever returning his affection. I shall never forget the look he cast upon me, as without uttering a word he snatched up his hat and rushed from the house.

‘At our next meeting, my timid salutation was returned with cold formal courtesy, and when I saw him again, a dark eyed girl was leaning on his arm, whom in measured terms he introduced to me as his wife. I had prepared myself to meet with composure the reproaches of my father and the tender entreaties of my mother, but to my surprise they never mentioned Hervey’s name, and all my efforts to draw it into our conversation were unsuccessful. Previous to this time perfect confidence had subsisted between my parents and myself, and the want of it sensibly affected me; and one day during a short tete-a-tete interview with my mother I abruptly informed her of Alick's proposals and my rejection of them. 'I know it all, Sophy,' she replied, 'and Alick Hervey is the man of all others to whom we could have wished to see you united; we have sacrificed our hopes to your fancied ideas of love and happiness, but alas! my child, I fear you will one day bitterly rue it.' A few months after Alick Hervey's marriage, I became acquainted with William Temple, a clerk in one of the principal banks of the city. He was a handsome man, of fashionable address and insinuating manners; he exerted his powers of pleasing to the utmost, and I who had carelessly spurned the homage of the high-souled and gifted Hervey, yielded my heart to the gay and thoughtless Temple. My parents instantly and decidedly refused their consent, representing that he had been a wild, dissolute young man, and urging that an undutiful son must make a bad husband. 'We yielded to your wishes, Sophy,' they said, 'in regard to young Hervey, and surely some sacrifice is now due on your part toward us, for we will never give our sanction to your marriage with this man.' Wisely and well did they counsel me, but their words fell on ears that refused to listen, and vanished into thin air before the delusive sophistry of William Temple, and in an evil hour, unblest with the presence or consent of my parents, I became his wife, and an outcast from my early home. My father swore never to forgive me, and my mother refused to see me, yet for one year I was happy, and fancied that no retribution was in store for my wilful disobedience. But it came at length. Your birth, Caroline, was succeeded by a dangerous and protracted illness; during that time I saw little of William, and when after three months of sickness and suffering I left my chamber, it was to learn that my husband was fast becoming a drunkard and a gamester. He was discharged from his situation in the bank, and poverty was added to our other evils; and as if to cap the climax of my distress, my parents died—my father without one word of forgiveness, and my mother without mentioning the name of her disobedient child. For seventeen years the curse lay heavy on my soul, yet for your sake, my child, I bore up under it; I toiled night and day, I endured privations of every kind—I watched, wept, and prayed for you. Such, Caroline, has been the result of my love-match. I have lived to look with regret and envy on the bliss of Alick Hervey and his wife—happiness which might have been mine, but for a foolish romantic whim; I have learned to look with almost loathing on the husband of my choice, the object of my early idolatry. But I need not tell you, Caroline, who have been my sole friend and companion during those long weary years, of the bitter words which have sunk deep into my heart, or the brutal treatment which has bowed and broken my spirit; you have seen and known it all, and it is from a destiny like this, I would save you; my sands are well nigh run, and I could die in peace, feeling that my errors were expiated and forgiven, could I see you wedded to a kind and honorable man.'

'Mother,' exclaimed the agitated girl, in a voice broken by sobs, 'I am neither wilful nor capricious—my only aim is to make you happy while you live, and for your sake I will marry George Wilson and ever try to love him. He will be kind and good to you, and that, at least, will render him dearer to me.'

When George paid his customary visit that evening, he perceived a difference in Caroline's manner towards him; something which could not be explained, but which, slight as it was, spoke volumes of hope and encouragement to the lover; and ere he left the house that night, he knelt with Caroline at her mother's bedside, and Mrs. Temple, clasping their united hands in her own, called down a fervent benediction upon them. Three weeks from that night, the same group, with the addition of one or two neighbors, were assembled in a neat, pleasant chamber in a house not far from their former residence; Mrs. Temple was propped up in bed, and opposite its foot stood George and Caroline before the man of God who was about to unite them in the holiest ties. If Caroline's cheek was paler than its wont that night, and her eye less bright than usual, none deemed that it had a deeper cause than her mother's precarious state. The solemn ceremony was soon over—the neighbors with simple congratulations departed, and Caroline knelt to receive her mother's blessing, a wedded wife.

II.

SOME three years after I heard of Caroline's marriage, I was again in the city, visiting some friends, and one evening, soon after my arrival, they insisted on my accompanying them to the theatre, to witness the performance of a new actress who was witching the hearts of the citizens. She was said to possess rare beauty and considerable dramatic knowledge and talent, and it was prophesied by many experienced play-goers and judges, that she would ere long become a star of the first magnitude. On our way to the theatre my companions could neither think nor speak of anything but 'the Woodford'—the superb, the charming, the unrivalled; and when I took my seat in the box, my imagination was fairly excited. The play was Romeo and Juliet, and O how impatiently I waited for the third scene, which was to introduce the Veronese maiden. I had changed my position for a moment, to speak to an acquaintance, when a long, deafening shout of applause rang through the house; I turned to the stage—my eyes rested on the form of the actress, and starting from my seat, I had well nigh uttered the name of—'CAROLINE!' I could not be mistaken; five years had gone by since last I looked upon that face, but its lineaments were too deeply impressed on my mind ever to be forgotten. Time had changed her too, but it had only rendered her more lovely; the figure which at fifteen had been too slender for its height, had now filled out superb and Juno-like, and from the full, graceful bust, rose the dazzling white throat in swan-like beauty; the rich chestnut hair with here and there a brighter shade, as if golden dust had been sprinkled among it, was simply braided and wrapped around the small, classic, and beautifully set head; the large liquid eyes shone like stars through a veil of blue, and I wondered not at the wild excitement of the audience when this vision of loveliness burst upon their sight. During the remainder of the evening, I sat like one spell-bound—the other performers were all unheeded—my eye was riveted to Caroline's face, my ear drank in only the melodious tones of her voice. The play ended, but my thoughts still followed her, and I was only roused from my abstraction by the merry voice of one of my companions, exclaiming—'How now, are you dreaming, coz, or has the fair Juliet turned your head, and led your senses captive? Come, are you ready?'

On the way home the conversation naturally turned upon the actress, and I eagerly sought to obtain some information concerning her.

'Is she not beautiful?' said my eldest cousin; 'and then the mystery which hangs over her, renders her even more attractive to many people. Nothing certain is known of her former history; some say that she is the natural daughter of a late celebrated actor, while others affirm that young as she is, she has been a wife and mother; that misconduct on her husband's part, has separated them, and that her child is consigned to some friends of her own; and there are a few, even, who declare she is a native of this city, and was a schoolmate of their own.'

I retired to rest, but my slumbers were disturbed and broken; my thoughts were still with the beautiful actress. Well did I remember Caroline's passion for the drama, and the eagerness with which she seized upon a copy of Shakspeare; and yet I could not conceive by what combination of circumstances the delicate and shrinking Caroline had been induced to forego the timidity of her girlhood and expose herself to the admiring gaze of that vast multitude; and I at length sank to sleep with the determination to seek her out in the morning, and learn from her own lips all that had befallen her since we parted.—I set out at an early hour and bent my steps towards the street in which I had been told she resided. On reaching the house I inquired for Miss Woodford, which was the title she bore in her new vocation, and was informed that she did not receive visitors, but on sending up my name, the girl returned to conduct me to her room, and in another moment Caroline was weeping on my shoulder. I need not detail the incidents preliminary to the recital of her story.

'I cannot tell you, dear C.,' she said, 'how rejoiced I am to look once more on the face of a friend, to whom I can confide my griefs, and hope to meet with kindness and sympathy. Sorrow has dogged my footsteps since I saw you last; poverty, disgrace and death have each added their quota to the contents of my cup, and I have drained it to the dregs. You say you heard of my marriage with George Wilson, but you probably did not hear that I had wedded a man I did not love, to save a sick and dying mother from starvation—you did not know all the consequences that have resulted from that ill-omened union. For several months after my marriage all went on smoothly, and I was content, if not happy. But then came the terrible pressure of the winter of 183—, which no one, I fancy, who felt it, will ever forget, and among hundreds of others, George was thrown out of employment; he sought diligently everywhere for work, and was willing to undertake any office, but his efforts were unsuccessful, and then it was, amid poverty and privation that the tide of my affections turned, and I began to love him for his very misfortunes. But in the midst of this darkness, a ray of light at length broke. Mr. —, an actor of some note, with whom George was acquainted, knowing that he possessed considerable talent, engaged him to write a play for a benefit which he was to take in the course of the season, and promised him a handsome remuneration. George set about the task with avidity, night and day he was at work, while I alternately read and copied his rough manuscript; but just as the play was completed, Mr. — was taken suddenly and alarmingly ill, and even when he recovered, his physicians said it would be long ere he was able to resume his professional pursuits. Thus was the labor of many long weeks thrown away, and it was now mid-winter; the weather was bitter and inclement, and our fuel was well nigh spent—debts had been necessarily incurred during the progress of the useless work, and to add to our distress, my mother now craved food and delicacies which we were unable to procure, while my own health was very delicate, requiring constant care and nursing. George was well nigh distracted; I endeavored to impart comfort, but felt how vain it was, when I looked on the desolation and poverty which surrounded us. At length, when our misery seemed to have reached its climax, George one day returned home with a large sum of money, which in reply to my anxious inquiries, he stated to have been obtained from the actor to the non-fulfillment of whose promise, was owing the extremity to which we were reduced. Our debts were now paid, and we were again surrounded by every comfort; this sum was soon expended, another was obtained from the same source, and when the second supply was nearly exhausted, George left us for a day, as he said, to replenish his purse. On the afternoon of the day he was expected to return, my mother had sunk into a profound slumber, and I was sitting by a window watching for his appearance, when a woman who occupied a part of the house, informed me that a person wished to speak with me. I obeyed the summons, and was met in the entry by a cold, stern-looking old man, from whose presence I involuntarily shrunk as from the bearer of evil news. The harshness of his looks gradually gave way as he gazed on me, to a pitying expression, and filled with apprehensions I earnestly demanded to know his business with me.

'Are you prepared to hear unpleasant tidings?' he said, 'for such, if you be the wife of George Wilson, I have to communicate, and it is at his request I come.'

'Go on'—was all I had power to utter, and the tale was soon told. George had been arrested for forgery, and was in prison. Two notes had been paid at different banks, and thence had been derived his lavish supplies of money; but on presenting a third the day previous, the fraud had been detected, and he was instantly committed for trial. I remember nothing that followed this announcement, till I found myself lying on a sofa in the apartment of Mrs. White, the woman to whom I have before alluded; she was chafing my temples, while the bearer of that fearful message stood beside me, anxiously regarding my face. I determined of course to go immediately to George, and requesting Mrs. White to sit with my mother awhile, and on no account to let a word of what had happened reach her, I accompanied the officer to the prison. Words are inadequate to describe that meeting! George could give me no consolation, for he could not deny the truth of the charge, and it was to save me from want and care that he had done it. During the period that intervened between his arrest and his sentence, I visited him daily, and strove amid my own bitterness of spirit to cheer and comfort him. But that day came at length—his doom was pronounced and my husband was consigned to ten weary years' confinement in the State Prison! I saw him but for a few moments before he was borne to his fearful abode, but oh, the sufferings of years were concentrated in that brief space! and when I returned worse than widowed to my home, it was but to look on another scene of distress. During my absence a neighbor had called to see my mother, and supposing her to be acquainted with what had happened, began speaking of and reprobated George in no measured terms. My mother listened in horror-struck silence, and when the woman repeated the doom which had been pronounced, she went into strong convulsions. In this state I found her on my return, and it was with the greatest difficulty we could keep her from springing from the bed and falling at my feet. 'Oh, Caroline, you can never forgive me'—she wildly exclaimed, as I took her hand, 'it was I who persuaded you to become his wife, though God knows I thought I was securing your happiness thereby.' I entreated her to be calm—I assured her that no blame attached to her, and that she needed no forgiveness from me; but the shock had been too great, and ere another morning dawned I was an orphan. The sale of our furniture enabled me to pay all necessary expenses, and then I removed to the house of a poor but worthy woman who had been kind to us in our misfortunes; and there, in the midst of poverty and tears I gave birth to a daughter, the heiress of her father's disgrace and her mother's sorrow. How often as I lay on that bed of sickness did I pray that I might never rise from it again! but it was not so to be; I recovered rapidly, but I was unable to afford the natural nourishment to my little Sophia, (for so had I named her in memory of my dead mother.) The physician said that unless she was placed at nurse I must lose her, and she was accordingly consigned to the care of a healthy woman a few miles from the city, who had lost an infant of the same age. This of course greatly increased my expenses, and I was obliged to toil unremittingly, snatching only an hour now and then to visit my child; but the most untiring industry would not enable me to meet my exigencies, and at the expiration of a year I found myself burthened with a heavy debt, which I had no possible means of liquidating. I was sitting alone in my little attic one afternoon, busily engaged in finishing a piece of work which I had promised, and musing on the events of the past and present, when a knock at my door announced a visitor and rising to open it, I admitted a fine looking and richly dressed woman. I supposed her errand to be concerning some work, but on asking her business, she replied that it regarded a very interesting subject, and she went on to say, that she was the wife of a lawyer in a town not far distant; she was wealthy and prosperous, but unblest with children, and this was to her a source of unfeigned regret. She had been visiting for several weeks in the village where my babe was at nurse, and had frequently seen it; its beauty and winning ways had drawn her attention, and she said she had learned to love the little creature almost as if it were her own. A friend of hers had told her much of my history and embarrassments, and her present business was to offer me a method of relieving them. Her proposal was, to adopt my little Sophia as her own, to bring her up according to her own plans and in total ignorance of her real parents. I was to renounce all claims upon the infant, and never to see her after her adoption, and in return they would clear my debts and give me such a sum as I required. A fortnight was given me for reflection, and laying her card on the table beside me, the lady departed. It were in vain for me to attempt a description of my sufferings during that time; on the one hand my very love for my Sophia urged me to place her where she would receive advantages that I could never bestow, and become the heiress to a fortune which would exempt her in all probability from the misfortunes which had fallen to my lot; and then when I saw her again, and her soft arms were twined around my neck, I felt as if it were impossible to separate myself from her. But at length my desire to promote her interests triumphed over every selfish motive; the die was cast, she was mine no longer on earth. Oh years may pass away and sear every other feeling and emotion in my heart, but they will never erase the memory of that hour, when I signed the contract which gave my first born, my only child, to the love and the embraces of a stranger! I have never looked upon her since, but her image is ever before me, and my only hope is that I shall one day meet her again—that in the world above I shall clasp her to my bosom, my own once more and forever! When that excitement was over, I sank into a kind of stupor, from which nothing had power to rouse me; I became listless and misanthropic, and I know not to what state I might have been reduced, but for the arrival of a letter from Mr. — the actor. He had become manager of a popular theatre, and having heard of my circumstances, and knowing my love for the drama, he made a proposition to me to join his stage company. At first I felt too apathetic to give much attention to the subject; but I took Shakspeare from his dusty nook and began to read; as I went on, all my former taste seemed to return, and before night I had written to accept Mr. —s offer. In a month from that time I made my debut; it was eminently successful, and my star still remains in the ascendant. Many have asked me why I did not choose some other occupation, but I would not exchange it for any other. At the commencement of my career I felt unpleasantly at exposing myself to the public gaze, but I have now grown accustomed to it. I rejoice in the joys of the fictitious personages whom I represent, and in depicting their sorrows for a time forget my own, so you see I am now in the best sphere in which I could possibly move.

Thus ended Caroline's narrative. I visited her daily during my stay in the city, and when we parted she promised to write to me, and for a long time the correspondence was continued; then it stopped, and all knowledge of her whereabouts was again suspended.

III.

I NEVER saw Caroline again, but from a mutual friend who accidentally found her out and was with her in her last days, I heard the remnant of her sad history. For several years after I last saw her, she continued the ornament of her profession, when suddenly she renounced a lucrative engagement and departed none knew whither, and when next she was heard of, the beautiful, brilliant and gifted Caroline was the inmate of a mad house. Horror struck by the fearful dispensation, her friends hastened to see her; the physicians pronounced her case incurable, but after several months of incessant ravings, of which her child was the constant subject, by degrees her reason returned. Her constitution however was completely destroyed, and after a brief season of suffering, her earthly career ended. A short time before her death she communicated to the friend who was with her, the circumstances which had led to her insanity, withholding only the name of the family with whom Sophia was placed, as she had sworn to do so. From the time she resigned her child, it had never ceased to haunt her mind, and at length her feelings were wrought to such a pitch, that she determined at all hazards to see it once more. Accordingly she gave up her dramatic engagements, and set out for the village where the child resided, and proceeding to the house, requested an interview with the mistress. The lady pretended not to recognize her, and Caroline's earnest and touching entreaties that she might be permitted to look once more upon her darling, were coldly and harshly refused. But while she sat there, a gay, childish voice was heard, and the little Sophia came bounding into the room. With a cry of joy Caroline started to her feet, and the child with a glance at her sweet face, stole timidly towards her; when rudely snatching her away, the unfeeling woman rushed from the apartment, leaving the poor mother half fainting and unable to follow her. With trembling steps she left the house, and returned to the inn; through the live long day she sat brooding over the repulse of the morning, and when the evening approached, she stole out, and having climbed the little fence at the back of the house which contained her child, she succeeded in entering by means of an open window in the hall. She had ascertained in which room the little one slept, a small bed-room adjoining the apartment of her adopted parents, and softly opening the door, in a moment she was at its side. The child was sleeping calmly, and she leaned over it for a few moments with the most intense love; but she dared not trust herself there long, and fearful of awakening the watchful guardians in the adjoining room, she clasped a small bracelet made of her own hair, and bearing her initials on the clasp, around the little plump arm which lay outside the counterpane, and pressing her lips to its dimpled cheek, she departed as she came. The next morning the bracelet was returned accompanied by a note charging Caroline with a violation of the contract, and filled with bitter threats in case she ever entered their dwelling again. A line from her, they stated, would at any time bring her in return a full account of the health and well-being of the little one, but she would not be permitted to see her again.

In the afternoon of the same day, Caroline was walking slowly past the lane leading to the house that held her darling, and casting mournfully wistful looks towards it, when she espied the little Sophia playing beneath a tree. By an irresistible impulse she went forward and stretched out her arms to the child, but instead of meeting her embrace as on the previous day, the child shrank back, exclaiming, 'I must not come near you; my mother says you are a bold, bad woman, and I must not love you or speak to you again,'—and she darted back to the house, while Caroline retraced her steps to the inn, and threw herself upon the floor. There she was found by the inmates, uttering incoherent words, and staring wildly round; and the terrified people sent for the physician and minister. They came, but their presence was unavailing; her ravings increased, and ere the close of the third day she was placed in the Lunatic Asylum.

The friend who told me these particulars, said that during Caroline's last illness her child was never absent from her mind; even in her sleep she would start and exclaim, 'My child! give me back my child!' And its name was the last word that past her lips ere death sealed them forever. Poor Caroline! with all her glorious beauty and rare gifts, with all her heart-aches and misfortunes, she sleeps in peace beside the mother, the intensity of whose love for her caused her misery.

Dear reader, should this tale seem to you too sad, too dark a 'Shadow,' remember it is no fiction, but a passage from the records of real life, and a true, though imperfect sketch, of one whose memory is enshrined in many loving hearts.

ELEGIATIC STANZAS,

On the Death of SUSAN S. TURNER, who died February 2, 1842, aged 4 years and 9 months.

SHE hath gone, she hath gone, from the earth far away,
Like the clear, holy light of the fading day;
With a pure young heart, and a sinless breast,
She hath laid herself down to the silent rest.

A bright ray of sunshine, she gladdened our hearts,
And poured forth the love which pure childhood imparts;
Peace dwelt in her soul, and it beamed in her eye,
And we deemed her a cherub that never could die.

Our Father, who loved her, hath taken her home,
Where pain, and where sickness can never more come;
The glory of Heaven beams over her brow,
She seeth her Father and loveth him now.

We joy in our faith, and we never can mourn
As though from our hearts our joy was all gone!
But with firmest assurance, hope triumphs above,
We think of our Savior, remember his love.

We know that our loved one from pain is at rest,
With God, her kind Father, she dwells and is blest;

And with peace in our souls we bow to the rod,
Look upward to Heaven and trust in our God.

GOLDEN FRUIT OF TEACHING.

A SABBATH School teacher, who had long been devoted to the work of his Master, lay on the bed of death, and many gathered from time to time around him to show their love for him. On one occasion of the visiting of some of these friends, the name of Robert Morrison was mentioned and his wonderful labors for the spread of the Scriptures were talked of. The dying teacher seemed to receive new animation by the mention of the name, and asked to have it repeated. It was repeated, and he eagerly added, 'Yes, yes, he was once my scholar in the Sabbath School.' A few questions asked and answered satisfied the friends that the same person was referred to by the teacher and them, and they desired to know something about the acquaintance of the teacher with his pupil. The teacher replied, that one Sabbath as he was going to the school, he met some rude boys noisily playing in the street and stopped to speak to them. He prevailed on one to go with him, and his name was Robert Morrison. He found him a dull scholar at first, but by persevering kindness he made him interested in the studies of the school. His rudeness and dullness soon wore off, and he became an example to the school. Then was created a deep and strong desire for religious knowledge, which was fed and satisfied by the lessons he learned.

'And,' said a friend by the bed side, 'that desire never lost its intensity, and your labor of love first awakened the holy passion for religious knowledge, which has made him the great Chinese scholar and Missionary, the founder of a College and the author of the great Anglo-Chinese Dictionary, which has been well called a stupendous monument of human ingenuity, labor, and perseverance.'

That lad thus rescued from the evils of desecrating the Sabbath, became the first translator of the Scriptures into a language spoken by upwards of four hundred millions of the human race, and what a work was that! How sweet must have been the recollections of the teacher as he dwelt on the remembrances of his long continued and patient labors with his pupil Morrison, and what a rich reward was now added to the rich one he enjoyed while engaged in the holy task of instructing this scholar! What joy was thus added to his dying hour!

And what an example is here set for those who would become useful and respected in the world. They must remember that what a biographer hath said of him is true that 'excellence was with him, as with other great scholars who have equally proved their easy superiority to adverse circumstances, the simple and natural result of a strong determination to excel. A good memory and a lively sensibility to external impressions, are the only advantages we take him to have been at this period in possession of, besides the strength of resolution we have named. The last had its origin, as we have intimated, in a peculiar religious fervor, which though scarcely at that time so discreet in expression as it was always sincere and devout in feeling, yet animated him then, and to the latest moments of his life, with an unselfish desire to benefit his fellow creatures. Nothing can conquer a desire which originates in such a motive, and proposes as its object the acquisition of knowledge. The love of knowledge is, in itself, the attainment of knowledge. Poverty or toil discourage it in vain. It supplies the scarcity of time by the concentration of attention, and replaces comfort by self-denial. No man proved this better than the subject of this biography. No one ever proved more satisfactorily that the privileges and delights of intellectual cultivation depend upon the man himself, and not upon his external fortunes. The learned Dr. Morrison, surrounded by all the accommodations of study in his library and learned leisure at Canton, was not a more laborious or successful student than the last maker's apprentice, who stole his leisure from toil-purchased sleep in the poor workshop of Newcastle.

'Neglect not the gift that is in thee.' The excellences which are the products of cultivation, are far superior to any which are the mere bestowments of nature. Even genius is a flame on the altar, which if not fed, will, although lit from heaven, go out. We are priests of the mental temple to keep the fire burning.

A STRAY CHAPTER.

BY MISS M. A. DODD.

'Do you like it?'

THIS, do you like it? is quite a convenient phrase, or question; have you ever observed, dear reader, how often it is used? It seems to be a very quiet and harmless expression, taken by itself; but it may be employed to convey a variety of thought and meaning. It can express satisfaction, anger, joy, sorrow, exultation, humility, vanity; and many other moods and emotions. Now perhaps you will say, 'Well, I never thought those common words could be so differently construed; but if such is the fact, you will "please to illustrate."' I shall accordingly endeavor to prove my proposition.

I was dining the other day at the house of a friend, whose wife, by the way, is a pattern for housekeepers; one who seems to know by instinct just how everything should be done, and done too in the most quiet and least troublesome way; who has a place for everything and everything in its place; and time enough to perform all her various and complicated duties without bustle, or hurry, or worry; who never finds fault with her husband, or gives him occasion to find fault with her; and who never scolds her servants, for she does not keep any, preferring to labor with her own hands for those she loves, while the number of her family is small, and her health good. I was dining in this well regulated household, as I said before, and after the viands which made up the first course of a temperate and neatly ordered dinner had been duly discussed, a delicious pudding was brought on to crown the repast. My friend was not like some husbands, who never reward a wife with a word or look; the highest reward a loving woman asks for her efforts to administer to her liege lord's gratification; he disdained not to smile or speak his approbation, when his taste was pleased and satisfied. Accordingly the pudding was praised; and when she, whose fair and dexterous hands had prepared it, looked up in her husband's face and said, 'Do you like it?' I thought no other words could have expressed so much satisfaction.

'My dear, that was an elegant bonnet Mrs. M. had on in church to-day,' said Mr. C., to his jealous and touchy lady. This was an unfortunate remark; for Mrs. C. was just ready to foam over with envy of one whose 'head-piece' was so much more beautiful than her own; but husbands will sometimes be so indiscreet as to express thoughts and opinions which may raise a tempest. Mrs. C. did not rave, or pour forth a torrent of reproaches at his temerity in presuming to admire anybody's bonnet but her own, or his sinfulness in observing such vanities in the house of God. Some wives would not have allowed so good an opportunity for administering a reproof and a homily to pass unimproved; but Mrs. C. was a woman of few words, and her only reply to her husband's unlucky remark about the bonnet was, 'Do you like it?' But oh! the anger of her look and tone! I presume poor Mr. C. would rather it had oozed out at the palm of her hands in the shape of a smart box on the ear, than to know that so much wrath was kept bottled up to explode on some future occasion.

A young searcher after truth had carefully studied the gospel of Peace, and commenced proclaiming the word and promises of his Master. The hand of his father trembled, the eye of his mother was wet, and many kindly hearts beat with anxious sympathy, when his voice was first heard from the pulpit, defending and advocating the cause of the Redeemer. And there was one in that assemblage who listened to the speaker with heart oppressed almost to faintness, with downcast eye, and cheek a shade less bright than usual; for she had promised to share his fortune come weal or wo; and they but waited till his talents should be tested, and his course marked out, that they might fulfill their vows and tread their path together. She went not forward among his many friends, to greet the young evangelist when he descended from the desk; for a woman strives to veil her deeper feelings from the curious eye, and will sometimes appear cold and unconcerned, when her heart is brimming with affection and her eyes ready to overflow; but when they met in the home circle, where no restraint was needed, she praised and cheered and blessed him: then, happy tears fell on the eloquent discourse which they perused together; and more precious to his heart was one pearly drop from those loving eyes than the world's commendation. When she looked up from the paper, and praised it with words as well as tears, he said, 'Do you like it?' and that simple question seemed to contain the very essence of joy, joy in the approbation of the one beloved.

'O, Mr. Manly! I have just been reading such a beautiful book, so full of incident, and so interesting! I imagine that the hero looked just like you, tall, grave, and noble; but his character was not like yours; for he was a fascinating, naughty man.' A slight flush passed over Mr. Manly's countenance, as he listened to this frank compliment from a very young lady, much younger than himself, whose beauty and simplicity had awakened an interest, almost amounting to affection, in his heart. The lady had not mentioned the title of the book she praised; but a new novel, the morality of which had been questioned, lay on the table before her. Mr. Manly took it in his hand and said, 'Is this the work you were speaking of?' And when she answered in the affirmative, he added, 'and do you like it?' The youthful and inexperienced girl was struck by the tone of sorrow in which this question was conveyed; but she did not answer; for she felt that any reply would be needless, after the opinion she had at first expressed. She looked up with wonder at the grave countenance of her friend; and that friend felt, and regretted, that the purity of mind which he considered so essential to female excellence, might soon become sullied, if one so young was permitted to acquire a taste for books of such doubtful morality.

There was a prize to be won at the University by the writer of the best Latin poem, and an ambitious student had wasted the midnight oil in completing a classic and elegant composition. A dear friend and classmate was eagerly perusing it, while the anxious author crossed and recrossed the floor with nervous and rapid strides; for he depended much on the opinion of that friend, whether he should or should not indulge a hope to gain the reward. The reading is finished; the critic claps his hands in ecstasy and exclaims, 'Bravo! bravo! you will win! you will win!' A radiant smile lights up the face of the poet, as he replies, 'Do you think so? do you like it?' and oh, the exultation which that smile, that tone, and these words expressed; it seemed as though the walls of that little room had rung with an Io Pæan!

You may praise the discourse of an able and pious minister of the Gospel, who has labored long in his Master's vineyard, and he will reply, 'Do you like it?' with the humility of a heart which has put aside ambition, pride, and every idle passion; and which glories only in seeing truth triumphant, and humanity redeemed. But when you express your approbation of some young writer's production, see if you cannot discover affected humility in the way he says 'do you like it?' and when a pretty girl comes out in a new dress, which you tell her fits well, and is handsome; or a fine woman appears in a cap which you pronounce to be becoming, they will look at themselves in the glass, and say so sweetly, 'Do you like it?' and ten to one, the answer of your thought, if it does not pass your lips, will be vanity.

Now, dear reader, I think I have 'illustrated,' if not proved my proposition; but before I lay aside my pen, I must tell you that I have written all this, and some poetry beside, with Br. 'D. J. M.'s' patent ink. 'Do you like it!' exclaim a whole host of quill drivers. Pray, don't all speak at once, with such overpowering emphasis, and I will try to answer your question! It depends a good deal upon the reading community, whether I like it, or not; for if they are pleased with my scribblings, of course I shall praise the ink, and if they are not pleased, why then by the same reasoning the ink is to be condemned. But I advise all you ink-wasters, try it yourselves; for it came very near making a poet of one of our good ministers, and who knows but what it may guide some of you, whose souls are full of unwritten music, and unwritten rhyme, to the very foot of Castalia! I believe I have sufficiently tried your patience; so here endeth the stray chapter; do you like it?

THE HOMELESS.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

THE bird at night can seek its nest
Upon the greenwood tree;—
In vain I wander for my rest—
Earth has no home for me.

The wild fox has his still retreat
From traitorous footsteps free;—
But I can find no rest so sweet—
Earth has no home for me.

The stout old hollow oak invites
The slumbers of the bee—
But torrid days, or cold, dark nights,
Earth has no home for me.

When, Father, shall my wanderings cease?

Oh call me home to Thee!

In vain I seek for rest or peace—

Earth has no home for me.

HOSPITALITY.

A LEGEND.

THE wind swept cold and roaring over the plain, bowing the withered herbage, and driving before it the powdered snow; for it was mid-winter, and all without bore the badge of servitude to the monarch of the North. The traveller had carefully housed himself in the inn by the wayside. The rich man drew nearer to his bright coal fire, and the children of the poor huddled around the embers on the hearth, happy in finding even so poor a shelter. Desolate and drear was the plain, and for many hours not a traveller could be seen abroad. At length, slow and dubious, came an aged man, bowed with years, his worn garments fluttering in the wind, and folding his tattered cloak still closer to his wasted form, as the fierce wind raged around him. He was alone. No adventure-some wanderer crossed his path. Not even a beggar was exposed with him to the fury of the elements. Occasionally he would be completely hidden by the clouds of drifting snow, and then again he would emerge to view, tottering with the weight of years, and trembling with the cold. He passed the proud mansions by the wayside, not even casting a look at their portals. No tempting inn with its high swinging sign-board, could lure him from his comfortless path, but onward he went, regardless and unregarded.

Partly hidden from the wayfarer by a clump of bushes, now naked and glazed with ice, stood a miserable hovel, containing but one window, and through the crevices of which the wind freely rushed, while a bleak rock, on its northern side, appeared to be the only barrier that stood between it and absolute destruction, its frailty offering but little resistance to the blast.

Within this wretched tenement sat a youth whom penury had long claimed as her own. On his humble hearth a few faggots had been laid, but the light blaze was insufficient to conquer the chilly air of his single apartment; and as he leaned upon the small pine table, which was almost the only article of furniture he possessed, and gazed listlessly upon the only brown loaf that was left him, and which lay by his side upon the table, the air of utter hopelessness which he unconsciously assumed betokened the final consummation of his resources.

It was before this poor hut that the aged traveller halted. A moment decided him, and striding the dilapidated fence which lay in front of the lowly dwelling, he knocked with his staff against the door. The youth started up, and raising the latch, the aged stranger stood before him. The old man raised his head, as if he would address the disconsolate and lonely one; but before he had time to do so, the youth urged him to take shelter from the cold and driving snow. The old man entered, with a melancholy smile; and having seated himself by the waning fire, uncovered his venerable brow. Pining want and wasting care were written on every lineament of his countenance, while the shreds in which his bending form were enveloped, told a tale of poverty and friendliness, which induced the youthful host to say within himself, 'Thy necessity is even yet greater than mine!' Having raised his sunken eyes to the countenance of the young man, he told his tale of woe. It was the history of many. He had been reduced from a state of comparative wealth to that of absolute want, and those whom he had succored in the hour of his prosperity, had turned a deaf ear to his complaints when poverty, and age, and feebleness had placed him at their mercy.

The youth listened with kind interest to his story, and believed it all. He asked no insulting questions, and made no supercilious comments. The aged stranger then went on to say that he had applied at no other house for shelter, as he well knew that such application would have been vain. 'My poverty,' said he, 'would have been a sufficient reason, in their eyes, to treat me with disdain; and even if they doled out to me a scanty supply for my present wants, they would have added to it insulting remarks, and would have taken it for granted that my poverty was the result of misconduct. That is the comfortable plea which silences the rich man's conscience when he turns a cold eye upon the sufferings of his brother. He always says, 'I do not despise you because you are poor, but because your own imprudence has made you so.' The old man expressed himself with more energy than the host had expected from one of his apparent age and feebleness, and there was an air of superiority in his manner which seemed to denote that he had, indeed, seen better days.

The youth lost no time in asking him to partake of his brown loaf, and the stranger addressed himself to the task with such hearty good will, that the former soon beheld his last crumb taking its final exit for the benefit of his visitor. But he repined not. He only rejoiced that it had been in his power to succor one whose need must have been great, and who had doubtless endured much from absolute hunger. The sun went down, and now the youth offered the aged stranger the use of his humble pallet, while he stretched himself upon the hard floor of his uncomfortable tenement.

When they arose in the morning, the youth was obliged to announce to his visitor that he had nothing to offer him for a morning meal, and that his last faggot had been consumed on the preceding evening.

On the other hand, the storm without was hushed. The wind had been laid; and a bright warm sun was fast ascending the heavens. The old man prepared for his departure. He resumed his ragged cloak; grasped his staff, and bound his tattered shoes to his feet. The youth approached him to take his leave, and begged the old man's blessing. This was cheerfully accorded. The young man bowed his head, and the stranger laid his hand upon him, and blessed him aloud. The youth again raised his head—but what strange alteration now met his eyes! The rags began to fall away from the stranger's form—that bended and wrinkled body assumed the appearance of youth—the wrinkled cheek became ruddy with health—down his fair shoulders flowed long and golden locks—and the dim eyes now glowed with celestial radiance. Two glorious wings fringed with golden light, and spangled with the most splendid colors, gradually expanded themselves from his shoulders, and the withered old veteran had become transformed into a most glorious angel!

Overwhelmed with surprise and filled with awe, the youth knelt at the foot of the celestial visitant; when the latter immediately spread his wings and ascended silently from his view. The young man remained motionless for some time, and when his amazement had in some degree subsided, he felt a strange thrilling sensation in every part of his being, and a new life seemed to be imparted unto him. He had a resolution and energy to go forth and wrestle with fortune that he never knew before, and something within him seemed to promise him great success if he would venture forth into the busy world of the populous town. The spirit of a good deed was the impartor of a new life, and he did go forth, and he was successful. Fortune smiled beneficently upon him, and his life was happy. Ever did he remember the exhortation: 'Let brotherly love continue. Be not forgetful to entertain strangers; for thereby some have entertained angels unawares.'

THIRTY.

BY REV. JOHN G. ADAMS.

'Just thirty years old this day, good man;
Said my Genius to me this morning;
'Lest you had forgotten how fast you ran,
I thought I would give you warning.'

'Many thanks,' I replied, 'for your timely words,
My birth-day I always remember;
For it comes in full summer, with flowers and birds,
And not in the chills of December.'

And I hail this morning with right good cheer,
As lovely as any yet greeted;
May others be like it—if others appear—
Till life's little work is completed.

And pray, loving Genius, what word do you bring,
That I may be profited by it;
Should ye now condescend to be offering
Your advice—I will promise to try it.'

'Agreed,' replied Genius,—'My words are few;
Thank God for this life he has given,
And so live the future, that in its review
You are blest with the smiles of heaven.'

Do good—govern self—let affliction but move
Your spirit to higher attainments,
And know that earth's wisdom can never disprove
The justice of heaven's arraignments.

If sickness or death in your pathway appear,
Be armed with true courage to meet them,
Nor heed for one moment the prompting of fear,
While you have the Faith to defeat them.

If long life and sunshine are yours—then beware
That forgetfulness be not thy sin;
Give the soul unto watchfulness, thoughtfulness, prayer;
And life's double joy thou shalt win.

If thirty years hence we hold converse again,
May I find thee with Wisdom acquainted;
But if then thou art gone, may thy virtues remain
In affection's fond memory sainted.'

WISDOM AND KNOWLEDGE,

THE STABILITY OF GOOD TIMES.

BY REV. HENRY BACON.

ISAIAH XXXiii. 6: 'Wisdom and knowledge shall be the stability of thy times, and strength of salvation.'

'THE times is one of those common phrases which everybody uses and no one thinks of defining. We use it to signify the outward circumstances in which we are placed; and the times are easy or hard, peaceful or troublous, according as the events which are transpiring appear favorable to prosperity or adversity. 'The times' to one may seem altogether different than they do to another, when we consider simply our individual interests; but it was not to individuals that the prophet directed his promise. It was to a community, and as a community we know common interests and speak of 'the times' alike. We know and feel what we mean when we speak one to another of unstable times—of the fluctuations of affairs—and we need rather to dwell on what will change the phases of society, than on what is seen. The ear has heard, the eye has seen, and the anxious heart has felt, what words cannot repeat. We need guidance that we may rightly use what we have experienced, and be enabled to look up and take courage to hope on. The preacher therefore should not be what some preachers are in the house of mourning—a dweller on what of sorrow has been wrought and that cannot be reversed, causing the heart to bleed afresh, and the mind to renew its agony of thought. We need to think of the future, and how we may be wise unto hope and salvation. We need to humbly bow down, and in the fervency of contriteness, to ask of God to enlighten us, to acquaint us more with ourselves, with what is essential to a republican brotherhood, and how those evils may be averted which threaten to divide heart from heart, and veil the sunshine of affection which gave beauty to the countenance of a friend. We need more reverently to consult the oracles of God, and inquire how we may fulfill the prophet's words in reference to our own day and community: 'Wisdom and knowledge shall be the stability of thy times, and strength of salvation.'

Stability is a significant word. It speaks of a foundation and something permanent built thereon. When we know a man who acts from principles which we are sure are deeply infixed because of his adherence to them under various and testing circumstances, we say he has stability; we make dependence upon him; we believe the future will prove him to be what the past has shown him to be. When sometimes we are deceived in such persons or characters, we are apt to say that the very foundations of stability are broken up, and that we cannot have faith or strong confidence in man. But from this discouraging conclusion we soon free ourselves, and again apply ourselves to the re-awakening of hope and credit. So is it with our judgment of communities. When we see manifestations of adherence to righteous principles, we expect permanency will be given to all that is connected with real social progress, and great thoughts of good cheer us. But sad changes come over us as we witness the upbreking of all on which hope seemed to rest, and the in-rushing of passions that have ever been enemies to Truth and Righteousness. Then it is that we cry for help—for some hand to be stretched forth from the sky to point out the path to tranquility, and we wait to hear the renewal of the Advent chorus: 'Peace on earth, good will toward men!'

Where, where is the sign of hope? In what point of the heavens will the star of peace dawn? We need not look to signs in the heavens, for no star hath power to give the light we need. Astrology is dead. Christianity lives. Her voice echos the truth of ages—the truth of mind—'Wisdom and knowledge are stability, and strength of salvation.'

We ask for stability that shall accord with the divine principles of Right. Stability that shall be effected by respect—theoretical and practical respect—for the everlasting laws of Liberty, Equity, and Progress. Liberty, Equity, and Progress, have their laws; when society is pervaded with the spirit of willing obedience to them, stability is given to everything desirable and good. Where this respect is not, we build on slumbering volcanoes, forgetful of the fires that burn beneath, and the swaying to and fro of elements whose energies will in due time burst forth with tremendous and destructive power. In earth, as in heaven, all true stability is the product of Right revered and obeyed, patiently sought and wrought out.

This truth, everywhere recorded in the Scriptures, shows the value of our moral and intellectual faculties. It speaks of the worth of man as a rational creature, and gives true dignity to mind by asserting that it is capable of receiving so much light that all darkness will be scattered. It is this that gives us the hope that a true Republic will yet bless our world; that a people will arise who shall work out the problem of the ages; that a salvation shall be effected whose strength shall be immortal, and that shall usher in a time

'When from the lips of Truth one mighty breath
Shall, like a whirlwind, scatter in its breeze
The whole dark pile of human mockeries;
Then shall the reign of Mind commence on earth,
And starting fresh as from a second birth,
Man, in the sunshine of the world's new spring,
Shall walk transparent, like some holy thing!'

Wisdom is the right use of our moral faculties. 'The fear,' or reverence, 'of the Lord,' is therefore said to be 'the beginning of wisdom;' and wisdom possessed is regarded by the inspired writers as more precious than all wealth and outward honors. Knowledge is acquaintance with the relations of things. It is the same as Truth. Truth presents things as they are—gives us the Actual of existences—the why and wherefore of cause and effect. Wisdom and knowledge, therefore, united, make a soul full of light; they keep the whole mental being active and harmoniously so; and prevent the formation of a character such as received the condemnation of old—'Unstable as water, thou shalt not excel.' By the true and active and energetic union of the moral and intellectual, a salvation is wrought out that has strong defences. The Emotional is mastered by the Intellectual, and continuously man acts from the highest motives unto the best ends. Glorious will be the era when thus wisdom and knowledge shall be the stability of the times and strength of salvation.

It might be so in our Republic—in our own State, were Mind loved as much as Wealth—were men to seek for the noblest objects by christian methods. Wisdom and knowledge are what is wanted. Knowledge is more abundant than Wisdom—Men know more of what is Right than they are willing to practise, and they boast more of intellectual attainments than they seek for moral discipline. Hence the heat—the lightning flashes and the thunder of controversy; hence the alienations produced by opinions, and the turning away from the simple majesty of moral suasion to dependence on Force. Hence it is, that in the progress of a few years, a Reform changes its aspect many times, and its history is a difficult matter to relate. Names become things—words are spells, and a looker on seems to himself to be a witness of magical rites as he beholds the effects produced by the utterance of a single term. He listens to debates on every side—he thinks he is surrounded by a knowing people, and he is pleased at the show of knowledge brought forth. But he soon learns that there is a lamentable lack of Wisdom as he beholds how few there are who speak their ‘hard truth lovingly and with an eye of hope.’ Knowledge is the sun, moon and stars of society. Wisdom keeps the moral atmosphere clear, that the light and heat thereof may come unimpeded to where a beautiful fruitfulness will prove their benign influence. Whatever cloud of anger rises, or wind of passion blows, affects the clearness of the light and the falling of the soft and gentle dew.

The genius of our country—the hope of perfecting every good, and reforming or abolishing every evil institution, demand that with a high moral purpose and perseverance we seek for knowledge. Truth discovered and endeared to the moral affections, is the mightiest agent in the universe. It has been the manna of God to pilgrim souls in a human wilderness; and for it men have pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor. For it our sires toiled and suffered through the Revolution; and by it alone can we preserve what they achieved. And well was it that our national banner borrowed all its hues from the skies—from the glories of morning and the magnificence of night, to remind us of heaven, and bid us ever to look up and on.

‘When Freedom from her mountain height,
Unfurled her standard to the air,
She tore the azure robe of night,
And set the stars of glory there!
She mingled with its gorgeous dyes
The milky baldric of the skies,
And striped its pure, celestial white,
With streakings of the morning light;
Then from his mansion in the sun,
She called her eagle-bearer down,
And gave into his mighty hand
The symbol of her chosen land!’

Let us read the symbol aright, and the true glory of a Republic will be confessed. We shall talk less of Freedom and seek it more. We shall work for the future—for those who are to succeed us, that the current of influences that is flowing on, may be pure. We owe much to the Past. Sainted feet have trodden every part of our land, and monuments of heroic deeds are seen in the institutions that liberalize and bless the masses. Stability is not yet given to much that is needed, we well know; neither can it be given in a day or a year. First the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear, is the progress of Reforms, as truly as of vegetation; and far speedier and more abundant would the harvest be gathered in, if men were more gentle with the blade, and would not so hastily gather so much earth and many pebbles about it.

It has been very frequently said that the Idea of our age is the Melioration of Humanity. Some call it a tendency to Universality; and all mean that there are decisive and positive influences in operation far and wide to raise man up—to give a higher life to the masses—to assert the dignity of mind and the unutterable preciousness of a human spirit. This is the Idea of the age, however much it may at times be hidden—however much passion may obscure it. With patient trust, we should devote ourselves to its developement, and labor for the glory of God in human good. Knowledge, under the guidance of the moral powers, is the great agent of the work. It shows the relations of things, and that to truly educate the masses, is the surest way of securing and perpetuating national and state independence. No loftier theme than this—‘Educate the masses!’ can be given to the orator on the national festival. It is a truly christian theme; it recognizes the importance of every man, that each has capabilities for being elevated, and that it is better to build on the better sentiments than on the lowest. It says that a well educated population is the best of all standing armies, and a line of school-houses is a better wall of defence than the most massive fabrics ever erected. It fits men for the discharge of the duties of Liberty, and keeps ever alive and active the generous social sympathies. Let us consider it.

Education was once a means to form classes isolated from the great mass of the people. The great doctrine then was, that the few must lead the many, and the most important question must always be—How do the Rulers and Pharisees believe? Then all learning was locked up in a few volumes, and when sent forth was clothed in a language unknown to the multitude. The few spake, the many believed, and error was perpetuated. And this was all very well to those who deemed it very convenient for ambitious purposes to have to do with an ignorant people, and continually their language was: “For all these folks study is dangerous, because it stimulates minds which nature predestinated to a narrow sphere, gives rise to doubts which their limited information cannot solve, accustoms them to intellectual pleasures which render labor monotonous and wearisome, quickens desires out of all keeping with their humble condition, and by rendering them discontented with their lot, lead them to attempt to procure another.”

In these assertions are embraced the ideas which were put forth against the advocates of republicanism in the past, and which are now used with artful sophistry too extensively. They may have some power under a despotism, but Intelligence is now too well known to be the very life blood of a Republic. Knowledge favors Liberty—its acquisition, its appreciation, its preservation and its improvement. It takes from men's minds the theoretical frauds—the speculative sophisms by which they are cheated into the belief of dreams as realities, and gives power to overthrow them with Luther's success. It makes strong as Luther was strong, and heroic as he was heroic. It realizes to the soul its individual importance, and encourages it to animated perseverance to the establishment and perfection of all that is good.

We leave it then to the Old World to have its educated classes; we are to seek to have educated communities. Our places of public intercourse should be like the gates of the old cities in the golden age where the wise men met to exchange ideas, to sift opinions, and to garner the good wheat-seed for planting. Controversy would then be a fining vessel for silver and a furnace for gold, and the heat would not be permitted so to rage as to unite the pure metal and the dross again. But is it so? Do we not too speedily slide into the denunciatory character, and leave opinions to question motives? Do we not erect too many judgment seats, write too many creeds, exact too many pledges, and too seldom maintain and permit others to maintain a lofty independence? Do we not too often yield to our passions, forgetting to reason in the rising of the strong emotions and feelings? All this proves—yes, I say proves that we have not the respect for mind that we should have, nor are we so ardent to spread abroad true intelligence as we think we are. So with the Press. It sends forth page after page of declamation and abuse, and one or two paragraphs of fair and honorable reasoning. Thus it feeds passion more than it enlightens the understanding, and fans an excitement rather than directing to calm, deliberate, and manly action. If the people had as they should have, respect for their own minds, they would demand a different course to be pursued, and a much needed reform would enter the pulpit and the printing-house, and wisdom and knowledge would become the stability of our times and strength of salvation.

THE DEW DROP.

BY REV. H. C. LEONARD.

THERE hangs upon a slender blade of grass, a drop of glistening dew, so gently moved by the passing breeze, I can scarcely perceive its trembling motion.

Bright dew-drop! lucid, beauteous gem! a diamond! transparent as the morning air! Yet, thou art as frail as beautiful. Thy trembling, glistening, lovely form will vanish, so soon as the warm beams of the rising sun shall have fallen on the earth. Thou couldst not rest where thou art one moment, if the winds, now mild, should awake in their strength. But thy destiny is that of all we admiringly view or dearly prize. All natural things, lovely to behold, do pass away like thee! Our friends, too,—the good, the loved—are fair, are beautiful; and they depart like thee! Why must I behold earth's loveliest things, possess them, admire them, and then lose them so? Still, my heart, thy murmuring thoughts. Let not the voice of doubt be thine. Art thou not contented to know that 'God is love?'

Mysterious and dark are the ways of the holy One; and while we render praise for his mercies, his love, his grace, we must give as unfeigned acknowledgements for the inflictions of his unerring rod, his chastisements, for they are kind, and designed for good. God giveth and taketh away; and yet his fostering care and grace, are eternal and everywhere; and though our friends have left this earth, and are unseen by us, they are still before his sleepless vision, still guarded by his powerful arm!

This dew-drop, bright, evanescent gem! will ascend, imperceptibly, to some one of those fleecy clouds which hang beneath the skies. It will rest on that soft couch of beautiful form and glorious hue,—that bright, downy bed, with snowy pillows; and some pure angel, there reclined, and floating gently and slowly about, will discover, while opening folds enshroud his form, the beautiful drop; and smiling, will prize it dearly, and rejoice that it was so frail a thing, that it could not stay in view of men, and that it did not fall from the quivering blade on which it hung, into the dust of the garden walk. And that pure form, with wings of light and snow-white brow, will say, 'It is well, indeed, that a gem so beautiful, should glisten here on this white and floating cloud, or deck, while I lie upon its soft and sunny bosom, my silvery, shining hair. It is not meet that any thing so lovely, should perish in the dust. It is better to give it swift, bright and mysterious wings, and enable it to soar to some ethereal resting place.' And then, methinks, I shall hear him utter, just at the golden close of day, and ere his cloud will have lost its glorious light, with a sweet, clear voice, these comforting words: 'Weak mortal! hush thy murmurings, and calm thy troubled thoughts. Let now my voice be heard by thee, and I will give joy ineffable to thy frail heart. Hark! hear ye not that song above me—the notes of sweet and loud anthems? They are there—the loved are there, in that bright star, just smiling on this gorgeous cloud! List! mortal, list!—another star appears, bright, and full of cheering songs! Ay, ten thousand more are peering in the blue of ether, and their sweet lays, now soft, now swelling with rapture and untold joy, fill heaven and earth with music! The loved are there, above me thy dear, departed ones, winging their way from star to star, more beautiful and pure, than when with you. They have no sin, no sorrow; they shed no bitter tears; they have joy and everlasting songs, and the days of their mourning have ended!"

After speaking thus, I fancy the holy angel will perceive the descending shades of night, witness the sable hue of earth, and the beautiful reflections of the bright sun receding from his misty pillows; and deeming it time to depart from thence, I ween he will wave an adieu to me, with his palm, and rise, with a sunny and placidly smiling countenance, on wings, bright, strong and swift, to those high worlds of joy, light and music, pleased to tell the hosts of heaven, that he has made the heart of one mortal feel that God is wise, and erreth not in his great plans; is good, and will not let one child of his be drawn beyond his care; is strong, and can perform what is glorious and eternal; is love, and will ultimately destroy all evil. And any message, contrary to this, less cheering and lovely, could it be borne to the blest, would—saith my heart—silence the sweetest lays; cause shrieks of pain, where there are songs; bring tears, where tears are not.

FAREWELL.

BY IONE.

ADDRESSED TO L. C.

FAREWELL! thy course is o'er the troubled deep,
While mine is traced upon the sunny shore!
May guardian spirits thee in safety keep,
That I may grasp thy friendly hand once more.

Farewell! thy kind, familiar face shall be
Often to memory's eye distinct and true!
Sad thought! e'en while I speak or dream of thee,
Wild winds and waves thy vessel may pursue!

Farewell! God speed thee to the distant mart,
And curb the restless spirit of the storm!
We shall not soon forget thy noble heart—
Thy beaming eye and smile, and buoyant form!

Farewell! when home shall claim thee once again,
And thou art landed on thy native shore,
Bear thou a heart unchanged to greet me there,
And talk of dangers that alarm no more.

Boston, Mass.

'ROBERT BURNS paid very little respect to the artificial distinctions of society. On his way to Leith one morning, he met a man in hodin gray—a west country farmer; he shook him earnestly by the hand, and stopped and conversed with him. All this was seen by a young Edinburgh blood, who took the poet roundly to task for this defect of taste. "Why, you fantastic gomeri!" said Burns, "it was not the great coat, the scone bonnet, and the saundaer boot hose I spoke to, but the man that was in them; and the man, sir, for true worth, would weigh down you and me, and ten more such, any day."

SKETCHES FROM THE MEMORY. NO. III.

BY REV. T. P. ABELL.

'AND snatch the faithless fugitives to light.' ROGERS.

MY FIRST NIGHT ON LAKE ERIE.

THE gaudy, babbling, and remorseful day
Is crept into the bosom of the sea;
And now loud howling wolves arouse the jades
That drag the tragic melancholy night;
Who with her drowsy, slow, and flagging wings,
Clip dead men's graves, and from their misty jaws
Breathe foul contagious darkness in the air.

SHAKESPEARE.

WHOEVER has encountered dangers, for the first time, on the 'wide waste of waters,' has experienced emotions which it were probably in vain for him to describe. The novelty, as well also as the terror, of the scene, gives rise to a thousand strange thoughts and feelings, and to an additional multitude of more mysterious and active fears. The whole Past of life is crowded into one brief but tedious hour,—it becomes the Present. Old scenes that dimly lived far back in the early twilight of memory—joys and hopes that once thrilled the heart as by magic power, but which had well nigh forever faded away—shadowy trains of friends and friendships coming before the mind all life-like and literal—ghostly embodiments of cares and sorrows flitting around the heart, and leering upon us in the torturing coolness of fiendish malignity—visions of partings and death-beds, when soul from soul was cleft asunder, and the darkness of unrelieved desolation brooded over bruised and bleeding affections,—all, all re-lives, and is again enjoyed and again suffered. And I am persuaded that many a person is so constituted that while amidst the fiercest raging of the 'war of elements,' the mind may become so supremely absorbed in such contemplations as to forget the future, and even death!

I have distinct reminiscences of a passage across Lake Erie. I cannot suppose they possess any very peculiar interest to the home-loving reader, who seldom has occasion to indulge to any great extent, the locomotive propensity, of which Yankees generally are not destitute; yet as they may in a measure serve to show to what dangers our travelling population are not unfrequently exposed, they possibly may repay the labor of perusal.

Whoever has any acquaintance with the Western Lakes, must be aware that 'dark Erie' is at times the most dangerously tempestuous of any of our inland seas. Great numbers of rocks are scattered nearly all along the northern side, where there can be found hardly a good harbor to serve as a safe place of retreat in storm. The up-lake passage is the most difficult. A strong current constantly presses toward its eastern extremity; and when the north-western or the south-western winds prevail, the navigation becomes annoyingly tedious, if not fearfully hazardous.

It was in the beautiful month of June, when nature sports her loveliest heyday dress, and her elemental passions are generally as quiet and lamb-like as the most gouty of our fretful generation could wish, that I stepped on board the steamer Constitution, lying at the wharf in Buffalo, and bound for Detroit, and selected sleeping-shell No. 76. But alas, the sequel showed that I had not only 'mistaken my berth,' but had taken unnecessary trouble in even indicating the usual preliminary preference.

At four o'clock in the afternoon the hawser was thrown, and the piston hoisted. The great engine played lazily enough at first. We moved slowly along beside the Long Pier. The Light House was on the left. Soon the mammoth machinery betrayed the gratifying effects of a good 'wooding up,' and our hydraulic house verily moved 'upon the water like a thing of life.' We turned to gaze upon the receding city. Beautiful it was, that huge pile of brick and mortar! studded around with some of the finest 'country' residences the eye ever beheld. But soon the buildings dwindled into an undistinguishable promiscuousness of form, save now and then the conic steeple of a church. And in a little time more, the eye sought in vain for the local 'whereabout' of the place. It had passed, as the loved things of earth will pass, and left but its recollection to the wanderer.

Never was there a day more calm and lovely. There was an occasional cloud scattered over the fair face of the heavens,—no more. The air was still as the gentlest breathings of an infant; scarcely was there a ripple on the glassy surface around us. The sun shone down cheerily, but not oppressively: And as, amidst the inspiring loveliness of the scene, I joyed in its invigorating influences, I half exclaimed with the sweet poetess:

'Thou art no lingerer in monarch's hall,
A joy thou art and a wealth to all!
A bearer of hope unto land and sea—
Sunbeam! what gift hath the world like thee?'

As we soon sped so far from the shore that its objects became too indistinct to gratify farther the taste for the novel, I turned to survey our little world upon the water. A crowded population, thought I, and a fine specimen of the human animal in several of its most common varieties. Including cabin, deck and steerage passengers, they were over two hundred in number. There they were, of all ages, sizes, colors, castes,—a motley mass of talking, chewing, smoking, laughing locomotives. English, French, American, Dutch, Irish, Spanish, and horses and dogs, all pushed together by the propelling impulse of speculation, as it were, upon one plank! But the noisiest, busiest, most smoky of all moving things there, was the great iron heart of our water-craft—the engine. Yet we quickly learned to forgive its bluster, and thunder, and cinders, for on that were hinged our hopes of progress. It was not after all such an indifferent companion,—at least so the utilitarian philosophy taught, and the lesson was for once dutifully received.

When about giving up my examination, to be resumed again subsequently, the attention was diverted by the jingling of a large hand-bell, followed by a vulgar voice, which, had we been on our native earth, would have easily accomplished the feat of going over the way,

Down the street, and round the corner!"

Ordering the passenger, with much amusing gesticulation of the head, 'to walk up to the Captaining's office and settle.' While the summoned crowd were gathered around the seven-by-nine window, thrusting money in to the Clerk and receiving tickets in return, I saw the Captain pass up the stairway leading to the upper deck. Going up also, presently after, I found him gazing steadily with his one eye,—he had lost the other in some service rendered to his country,—upon a small, black, circular-formed cloud, which passed directly under the sun, then near the verge of the horizon, where it paused for awhile, as if it would make the sunset its gorgeous resting-place. The Captain, whose acquaintance and experience in nautical matters was reputed great, shook his head rather prognostically, and walked to the stern of the boat and conversed for several minutes with the old weather-beaten sailor at the wheel. In the mean time the ominous cloud unrolled its heavy folds and mingled with the darkening sky.

Passing among the crew soon after, I perceived from their movements that they had received some unexpected orders. 'The old chap will be hoaxed once,' said an obstinate looking seaman whose mouth was ornamented with a quid of the Indian weed, quite as large and much blacker than his tongue. 'We shall have no storm to-night, besides if we do it wont be a young deluge, I'll venture.' 'May be not,' rejoined his comrade, 'but as for me, I had much rather trust the Captain's judgment than yours.'

Few of the passengers heeded the indications of the storm which the watchful eye of the boat's master descried at the earliest moment. They had promised themselves a calm and peaceful night. But the night came on in terrible blackness. Nor that only. The wind arose in startling suddenness and moaned dolefully through the open work of the deck. The waters were awakened from their unaccustomed stillness. The undulatory movements of the boat, though gentle and rather agreeable at the outset, soon admonished those whose nerves and stomachs were the most delicate, to seek a place of repose. Others who desired to see a small tempest, tarried out for the purpose of gratifying their love of strange sights. But their untimely passion was soon surfeited. They would fain have retired, but then they could not.

Two hours went slowly by, when the wind and the motion of the waters, so far from abating, had increased at a fearful ratio. Those passengers who at first retreated below to avoid sea-sickness, were now constrained to seek the deck as the more comfortable place. But instead of finding relief, they found additional sources of annoyance and apprehension. About nine o'clock, when the boat for the moment seemed less agitated, a chain of livid lightning darted through the black clouds above us, and then came down the unsparing torrents of rain, drenching scores to the last shreds of their garments. There was an outcry, and a general rush for a shelter, but there was no shelter. For the cabin passengers to remain below, it were quite impossible. The fear of danger was so much greater while there than when on deck, that the confinement could not be endured. Besides, but few, in comparison with the whole, had any claim upon that part of the boat, and those few felt a greater sense of safety with the many. They must therefore suffer with them. O, danger, disease, death! ye are the levellers of human pride,—the great destroyers of the artificial distinctions men have built up among men!

No scene could be more filled with dismay and woe. There, amidst that fearful group, was the helplessness of infancy, the frail delicacy of female sensitiveness, the bitter infirmities of old age. How awful to these was that place! It seemed but as the gate of death! Amidst the roar of the waters, the creaking of the bark, the dashing in of the waves and the driven rain, the rushing fury of the winds, the terrific glare of the lightnings, the roll of the thunder as it crashed along through the heavens, following, now and then, peal after peal in rapid and deafening succession,—amidst these, there were ever and anon the mingled voices of men, women, and children, now lifted in supplication, now in the groanings of grief, in the wailings of despair, in the pains of hopeless sea-sickness, in the fears of death! O God! what a night of agony! It was about midnight when the crisis of the storm seemed to have approached. I was standing with my arms clasped around a column which assisted in supporting the upper deck. It was near the hatch-way. Some of the passengers were attempting to hold themselves on to trunks, boxes, &c. while each roll of the vessel would oblige them to change their position. The others seemed content if they might but retain the bare floor; but this it was not a little difficult to do. Nearly over my head swung a small lamp which emitted a faint light. The other lamps in that part of the boat had long since gone out. There was for an instant a suppression of voices. I looked around. And there, four feet from me, the light of the lamp fell in the face of one of the most beautiful creatures eye ever saw. She was in a kneeling posture, her hands were clasped and her eyes raised toward heaven. It was but for an instant. The boat was rising to be again dashed down among the billows. It was a fearful plunge. I saw an expression of unutterable anguish spread itself over her countenance. There was a general shriek. But when, just as the boat seemed gathering herself, the hatchway broke loose, and a strong current of water rushed into our midst, the alarm increased and the shriek redoubled. And there was one voice which, though less loud, came to my ear more distinct than any of the others: 'O, Father!' it said, 'my orphan boys are in thy keeping.' And that instant the lamp was dashed against the flooring over it, and broken into a thousand fragments. But the storm soon began to subside. The rain ceased, the winds died away, the waves sunk to their rest. At sunrise all was calm. But such a bleached, skeleton crew, the sun never before looked upon!

In the afternoon of that day we arrived at Detroit. I journeyed back to the interior of the country; and in about two weeks after I received a letter from a medical friend, who informed me that the young widow lady, Mrs. —, was no more. Being seized with a fever soon after her arrival, she speedily sank in the relentless grasp of death. And her two orphan boys were, indeed, in the care of the INFINITE KEEPER!

Such are some of the reminiscences of my first voyage. I have since several times crossed those waters, but I have experienced nothing like my first night on Lake Erie.

THE GOSSIPINGS OF IDLE HOURS.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

HOUR FOURTH.

Boston Harbor.

THE sun is now on his descent to the horizon, and his yellow rays fall slant upon the bosoms of the grassy islands, and gild with silvery chains the surface of the sea. In the wake of our gallant boat follows a black, dismal-looking British steamer, bound for Halifax. She comes slowly lumbering along in the distance, pouring from her red nostril an immense cloud of smoke, through whose wreathy borders the sun diffuses his radiant light, and whose vast column stretches far, far behind, as though it would daub with its murky touch, the blushing face of the sun.

Behind us lies the favorite city, with its crowning dome, and its walls of brick—the Navy Yard, half-hid by towering masts and deep-green trees—and high above all, 'the granite finger, moistened by the blood of patriotism, and pointing upward from the sod to heaven.' And now slowly from the north-east rises a dense curtain of fog, veiling from our sight the green islands and rock-bound peninsulas that border our ocean-path. With the demon of sea-sickness for our companion, come, dear Ella, let us court the comforts of a crowded cabin. Now and then a fog-bell to give warning to the unconscious vessels in our pathway, and the bellowing of waves near the shoals, shall break to us the monotony of a long and miserable night. Ah well—this sea-sickness is delicious. It draws one's head down so cozily to the pillow, and makes one feel so perfectly independent of all destiny. We fear little from accidents now. And yet we have a sort of dreamy consciousness of what is passing around us—and a disposition to be amused even in the midst of our misery.

Hark! there is a scene passing below us. That is the voice of the cabin-maid. 'I want thirty-seven and a half cents for your supper.'

'What?' replies a faint, half-smothered voice from one of the berths.

'I want thirty-seven and a half cents for your supper!' screams in a still louder voice the cabin-maid.

'What?' again inquired the deaf lady.

'I want thirty-seven and a half cents for your supper!' is reiterated in a still more vociferous accent.

This colloquy is repeated a dozen times or more, and at last the stewardess leaves the cabin in despair. Now we sink into a gentle doze for a moment or two, forgetting alike our miseries and our amusements. Alas, like all sublunary happiness, this proves to be but transitory. The cabin-maid returns, and the deaf lady, awakened from her torpor, makes some monetary overture.

'I only had a half of a cup of tea, and a little bit of biscuit,' she adds, in a deprecating tone.

'No matter—you are welcome to it—I'll not charge you anything for your supper—you are welcome to it—welcome to it—I asked the steward about it, and he says I may give it to you, if I'm a mind to.'

This fuss over, the cabin continues pretty quiet till morning. About dressing time the hubbub is renewed. Sea-sick mothers, dead for a season to all parental tenderness, petulantly wish their children thrown overboard—call them 'little torments'—declare that they detest them, and use sundry other terms of endearment—while the little vomiting darlings look up in surprise, wondering what change can have come over mamma, that she has no pity for their sufferings.

How welcome to us all comes the sound of the bell which announces our arrival at the wharf. Faint, and reeling, and misanthropic, we stagger up from the cabin, and with a hearty pleasure bid farewell to Portland Boat, and are ushered across the plank into beautiful Portland City.

HOOR FIFTH.

Westbrook, Me.

THE scene has changed. No sight nor sound of the ocean reaches us here. Woodland quiet—the breath of flowers—the waving of green trees—the singing of happy birds—these are the soft influences that now surround us. The eyes of joyous children smile on us; and the clasping of warm hands thrills the nerves that lie nearest to our hearts.

If God be not more in the country than in the town, he at least gives us more immediate inspiration of his presence. We are too susceptible to surrounding influences not to be affected by the purity and beauty and solemnity of country solitude. In place of the brick and the paving stone, the little flower springs up to carpet the earth for our feet—the little flower whose perfect organization, whose fragrance and beauty are alone sufficient to prove to us the existence of an all-wise and all-gracious Father. Every kindly emotion seems fostered by this rural quiet. Let us sit down, Ella, on this bank of shining grass. Does not this scene bring to thy heart a remembrance of former hours—of other solitudes—of a home dearer to me than this can be to thee? Canst thou recall to mind revelations of the inner heart that were uttered beneath the sighing pines of a woodland far, far away? And dost thou know how that same heart has since changed? How old it has grown, and wise?

Thou art smiling, as though thou wert doubting either its wisdom or its age;—but a heart that has had much experience can still be gay; and though it may have learned wisdom, can screen it all beneath a careless and indifferent air. That maiden, whose dreamings were so freely revealed to us, has grown mature in heart, and the unphilosophical, and the romantic might accuse her of worldliness—perhaps, even, of sordid selfishness. But they would do her wrong. Romance, indeed, has become to her as a vanished dream—but reality—life in its more earnest and truthful aspect has revealed itself to her mind; and she has learned to distinguish between the flowery and tortuous path which leads into a land of mists and rainbows, and that more rugged and unattractive way whose windings will terminate in useful and substantial happiness.

THE DYING MOTHER.

BY MRS. C. W. HUNT.

YES, I must die!

The arrow's sped from the strong hand of death,
And soon will reach my heart; I hear e'en now
The rushing of the Angel's wings, and feel
Methinks their chilling breath upon my cheek,
As he hastens for his prey. Oh! never more
Shall earth's sweet harmonies entrance my soul,
Or gentle tones of sympathy and friendship
Melt upon my ear. Yes, I must die!
But yet my soul shrinks not—I do not fear
To meet the shadowy king! I thank thee,
God of Heaven! for the high, sustaining faith

Thou hast vouchsafed, whose heavenly light
Now gilds for me the pathway to the tomb.

Beloved! come near;
Now we must part; we that have trod so long
The path of life together, must divide;
Thou—still to wrestle with mortality,
I—to depart where tears and struggles cease.
Oh! if by word or act I've thrown one shade
Of sadness o'er thy soul, be it forgotten
And forgiven. Thou hast been ever kind.
Life has been blest in thee. And now,
With dying lips—with soul just hovering
On its upward flight—I bless thee! bless thee
For all thy love—thy deep, thy earnest tenderness
And truth. Oh! I have burning thoughts, but cannot Give them utterance! the past, the long, silent
Past, with all its mighty memories,
Is rushing like a flood into my soul,
And speech is overwhelmed. Our children—
Those tender, infant minds—thou'lt guard them!
Yes! thou wilt! thou wilt! Oh! let it be
A feeble image of my boundless trust
In thine unwearied vigils, when I say
I leave them with their God and thee—content.
But oh! my babe! my tender, darling babe!
There lies the sting of death! how can I leave it?
A mother's heart alone, can feel a mother's Yearnings. Ye may be kind and patient
In your watchfulness, but oh! a mother's eye,
A mother's voice, a mother's kiss! these are
Its life! bereft of these, 'twill droop and fade;
And oh my God! may I not hope 'twill die?
'Tis the last boon I crave.

Come nearer!

For my eyes grow dim, and breath comes heavily;
My spirit flutters like an encaged bird,
Impatient to be free. Hush! speak not!
For he comes—the Voiceless—the Unseen.

* * * * *

There's a wail of sorrow on the breeze,
Deep tones of sadness 'mid the trees,
O'er earth a shadow creeps;
Tears from aged eyes are streaming,—
Lo! a Daughter sleeps.

There are gentle moanings 'mid the bowers,
Low, dream-like echos from the flowers,
All passing nature weeps;
Dew drops on the leaves are gleaming,—
Lo! a Mother sleeps.

See, pale and withering on the earth,
A tiny bud, which at its birth,
Was cherished as a gem;
Now 'tis drooping! Dead and broken
Lies the parent stem.

There are stately scions growing near,
And sister flowers, in love to rear
Its beauty to the skies;
Hope not! by each fading token,

Death, 'tis thine! it dies.
Lift again the sable pall!
Heard ye not the spirit's call?
Granted is the mother's prayer,
Comes the babe her grave to share.
As a flower-scent on the breeze,
As a dew drop on the leaves,
As a far off music tone,
Passed its sinless spirit on.
Rest thee, mother! Infant—rest!
In such doom ye both are blest;
Mother, that to thee is given,
A radiant passport unto Heaven;
Child, to be the shining ray
That lights her spirit on its way.
Close the portals—let them sleep!
Let the dews above them weep.
By His love who died to save,
Ye shall meet beyond the grave.

Duxbury, Mass.

INSINCERITY.

No vice is more highly condemned in the Scriptures than Insincerity. Nothing, indeed, is more repulsive to the mind of man than deceit; and to be charged with falsehood is regarded, even by men of the world, as the highest insult that can be offered them. Yet society encourages falsehood; it holds out a premium for deceit and for hypocrisy. Wretched men that we are, who shall deliver us from the body of this death!

A professedly pious man writes to his unbelieving son—'I do not insist that you shall actually believe as the majority do; but that you shall keep your opinions to yourself, and give no one cause to suspect that you are singular—for you may depend upon my word when I say, that nothing will shipwreck the prospects of a young man sooner than non-conformity in religious matters.'

Now, need any one ask 'Why is it?' should that young man become a sceptic? Is it strange that one who had been accustomed to hear his father make high religious professions, at the same time that he practised and recommended deceit, should have grown up in the opinion that Religion was all a mockery, and a mere cloak assumed for interested purposes? Let those individuals who think it necessary to practise duplicity in this world, at least have the fairness to renounce the profession of religion. Let the money changers and tricksters withdraw from the temple of God. Let them not practise their sorceries by the waters of Bethesda, lest those who come to be healed should be deterred from entering the pool. Abstractly considered, it may seem as criminal for one person to use dissimulation as another! but practical experience ought to convince us that those who stand before the world as the representatives of the Christian Church ought to be careful to free their skirts from guile and their lips from deceit. Our example, whether it be for good or for evil, exercises a powerful influence upon others. The wavering and the doubtful, the fearful and the unbelieving, look with keen interest upon the professed followers of Jesus; and nothing will more surely act as a stumbling block to their honest inquiries than a want of candor and sincerity in those who profess Christ before men.

EDITOR'S BOOK TABLE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., SEPTEMBER, 1842.

The Rose of Sharon. A Religious Souvenir for 1843. Edited by Miss Sarah C. Edgarton. Boston: A. Tompkins.

We have had the pleasure of examining this work in sheets, save twelve pages, and take real satisfaction in announcing its early appearance before the public. The original design has been kept distinctly in view, and hence the conductor of it has not descended to the petty policy whereby more than one professedly religious Annual has been ruined—we mean the policy of inserting just enough of serious matter to give the book the odor of religion, and devoting the rest to ephemeral articles—to 'light reading.' Wherever liberal minds have received the 'Rose' in years past, they have retained it with care for its real value, and to many the volumes have become pleasant books for frequent perusal. We think the volume for 1843 superior in a literary point of view to its predecessors. The variety is greater; the finish of most of the articles evinces more care in the writers; while the teachings and tendencies of all combine to purify the affections, to elevate the feelings, to interest the imagination, and to give to the soul the breathing of a lofty and generous faith.

The volume opens with a beautiful prose sketch from the lamented Mrs. J. H. Scott, entitled, 'The Dweller Apart.' It will be read with the deepest interest by her thousand friends, and will win a reperusal from every reader. This is followed by a very fine poem—'Sunset'—from Mrs. S. Broughton, in her peculiarly musical and rich style. Next we have a highly eloquent article on 'The Unfulfilled Mission of Christianity,' by Horace Greeley, Esq., setting forth truths of the highest importance, in a forcible manner. Then we have a poem—'A Death Scene'—by Mrs. L. J. B. Case, a gem among the jewels she has formerly given us, wherewith to crown Death, that he may not be so undorned as many picture him. 'The Tale of the Woodbine,' by Miss Julia Fletcher, is next in order, and is one of the very best she has ever written. It is certainly a sweet, rural poem. Next comes the best contribution among the excellent ones Mrs. C. M. Sawyer has given to the 'Rose'—'The Minstrel and his Bride.' It is a fine prose article of twenty pages, presenting many exquisite picturings and touching scenes, and we have been exceedingly pleased with it. Next we have an illustration of one of the plates—'Ruth'—Entreat me not to leave thee. This is a poem by S. C. E. And then comes ringing rhymes on a lofty theme, from D. K. Lee—'To Come.' This real poem was, we suppose, suggested by the closing period of Nichol's Architecture of the Heavens, and if so, we wish the passage had been quoted;—'TO COME!—To every Creature these are words of Hope spoken in organ tone; our hearts suggest them, and the stars repeat them, and through the Infinite, Aspiration wings its way, rejoicingly as an eagle following the sun.' The next is the lengthiest article, prose, in the book—'Earth and Heaven,' by Miss L. M. Barker. This is a very excellent contribution, full of the sweetness of true spirituality, and rich in themes to suggest farther reflection. 'The Last Look,' by Mrs. Scott, follows, is a sad poem, descriptive of the feelings of the bereaved mother ere by an unquestioning faith she says:

'Now, like a dew drop shrined
Within a crystal stone,
Thou'rt safe in heaven, my dove,
Safe with the Source of love,
The Everlasting One.'

Next is given us one of the most perfect poetic gems which we are able to refer to any where—'A Prayer at Night,' by S. C. E. We read it and re-read it, and still are delighted. An illustration of a plate comes next—'The Convalescent,' by Mrs. E. A. Bacon. This is a rural sketch after the manner of 'The Christian Graces.' 'Winter and Spring,' by Julius Dodd. This poem has a melancholy interest from the early demise of its very promising author—brother to Miss M. A. Dodd, who has a poem following, entitled 'Phantoms'—sadder than is her wont, but ending with a sweet and holy thought. 'Leonore,' a story by S. C. E. This is the only prose composition from the editor, and is a well written sketch of deep interest, affording good lessons to the superstitiously imaginative. Next we have an excellent poem by Miss H. Jane Woodman, (Ione) entitled, 'The Prisoner's Dream.' It is a fine description of a guilty soul indulging a tender mood, and its divine effect. Next we have another poem—'The Tempest,' by Mrs. C. M. Sawyer; a descriptive sketch, well executed. Then comes our contribution—'The Actual,' if it have any power to make dreamers believe that life is something, we shall be satisfied. Next we have a poem of eleven pages, by S. C. E., and a beautiful one it is, entitled—'Scene in a Grave Yard.' Then we meet an interesting series of brief sketches or pencillings, lively yet thoughtful, from J. G. Adams, 'Brief Lessons of a Journey.' Next a poem pleasant as innocence' smile—'Simplicity,' by S. C. E. Then we have 'Lily of the Vale,' by Miss C. A. Fillebrown, (Charlotte). This tale is marked by the same happy talent at description, which gives great interest to the writer's sketches, but we wish it were not so sad. 'The Connecticut Valley'—illustration of a plate—by J. G. Adams—the author's best poem. Then we greet an article from E. H. Chapin, 'The Poet's Mission.' A composition of interest, written in the style peculiar to the author, strong, earnest, and truthful. Next comes a poem of touching pathos and real beauty—'My Idiot Brother,' by D. B. Harris. This will be one of the favorite articles of the volume. The sheets which lie before us close with a good poem of interest—'Touch not the Flowers,' by Mrs. C. W. Hunt. The motto, we believe, is to be found, as a caution to visitors, in one of the Edinburgh grave-yards.

The 'Rose' this year will contain 216 pages, 14 more than last year. The typographical execution is elegant, and the paper is good to look upon for its beauty. The binding will be more than usually good, and the whole will present a first rate combination of attractions. We hope the circulation will be extensive, and that no disappointment in reference to expected support will prevent the continuance of the series. The work deserves especial consideration from Universalists, and we trust they will be as zealous to give the publisher needed patronage, as some 'of the contrary part' have been to anathematize it and prevent its sale.

Persons at a distance from the places where the Rose is usually on sale, can,—at least many of them can—send to Providence by persons coming hither to the General Convention. The publisher will be here with a quantity sufficient to satisfy the demand.

Persons holding Prospectuses with names, should send them in immediately.

At Abri, or the Tent Pitched. By N. P. Willis.

Mr. Willis wrote a series of exquisite letters to the 'New York Mirror' under the title of—'Letters from under a Bridge.' These are collected in this volume, and the new name given is a specimen of literary fopishness. But names do not always affect things, and the things in this volume are pleasant to commune with. The author writes from under a rural bridge, and describes what he sees and what he thinks. The letters bear one into the pleasant country, and give a desirable freshness to the feelings by converse with agreeable matters. There is a rich vein of humor running through the whole, giving a liveliness to the volume that renders it a very agreeable companion, with a good deal of pleasant philosophy. The puffs of wine, however, are as little agreeable to our mind as other kinds of whining.—Duodecimo size; pp. 172. We bought our copies at A. Tompkins. Get it, lovers of rural things.

Domestic Worship. By Wm. H. Furness, Pastor of the First Congregational Church in Philadelphia. Philadelphia: James Kay, jr. & Brother. Boston: James Munroe & Co. 12mo. 272 pp., elegant print.

This is decidedly by far the very best volume we ever met with designed as a help to domestic worship—that great aid to home piety. Never did we greet such perfect mingling of the intellectual and emotional—so much of heart breathing through vigorous thought. If we fault it at all, we can only say—that it seems to us, the language is too rich, and oft-times too polished, to be the natural utterance of devotional feeling and aspiration. But then again, we remember how rich and eloquent—how above their common expression, the utterance of many is in prayer, when they are engaged with deep fervency. We had rather greet a devotional work having a tendency to lift up and elevate, than suited to continue an undignified manner of uttering prayer. We prize this volume, because it acts upon the mental being precisely as the cool breath of the western wind revives the languid brow, when at holy twilight we throw open the casement to admit it, and a grateful freshness is enjoyed.

The introduction is eloquent and good. At its close, the author says: To those who are disposed to ask with the disciples of Jesus, "Teach us how to pray," I hope this book may render some assistance, and that its influence may be to encourage them in the use of forms of their own. We value a book of worship precisely according as we deem it suited to encourage those who use it to adopt forms of their own. The mere reading of prayers, however devotional the perusal may be, can never equal the influence exerted on the spirit by the outpouring of the heart in one's own language. There cannot be the same concentration of mind and awakening of feeling in the service.

A Concise History of the Efforts to obtain an Extension of Suffrage in Rhode Island; from the year 1811 to 1842. By Jacob Frieze. pp. 171.

We have carefully read this volume, and are impressed with a conviction that it is a 'Concise History' of facts pertaining to the various movements directed to the obtaining an extension of suffrage in this State. We are sure it cannot justly be called 'a one sided affair,' for the author deals very plainly with all parties, and spends no effort to inflame passion or feed prejudice. He does not uphold the course of the Assembly, and goes with the Suffrage Party as right and true till the aspect of the Reform was, as he thinks, changed by 'the later adjuncts, converted and initiated since the autumn of 1840.' He advocates 'the original sovereignty of the people, the source of all political power,' and decidedly maintains the necessity of the extension of suffrage demanded by the popular voice. The work is written in a plain, but good style, and evinces marks of care. It should be read apart from whatever else the author may have written on like themes.

Courtesy to the author demanded this notice, and as we are fully determined in no way or shape to be political, we are willing to insert a notice of equal length with this, from any one who differs with us in his opinion of the book after reading it.

Fifth Annual Report of the Providence Female Employment Society. Providence: B. Cranston & Co. pp. 8.

We have been favored with the preceding yearly Reports of this Society, and as it is novel in its character and highly useful in its tendencies, we propose to ourself to sketch its features in the next No. of the 'Repository,' and to bestow the meed of approbation richly deserved by its enterprising and persevering managers. There is no romance of benevolence in this association; it is one of real, unquestionable utility, elevating the poor through the medium of attractive industry.

ERRATA. In our last, page 65, 2d col., line 17 from foot, for scones, read snares. Page 66, first column, line 28 from top, for boundless, read bound up.

Convention Notice.

The United States General Convention of Universalists,

Will hold their session in this city (Providence) on the 21st and 22d of September. A petition has been sent to the Standing Clerk to alter the place of meeting, because of the political difficulties in this State, signed by nine ministers. This is the only expression in behalf of a removal, and as the First Society of Universalists have renewed their invitation, and a general meeting of the friends of our cause unanimously expressed an assurance to the friends everywhere that the Convention would be greeted with cordiality of christian feeling, the Clerk has published the notice of the meeting in due form. We do assure our friends throughout the country that rumor has not altered its well known character in reporting the state of things around us, and that the stories of the evils occasioned by political difficulties, have been greatly exaggerated. We deem it decidedly wrong for our friends to give unquestioning confidence to irresponsible Rumor, to the utter neglect of the earnest and sincere expressions of the minds of the brethren here. But more do we lament the construction that has been put upon their language, that seems to question its sincerity—and directness. Let the past be buried, without a tombstone.

The Convention is to meet here. And to the friends everywhere, we send christian salutations, and offer to them gospel hospitalities. Come to our city having in exercise the amiable sympathies of our holy religion, and the Lord will bless us and cause his face to shine upon us and give us peace. We trust to see a great and a joyous gathering. To greet brethren and sisters of like precious faith, from the East and the West, the North and the South, that we may take sweet counsel together and go to the house of God in company. We hope that in the spirit of good will, the brethren who signed the petition will also feel impelled to visit us, lest their absence should excite surmises not grateful to hear, and perhaps not just. We send them the greetings and the invitation of a warm heart, that loves them much, though it loves the Great Cause more. Come, brethren, and together we will find 'strength and beauty in the sanctuary,' and bless God for the hope in the reformatory power of the Gospel, that no defeat can weaken. 'The joy of the Lord,' shall be our strength, and devotion to truth our beauty.

Every possible arrangement will be made for the entertainment and comfort of our friends from abroad. The people here are 'given to hospitality,' and they will exercise this excellent disposition with an extra zeal. They have long anticipated the pleasures of the occasion; they have set their hearts on a holy and joyous festival, and the whole soul will be engaged that there be no lack in the essentials of enjoyment. Come then, from near and afar! Come, and fear not a besieged Jerusalem! Come, and every fibre of our being shall swell with the blood of a true Universalist's heart, and the grasp of the hand shall be a sincere 'right hand of Fellowship!' May the God of infinite grace ordain that when the festival is past, the returning friends may bear the report far and wide—'There was great joy in that city!'

The Delegates, Ministers and Friends, will please call on their entrance into the city, at the small vestry under the Universalist Church (Brick Church) in Westminster Street—vestry entrance on Union Street. The Council will meet in the large vestry.

Some of the Committee of Arrangements will be in waiting on Tuesday evening, and on the mornings of Wednesday and Thursday, to direct to places of entertainment all who may apply. Accommodations will be provided for all our friends from abroad who will accept of our hospitalities for the occasion. Come, and make us exceeding glad by a great gathering! God will give us joy and peace and prosperity. Amen.

INFLUENCE OF THE IMAGINATION.

BY REV. HENRY BACON.

WE all have seasons of thought and reflection, the influence of which is to awaken deep feelings and make strong impressions, and which mark us as beings formed to muse and meditate. The history of our past life will prove to us that more sober hours of meditation and active thought would have been better for us, guarding us from many evils, and fitting us to more justly appreciate the best springs of happiness, and the noblest objects of pursuit. Consistency of character, as well as daily enjoyment, depends in a great degree on timely meditation, by which our past actions are compared with the true standard, and we listen to the voice of experience speaking persuasively behind us. To meditate often on the past, is essential to a right knowledge of our present character and situation, and resolving aright for the future; and they who neglect this duty, neglect one of the best means for religious and moral improvement.

There is much musing and meditation that is far from being beneficial; and it should always be distinctly remembered that according to the character of our musings—good or evil—will be the nature of the fire that will be kindled and will burn. All meditation is not good; as the Imagination is busily employed, and can bring before the vision other than the pictures drawn or unveiled by purity and virtue. To muse, is one thing; to muse wisely, is another and vastly more difficult employment. Some persons spend great portions of their best days and years in useless day dreams—in musing on the thought-pictures fancy paints, and feeding thereby their pride, vanity, and soulless ambition; satisfying themselves with the ideal, without an effort to accomplish any great good that shall really dignify them, or prove that they really loved the ideal perfect. This romance of thought—this poetry of nothings—this music of self-adulation, is anything but beneficial, as it disturbs the processes of strong and vigorous thought to which the mind is sometimes inclined, by its blending of the purely imaginative with the visions of reality. An undue freedom is granted to the Imagination, so that it becomes the master of the Intellect, and sways a fearful sceptre.

The religious duty of controlling the imagination, is not often enough considered, as it has a closer connection with our virtue than many allow to it; for while it may contribute to strengthen every vile and corrupting passion, it may—rightly employed—give aid to all that is good in man, and feed the holiest desires of the soul. Evil inclinations gain all their strength from the abuse of this faculty; and though we may often say that we cannot help our thoughts,—and imagination is but the picturing of thought in illumined colors,—yet we do not enough consider how we may control our imagination that it shall not dwell on what thought has created, making it assume more and more of life. Our guilt lies here—in permitting the mind to continue to dwell on the impure conception, and in not arousing thought to turn imagination to other and holier subjects, even as the Psalmist prayed: 'Turn away mine eyes from be-<sup>Re. 19. 37.</sup> holding vanity.' He desired that the gorgeous array of Idolatry might not attract his fixed sight, and that the rites and ceremonies so enchanting to vast numbers, might never have a winning and entrancing power over his heart. In the fear of Israel's God he would turn away his eyes—his mental sight—his imagination—therefrom, and be quickened to pursue the onward path, lest he turn back to the enchanter. He knew how familiarity with evil had lessened human abhorrence towards it, and he desired to avoid what others had not resisted. He would dwell always in the house of the Lord, and behold the beauty of his God, by a sanctified Imagination.

Let us here understand that the character of our musing, good or evil, will be according to the nature of the objects on which our imagination is fixed, and according therewith also will be the consuming or purifying power of the fire kindled within. If we muse on a conquering Alexander, and a sympathy with his unsatisfied desire for conquest is felt, the fire of ambition will be kindled, and as we muse it will burn and consume the best feelings and affections—destroy the desires that would make us the friend of our race and the enemy of war. If we muse on a philanthropic Howard, and feel sympathy with his noble efforts for humanity in its low estate, the fire of benevolence will be kindled, and as we muse it will burn to consume all selfishness, purifying the heart for the abode of all that is generous and good.—Thus we see how the Imagination may be made a servant to good or evil; and we are made also to feel the religious duty of cultivating and controlling it aright, lest it kindle strange fires on the altar of the heart—fires never lit from heaven and that consume without sanctifying.

Consider Imagination as connected with every day duty. It has a more important connection than many are apt to consider, and may be used to good effect to guard us from dishonesty and craft. Here enters a confiding person into the store of the tradesman; he purchases in trustfulness what he needs, and leaves for home. As he departs, the tradesman exultingly counts over the profit he has gained through the extreme confidence of the buyer in the seller's veracity, and he rejoices that all men have not keen eyes and calculating brains. Let that tradesman follow, in imagination, that customer; see him enter his home, where are just judges of the worth of what he has bought, and let him listen to their speech as they discover the fraud practised upon him. Is he flattered by the epithets piled upon him? Is he pleased with the vows they make to trade no more with the deceiver and to caution others of his practices? He cannot but feel the extreme wickedness of deceiving an honest heart, if thus he will follow the deceived to his home.

Take another case often witnessed. A poor widow labors incessantly for the support of a large family. The day suffices not, and many hours of the solemn night are passed in toil for her little ones. Scanty indeed is the reward she receives, and with that little she goes forth to obtain a store of necessities for her household. She enters where she feels confident she shall expend her little treasure to the best advantage; though a mite to others, it is much to her;—

'It is the fruit of waking hours
When others are asleep,
When moaning round the low thatched roof,
The winds of winter creep.

It is the fruit of summer days
Pent in a gloomy room,
When others are abroad to taste
The pleasant morning bloom.'

The little all, thus gathered, she expends in confident trust that fairly is she dealt with. She goes to her group of dependants, and there she looks over all she has bought, and it seems to her inadequate indeed to supply her wants till she can again gather a little sum to expend; then as she parcels it out, examines each portion, she sees that she has dealt with an undue lover of money and profit. Let the tradesman look with imagination's eye into that humble home—see the poor confiding widow as she feels she has been deceived, and witness the tears that moisten the eyes that have been wearied in labor, the fruits of which are thus lessened. And then let him see also, how day by day, nay, how meal by meal, she has to furnish her table with a sparing hand, and save from her children's wants to make up the loss by deception. Would not imagination teach thus a lesson of daily duty? to deal honestly and fairly, and remember the needy widow and fatherless with benevolence?

And so also with all the intercourse of life. Are we inclined to deceive by alarming stories and fables—to create fear and tremblings by idle tales, 'all for sport?' Let imagination follow the victim, and bring to us the report whether such conduct is kind and generous, or not. Do we indulge in profanity or vulgarity of speech, let imagination follow its effects and hear how it sounds as it comes from the voice of some lad that has caught the echo of our own, and then let us ask ourselves what would be our feelings to hear the like from our own child! Do we treat lightly sacred things in our intercourse with others, using light and frivolous arguments or evasions when sober minds are inquiring of us, or expressing their doubts, fears, or impressions respecting our faith? Let imagination follow them to their homes, and catch the sound of what they say respecting us and our faith, because of our idle talk. How many would thus be taught a lesson well calculated to fit them to discharge aright their daily duties, and make them to be guarded against the practice of whatever may prejudice the sober mind against our doctrine, or serve to close the hearing ear that is just opening to hear the gospel sound.

Consider Imagination as connected with the social duty of benevolence and sympathy. In order to follow Christ, we must not only 'deal justly,' but 'love mercy,' striving not only to be righteous, but good. And it has well been remarked by a philosophical writer, that 'a man deficient in imagination, though he may be free from any thing unjust or dishonorable, is apt to be cold, contracted, and selfish,—regardless of the feelings and indifferent to the distresses of others.' Here lies the reason why some men can never be touched by representations of distressed and needy humanity, and never warmed up to do noble works for their relief. I would not here laud that extreme sensibility which weeps over every tale of sorrow, and never puts forth a hand to relieve; for such charity is the charity of romance, has no sound sense or real goodness; but it is imagination that enables us to bring up the pictures of real suffering, to see more than the mere eye can see, to acquaint ourselves with the deep feelings of the heart, and in reality to weep with those who weep, as we make their case our own. Was it not so with Howard and the noble philanthropists who have befriended humanity? Their imaginations brought before them visions of the sad state of the prisoner, the enslaved, and the forgotten; they saw the reality as distinctly as the painter sees the creation he is embodying on the canvass, and their zeal was aroused to noble efforts to relieve and bless. Was it not the imagination of Lafayette, realizing to him the state of the struggling colonies, that impelled him to leave a youthful bride, a happy home, and sunny France, and mingle in the din of war? Was it not the imagination of a Murray, realizing to him the state of mind enslaved to the fearful error of eternal woe, that led him to abandon his project to dwell in private, and made him willing to suffer reproach and insult in the cause of a world's salvation? And when fearlessly he waved the stone that had been aimed at his life, who can say that he did not have to his imagination as bright visions to encourage, as had the martyr Stephen, who saw heaven opened and Jesus standing at the right hand of God! It must be so with us. We should often strive by imagination to bring home the situation of the heart and mind enslaved and bowed down by error, and by the vision of mental misery, have our zeal quickened in the holy cause.

And of a truth, 'an imagination accustomed strongly to realize the good and evil of others, is as essential to virtue as an intellect stored with sound principles, and active powers in their best state for exertion.' It should be cultivated, refined, and kept in subjection to strong and accurate thought, and then will sound reason, a just judgment, a good understanding, and a vivid imagination, be united in one.

Consider Imagination as connected with christian faith. We know that John the Revelator had a most powerful imagination, and what glorious seasons of rapture must he have enjoyed even in his exile. His vision of the New Jerusalem was but one of the magnificent pictures he beheld. The scenery of faith and hope was distinct, and he saw the final issue of all the operations of Gospel Grace, and as the sound of mighty and many waters the pealing Alleluia! burst on his spirit's raptured ear. But we can go back farther and to a better to note the joy of a sanctified imagination—even to Jesus Christ. When the Seventy commissioned by him came back with the story of their mighty success, we are told that Jesus rejoiced in spirit, or was exceeding joyful, and exclaimed—'I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven.' What a glorious vision was that! How cheering the sight! And who would not wish to see a like vivid view of the overthrow of Satan, the destruction of all power adverse to Gospel truth and love, and the annihilation of sin? And who would not wish also to behold the glorious vision of the end, when the kingdom shall be delivered up to the Father and he shall be all in all? O how would the imagination of a Milton, or a Shakspeare, take hold of the beauties of Universalism, and sing the anthems of the redeemed! 'Paradise Regained,' has indeed yet to be written. Milton's picture of Paradise, or the earthly Eden, is surpassingly beautiful; but had his soul been rightly touched by Gospel fire, he would have left a lovelier picture to wake human admiration and praise—even a picture of the spiritual, heavenly, and universally enjoyed Eden of God. Raphael is said to have died from the effects of his intense love of the beautiful—the keenness of the sword cut through the scabbard. But if there is such a power in the beautiful of earth, and the combinations of earth's most perfect gems of loveliness, what radiant pictures of ravishing beauty must have passed before such a mind had the seraphim of Gospel truth led him through the fields of light and spiritual loveliness in the better land! O the most beautiful of earth's beauty is but the dim reflection of the light of heaven's loveliness! Our eyes must be anointed to look on the reality itself,—

'If night's blue curtain of the sky,
With thousand stars inwrought,
Hung like a royal canopy,
With glittering diamonds fraught,—
Be, Lord! thy temple's outer veil,
What splendor at the shrine must dwell!'

Here is one glorious feature in our religion which gives a surpassing excellence—which exalts it to the pre-eminency above all others. We can give imagination full liberty to explore the future state, and wherever it wings its flight it brings back but one report—Redemption, Glory and Bliss! We can permit imagination to go far beyond all misery, sin, and discord, and expatiate with rapture in boundless fields of purity and joy! But alas! and alas! again, for those who can never outstrip the flight of the bird of misery, lamentation, and pain,—who can see no end to evil—who can view no reunion of all to God—who can behold no vision of universal holiness and joy! They must curb their imaginations indeed, or blight and sorrow will come upon their social affections, and the darkness of their eternity will shroud the light of present beauty and bliss.*

Thank God, Reader, if thou art a child of the Il-limitable faith! thank God that you can muse on the scenery of the future and rejoice, while the fire of devotion and spiritual gladness burns in your heart; and may you often walk in spirit with the Savior and hear his teachings, so that you can say when you meet a kindred soul—'Did not our heart burn within us, while he talked with us by the way, and while he opened to us the Scriptures?'

Providence, R. I.

* We shall refer to this again in an article on 'Universalism, as an aid to the culture of the love of the Beautiful.'

IT IS GOOD TO MEDITATE. Reader! have you ever meditated? If not, then let thy soul now commence the work. Cast thy thoughts about thee, and seriously examine the wonderful things in earth and sky. FR.

A SONG FOR THE PAST.

BY CHARLOTTE.

A song for the past! when our hearts were young,
 And the world looked bright and fair;
 When we bounded along, with jocund song,
 And knew not the weight of care.
 Then our hearts were light, and our eyes were bright,
 And merrily passed each day,
 With the sportive glance and the joyous dance,
 And the merry roundelay.

A song for the past! for the good old days
 When our spirits were blithe and free;
 When the birds sang gay, in the early May,
 And we revelled in childhood's glee.
 Then the mad cap race and the butterfly chase,
 Gave our cheeks a ruddy glow;
 And exercise gave light to the eyes,
 And throned fair health on the brow.

A song for the past! for the golden days,
 Whose memories make us yearn
 To behold again, though we know it vain,
 The scenes which can ne'er return.
 Farewell to my theme—like a morning dream,
 The past has vanished away;
 But the present lies bright before our sight,—
 Enjoy it then, while we may.

THE VILLAGE SCHOOLMASTER.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

MADLINE BARTLETT, a pretty, romantic girl, verging now upon her twenty-second year, was spending a few months with a relative in a small country village at some distance from her city home. She was gifted with that fortunate temper which is not dependant upon gay society and brilliant amusements for happiness; and far from finding the winter parlor of her aunt's retired residence a spot for dullness and discontent, she made its old-fashioned walls ring all day long with her gentle and musical laughter.

This aforesaid parlor had three small windows; two upon the front, overlooking a square yard, filled with noble old horse-chestnuts, and covered with snow which lay in drifts up to the pickets of the fence; and one upon the side, looking down into the valley of a bright stream, which now slumbered, like a passive slave, in the chains of the frost King.

Very quiet was Aunt Lydia's habitation, for not a single child, girl or boy, molested its orderly arrangements, or scattered crumbs over its neat home-spun carpets. The old house-dog Pompey was as grave and silent as an octogenarian Turk; and even prim Tabitha, the puss, behaved with the most Quaker-like decorum. Uncle Jotham, the lord of the dwelling, was a good old, honest, hum-drum farmer, who kept his station by the large kitchen fireside, and seldom invaded the precincts of the parlor, except at the very urgent solicitation of his pretty niece, who coaxed him so often out of his pendulum-like habits that he declared outright, he would have her hung for a witch.

The 'help' attached to this demure household, were soon familiarized to Madeline by the names of Phœbe and Abdonijah—or Nije, as he was wontedly called. Phœbe, though somewhat past the prime of life, was, like her celestial namesake, wedded to celibacy; and when moving around the house, had about the same apparent velocity. The only exhibitions of vivacity that ever escaped her, were in parrying the threadbare jokes of Uncle Jotham. These she always retorted with spirit; and Aunt Lydia often remarked that Phœbe's work was finished just about two minutes and thirty-three seconds sooner than usual, by the old clock, whenever she had been cracking jokes with the 'gudeman.'

Nije, too, was a celibate, and bore about in his crusty nature the most perfect and undissembled horror of all woman-kind. Phœbe was the only person of her sex he dared meet face to face; and she only was an exception, because from the long practice of sitting near her at the same table and fireside, he had learned to regard her rather as an indispensable piece of kitchen furniture, than as an actual 'live woman.'

Madeline's reasons for leaving her pleasant home in the city, and becoming an inmate of this odd household, particularly at this dull and inclement season, may seem inexplicable to our fair readers. Had there been but some 'beau cousin' in the case, all would have been natural, and easily understood; but an old hum-drum uncle, in a hum-drum habitation, quite on the outskirts of a little country village, could surely offer no possible attraction to draw a pretty, romantic young lady from the charms of metropolitan society. Perhaps some 'disappointment' had driven her into solitude, that she might give free vent to her repinings; or perhaps as the more sagacious suggested, her parents had sent her away from some dangerous influence to which her romantic enthusiasm might subject her. Few had the simplicity to suppose that she came out of love to her good old uncle and aunt, and with the design, also, of enjoying herself to the very extent of her capabilities.

We have said that Madeline was pretty and romantic; she had, moreover, one of the kindest hearts in all the world; and it was owing to this latter endowment, that she strayed, like a chance sunbeam, into the monotonous habitation of Uncle Jotham. Sitting one day in the cheerful home-parlor, surrounded by her merry brothers and sisters, her instruments of music, and her hundred favorite books, the thought suddenly struck her how lonely and dull dear Aunt Lydia must be, so far away in the cloudy country, with no one for company but Uncle Jotham and the pur-blind cat; with no one to sing to her, or laugh with her, or read aloud 'the last new novel;' and no sooner had her sprightly thoughts conned over the thousand disagreeable circumstances connected with such a residence, than she resolved to break in upon it, and disperse its gloom by the sunshine of her own joyous spirit.

Straightway a proposition was laid before papa and mamma, urged with so much sweetness and enthusiasm, that in spite of their strong desire to keep her always with them—for though now a grown woman, she was still a great pet—they were forced to yield, at last, a reluctant consent. Giving herself a week only, for saying adieus to her numerous friends, and stocking her trunk with literary food for a two months' sojourn in an intellectual wilderness, Madeline found herself one morning snugly ensconced between two portly gentlemen in surtouts, on the front seat of one of those numerous stage coaches that issue from our quiet metropolis, and diverge in every direction over the interior.

Toward evening of that same day, the coach stopped at the gate in front of Uncle Jotham's dwelling. For a long while no signs of life appeared about the premises. The coachman dismounted, tied his horses to the fence, opened the coach door and assisted the fair passenger to alight, before any sound or sight betokened the existence of human life within the dwelling. The snow lay three feet deep in the yard, bearing no perceptible trace of having been disturbed by a single footstep; and Madeline was in a state of lugubrious indecision whether to attempt a passage through these Alps, or to search out some more circuitous route, when to her great relief she heard the bar of the front door slowly withdrawn, and saw through a cautious opening the inquisitive and wondering face of Uncle Jotham.

Scarce a moment elapsed, however, before the door was flung wide open by the eager hand of Aunt Lydia; and joyous in step as a young girl, out she sprang upon the surface of the snow, which bore her up as though she were but a spirit of the air—and in the next moment, Madeline was clasped to a heart as warm and affectionate as her own, and tears and kisses were showered upon her rosy cheeks till they blushed rosier than ever with very gladness at being so heartily received.

Aunt Lydia—we have not described her yet—was one of those warm-hearted, affectionate beings whose presence seems like a sunbeam wherever felt. It was singular that she should have married Uncle Jotham, who was twenty years her senior, and altogether unlike in character and conduct; nevertheless, she did marry him out of pure affection, though possibly that affection was neither so deep nor ardent as she was capable of experiencing had she kept herself free until a few more years had matured her judgment, and thrown in her way a heart more nearly attuned to her own. As it was, she lived a very peaceable and demure life, thankful for what blessings she possessed, and resolutely shutting out from her thoughts all visions of a brighter and more congenial state of existence, in a world so universally incongruous as this. Though she did not love Uncle Jotham to the extent which it was possible for her to love, and though she had no children on whom to pour the waste-tides of her affection, Aunt Lydia contrived, nevertheless, to attach herself very strongly to the little world that surrounded her, and to find a thousand outlets to her heart in a circle where less genial spirits would have been frozen up in their own selfishness.

'What put it into your heart, Madeline,' she said to her fair niece on the evening of her arrival, when they were sitting alone by a blazing wood fire in the snug old-fashioned parlor, 'What put it into your heart, I desire to know, to leave your gay and pleasant home at this most unpleasant season of the year, and mope yourself up with such an old home-spun couple as Uncle Jotham and I? Come now, Madeline dear, there is some secret motive for all this, which must be wormed out of you before I can feel at all at peace; so be a good girl, and explain the mystery at once. If it be any secret, I promise to keep close lips with others; and no one but myself shall be any the wiser for the revelation.'

Madeline laughed. 'Why Aunt Lydia,' she replied affectionately, 'can you suppose any other motive than a desire for your society was necessary to induce me to come? I was happy at home, it is true; and I expect to be happy here, also. As to moping myself up, I assure you I shall do no such thing. I intend to laugh, and sing, and dance, and skip, and make as much confusion about the house as I please. Unless you give me a very decided scolding every morning before breakfast, you may expect to find the whole house topsy-turvy in the course of a fortnight. Dear Aunt Lydia, the only motive in the world I had for coming here now, was to give you the pleasure of my very sweet company; for without intending the slightest disrespect either to Uncle Jotham, Miss Phoebe, Corporal Abdonijah, dog Pompey, or puss Tabitha, I couldn't help thinking you must find it very lonely and unsocial here.'

'You are a dear good girl,' answered Aunt Lydia, wiping the tears from her eyes; 'and I shall be happy, very, very happy to have you here with your sweet, merry voice to scare the silence out of the walls—for it is like a Fast Day here all the year round. I sit from morning till night sometimes, hearing only the buzzing of the flies, the purring of the cat, and the loud, dull, monotonous tick of the clock; but to tell the truth, Madeline, I seldom find the time pass heavily. I always have enough to do to keep my hands employed—and no one, I am sure, need have an unoccupied mind when there are so many things that are good and pleasant to think about.'

'So then, dear Aunt, my sympathy was all wasted, it seems. But as it was not alone to make you happy that I came, I shall not run back just because I find you can live very well without me.'

The next morning, shortly after breakfast, Madeline came down into the kitchen, where Aunt Lydia was making pastry, tastefully attired in a purple satin short-cloak, trimmed with ermine, and a velvet hat of the same color ornamented with three long snowy plumes, drooping almost upon her shoulder.

'Oh you beauty!' exclaimed Aunt Lydia, admiringly, lifting her flour-powdered hands in astonishment; 'where can you be going this cold, blustering morning, dressed off too in such splendid fashion?'

'I am going to walk, Aunt. I never omit my out-of-door ramble for any kind of weather, either in spring, summer, autumn, or winter. I explored all the pleasant spots where the violets, and spearmint, and strawberries grow, when I was here last summer; and now I am going to hunt up subjects for some little winter pictures, for as usual I have my crayons and portfolio with me.'

'That is right, my dear. Find out subjects for amusement wherever you can, else I fear you will soon grow tired of us. But I must tell you, Madeline, that unless you wish to draw every man, woman and child to the windows to stare at you, and furnish food for village gossip for a week to come, you must put on a different cloak and bonnet; for we are an old-fashioned people here, and the sight of a white plume or a silk cloak, is sufficient, at any time, to create a universal excitement.'

'Oh well, if that be the case,' replied Madeline, good-naturedly, 'I will borrow vestments of you or Phœbe; for I really have no ambition for such a notoriety as you describe. Come to think of it, this dress of mine isn't exactly suited to your sober little village, and if you please, I will exchange it for your close hood and cloak; and with a veil over my face, no one will suspect I am not, indeed, Aunt Lydia herself.' So saying she flew back to her chamber, and in a few minutes returned externally metamorphosed into a quaint matronly damsel, who looked as though she might have been a cotemporary of the patriarchs.

'It is too bad!' exclaimed Aunt Lydia, compassionately, as Madeline stood before her, peeping roguishly from beneath her close green hood; 'but never mind—it will save you from impertinent curiosity, and you will, besides, be just as comfortable. So good speed to you, and a pleasant walk.'

Madeline was an accomplished walker. She had none of the languidness of a fashionable saunterer, but every step was light, quick and graceful. She walked, too, with the elasticity of one who loved the exercise; and the glow upon her cheek and the bright sparkle in her eye, were tokens of the physical enjoyment she derived from it. After rambling about half a mile on this occasion, she felt sufficiently warm and weary to throw herself upon a snow-bank for a few minutes, and drew from her pocket a scrap of paper and a crayon, with which she proceeded to sketch the outlines of a little scene before her. It was the village school-house—a small, square, cream-colored tenement, overhung by the naked branches of a venerable elm tree. A few boys,—sad truants they were—loitered near the door, and added grace to the simple picture. They stood watching her till her sketch was finished, wondering what she could be doing with pencil and paper, and seated, too, upon that crusted snow-bank. When she arose to pursue her walk, one little fellow mustered courage to approach her, his hands stuffed in his pockets, and his mouth open with curiosity.

'Say, ma'am,' said he, as he met her encouraging smile, 'have you been makin' a picter?'

'Yes, dear.'

'You ha'nt tho', have ye? Did you put me in?'

'Yes.'

'And Jim, too? and Frank? and all on us?'

'Yes, all.'

'Oh, Jiminy! Won't you let us see it, tho'?'

'Yes, if you wish.'

They crowded around her as she drew the paper from her pocket, and displayed to them a hasty, but very accurate sketch of the old school-house, the great tree, and the group of truant boys. Pleasure and pride glistened in their eyes as they bore testimony to the correctness of the picture. 'By Jiminy, tho', if that an't the very old tree, boys,' said the first speaker—'Look! there's the self-same identicle branch there that Tom spindle-shanks broke swinging on it—and she's got it broke in the picter! Who'd have s'posed she would have thought o' that? And the boys too! See! she's got Jim's duck legs there, true as life—and Frank's broken-crowned hat—and—and—'

'Your chubby face, Phil,' shouted two or three at once, glad to throw back the laugh upon the one who had raised it against themselves.

'O how I wish you could put our little schoolmaster in,' exclaimed Phil; 'Look! there he stands now, close up to the window, Miss. Can't you draw him?'

Madeline blushed a little at finding herself an object of attention to the young pedagogue, and dismissing her juvenile admirers as gently as possible, she commenced her walk homeward. She had proceeded less than a rod, when pat, pat, pat came some one behind her, and presently Phil's hand gently grasped her cloak cape. 'Won't you give me that picter?' he said, in a half bashful, half coaxing voice; 'Do, 'cause I want to do somethin' with it.'

'What will you do with it?'

'Oh I'll tell, after you give it to me.'

'But I can draw you a much prettier one than this, on some nice thick paper too, if you will give me time. But first you must tell me what use you are going to make of it.'

'I shall fix it up against the wall, over the master's desk—'cause I know he'll think it's cute—and then he'll be in such a fluster to know how it could come there! How I will make him guess—Jiminy, if I don't! So you'll make me one, will you? I hope you will have it done soon, 'cause I can come after it any time,—only I don't know where you live,' he added hesitatingly.

'You will find me at Mr. Jotham Birney's; and if you will call before school-time in the morning, you shall have the picture, provided you will promise not to tell any one—at least, not to tell your master who drew it for you.'

Phil readily gave the promise, and as Madeline again turned to resume her walk, she saw that the schoolmaster was still watching her from the window.

On the afternoon of this day, Madeline laid aside the book with which she had occupied herself during the hours which her Aunt was obliged to spend in the kitchen, and taking her port-folio from the centre-table, (for Madeline had converted her Aunt's old-fashioned, round, three-legged tea-table into a receptacle for books, papers and needle-work) she sat down on an ottoman at Aunt Lydia's feet, and arranged her Bristol board for her afternoon's employment.

'Here is the result of my morning walk, Aunt Lydia,' she said, holding up to her view the little sketch; 'do you recognize the scene?'

'Oh yes—there is no mistaking it. The school-house, and the old elm are as natural as the reality. I should think you had got little Phil Roby there amongst the boys—tho' I suppose you don't know their names.'

'Yes I do—there was a Phil amongst them I remember, for he came up and addressed me with true Yankee familiarity.' She then playfully related the substance of her interview with the boys, not forgetting to mention the circumstance of the young master, gazing at her through the window.

'Apropos, of this young schoolmaster,' replied Aunt Lydia, laughing; 'I must manage to get you acquainted with each other. He is a perfect gem of his kind.'

'Of his kind, Aunt. He may, indeed, be a gem of a schoolmaster—but I have a perfect antipathy to the whole tribe. So I pray you will use no extraordinary exertions to bring about an introduction.'

'Ah, but you must be introduced, if it be only to destroy your antipathy. I am sure you would like him.'

'Are you quite sure, Aunt? because, I must confess, I am very difficult in my tastes.'

'That I should suspect from the fact that you are almost twenty-two years old, and still heart-free. Nevertheless, I am not without fears that you will find it difficult to resist our little schoolmaster. Pray tell me, sweet niece, what the man must be, who can lay claim to your virgin affections?'

'Oh, perfect, of course. That is, handsome, graceful, talented and refined; lofty in his principles and pure in his feelings; eloquent, accomplished, agreeable, and not a schoolmaster.'

'Henry Waldo will never do for a lover for you then; yet I fancy you would like him as an acquaintance. He is, in the first place, three or four years younger than yourself. Would that be an obstacle?'

'Insuperable to a lover—of no consequence to a mere acquaintance.'

'He is plain, decidedly plain. With the exception of his eyes and forehead, he has no pretty feature. His smile, however, is irresistibly sweet. Light hair, blue eyes, and a fair skin, give him a very juvenile look, and his form, also, is boyish, if not ungraceful. So much for his personal appearance. Talented, he is, decidedly; eloquent, also, and refined. I have reason to believe that his principles are correct, though I cannot affirm it positively from the slight acquaintance I have with him. By the way, he is to lecture before our Lyceum to-morrow evening; so you will have an opportunity of judging of his talents and acquirements.'

'Lyceum? I didn't know that you were so literary here.'

'Ah! I see my pretty niece, that I shall have it in my power to remove some of your prejudices against country villages and schoolmasters. Intelligent and fastidious as you are, possibly you will not find our Lyceum utterly devoid of interest.'

'Oh I am already deeply interested, dear Aunt, especially in the young lecturer,' replied Madeline, laughing. And just as she said this, her crayon made a blunder upon the picture, which required some minutes labor with the India rubber to erase.

The next morning Phil called according to appointment, and found the picture finished in the neatest possible style. He was in ecstasies. Such another being as Miss Bartlett he did not believe existed in the world; and as for the picture,—he had never heard of Angelo and Raphael, but if he had, he certainly would never have dreamed they could have accomplished anything so perfect and beautiful as Madeline's picture of the village school-house, and the truant boys.

Madeline found her Aunt even more busy than on the preceding morning, preparing a variety of tea-table delicacies with true Yankee luxuriousness.

'Pray, Aunt, what is all this cake-making for? Are you preparing for a party?'

'No dear; but Henry Waldo will be here to tea, and you know he is a favorite of mine. Besides, he always praises my cake.'

'Is that the reason he is a favorite, Aunt? And so, you have taken the pains to invite him here that I may fall in love with him. You may be sure I shall resist out of pure obstinacy, if for no other reason.'

'Nay, Madeline, the little fellow will come of his own accord, if at all. He knows Uncle Jotham never goes out to public meetings, and also that I am very fond of going. For this reason he never fails to take tea with me on Thursday evenings, and afterwards accompany me to the Lyceum. He always likes, too, to have my opinion upon his lectures and debates, for he says I am the only one who will freely tell him his faults. So you see I have not made any wonderful effort to bring about an interview; and besides, I think it would be very absurd in me to project any love affair, after the "insuperable obstacles" you have pointed out.'

'Certainly, Aunt. But as he is so kind to you, and seems to enjoy so much of your confidence and esteem, I will endeavor to be as civil as possible to him, notwithstanding he is a schoolmaster.'

Madeline had some feminine feeling about her personal appearance, and Aunt Lydia silently observed that her lively niece was more becomingly attired than usual, when she entered the parlor an hour or two after dinner. She brought down several additional books, too, and laid them upon the table.

'I hope you have your drawings in order,' said Aunt Lydia. 'Our schoolmaster has a fine taste for pictures, and is, himself, somewhat of an artist.'

'No, Aunt, do not, on any consideration, let him imagine I ever saw a crayon. If you do, he will at once detect me as the author of that little sketch which I was so silly as to give away this morning.'

'You forget, Madeline, that he was watching you all the while from the window.'

'Oh well, there was certainly no harm in it, was there, Aunt, only I am afraid the fellow's vanity will be flattered.'

As she spoke, a rap at the door betokened the arrival of their visitor. Aunt Lydia opened it, and cordially welcomed Mr. Waldo, introducing him playfully to her city niece. The young schoolmaster was slightly embarrassed at meeting, so unexpectedly, a beautiful young lady in the sober dwelling of Uncle Jotham. However, he instantly recognized her, and recovering himself, alluded pleasantly to the scene which he had witnessed from the window the previous morning.

'I suppose,' he added, 'I am indebted to Miss Bartlett for a very neat and truthful little picture of my school-house. I found it in a conspicuous situation over my desk this morning. Phil, however, was very faithful—He would not betray his secret. He was a little vexed with me for carrying it away; but I knew it would be safer in my port-folio than it could be there.'

'Oh, indeed,' exclaimed Madeline, coloring deeply, greatly to her vexation; 'you should not have done that, for I intended it as a permanent ornament to the school-house. It is district property, I assure you. How could you have the presumption to appropriate it to yourself?'

The schoolmaster laughed, and made some playful apology, but did not seem inclined to relinquish his claim. Entering into good humored chat with Aunt Lydia, he allowed Madeline time to recover her self-possession. But presently Aunt Lydia was called out to prepare tea, and Madeline felt herself under obligations to act the agreeable. This she could always do successfully when she attempted it. Even with a schoolmaster, she was at no loss for subjects of conversation. She spoke of winter—of winter in the country—of Bryant's 'Winter Scene'—of Bryant himself—of American poets—of poetry in general—in short, of any subject which presented itself to her mind, and which she perceived interested her companion. In spite of herself, she was pleased with his remarks, and secretly wondered at the extent of his literary information. She laughed at his wit, so fresh, so spontaneous, so sparkling. She was interested by his manner, so simple, so earnest, so reverential. She almost thought him handsome when she saw his cheek glow, and his eye sparkle in the enthusiasm of the feelings with which he spoke of America, and of American literature.

'He is a patriot,' thought she. 'The love of his country is in his heart.' In short, she admired him as every person admires another of kindred feelings and opinions. She was ashamed of her prejudices—she acknowledged to herself that even a country schoolmaster was not necessarily disagreeable, and that all professions can receive embellishment from talent.

The time passed so agreeably in conversation, in the examination of books and pictures, among which were Madeline's drawings, that both of the young persons were quite amazed when Aunt Lydia entered with the intelligence that the hour of the Lyceum had arrived.

Having removed the white plumes, Madeline ventured this evening to wear her own hat and cloak. Just as they were leaving the door, Uncle Jotham appeared with the design of accompanying them. Madeline playfully offered him her arm, but he shook his cane at her, and declared he would walk with none but his liege wife. She was obliged, therefore, to accept the arm of Mr. Waldo, who did not look at all displeased with the arrangement.

They found the school-house already full, but by the courtesy of some of the gentlemen, the ladies were provided with seats. Madeline felt herself to be the object of considerable attention during the short interval which preceded the lecture. But when the little schoolmaster stepped upon the platform, every eye was directed to him. He betrayed some embarrassment at first—possibly his thoughts were upon this beautiful young lady who had recently leaned upon his arm—but having fairly entered upon his subject, enthusiasm conquered all feelings of restraint, and he spoke with his wonted eloquence and effect. His voice, without being musical, was capable of tones and variations as electric as they were subduing. Madeline could not avoid regarding him as a striking illustration of what mind and heart can do toward supplying external deficiencies. Who thought his features uncomely when lighted up by the brilliancy of thought and the fervor of lofty feeling? Who noticed the defect in his voice, when every nerve was thrilling beneath its soul-swayed intonations? Certainly not Madeline. She saw only the beauty of his spirit, and heard the deep sweet music of his thoughts. Nothing was to her so fascinating as intellect. Involuntarily she bowed down and paid it homage, no matter in what form enshrined, or in what capacity displayed. She revered that little schoolmaster as though he were of superior clay to the crowd that surrounded him. She was even willing that Aunt Lydia should perceive her admiration, though she very naturally desired to conceal its extent. Madeline was not in love—she had too much dignity of character to form any sudden and unwarranted attachment. We would not, therefore, have our readers imagine that we have designed to convey this impression. We only portray faithfully the influence which mind and heart can exercise upon a kindred spirit, despite the prejudices of education and conventional feeling. Madeline's imagination was excited, her taste was gratified, her feelings and sentiments met with an earnest and gentle response; was not this sufficient to justify the admiration and reverence of a young, romantic and enthusiastic girl? Love, however, is of less spontaneous growth. It is nurtured on a long and well-founded appreciation of moral worth, and spiritual loveliness. It matures slowly; it endures long and faithfully; it is almost invulnerable to decay and death. Such was not the sentiment Madeline now experienced.

On their return home, she hardly dared speak in commendation of his lecture, fearing lest she might be unintentionally ministering to vanity. And yet she felt that she wronged him by the thought; so to atone for the mental injury, she spoke out even more warmly than she at first intended. She awaited anxiously for the effect, fearful lest some gleam of gratified vanity should break the spell of reverence with which she regarded him.

For some moments he was silent. When he replied, his voice was tremulous, but fervent. 'I thank you from my heart, Miss Bartlett. Your praise, if it be sincere, and I will not doubt it, is gratifying to me for other than selfish reasons. I have a father—a kind old man who has been willing to sacrifice much for my education, and who is fondly looking forward to my success as the reward of all his cares and labors. You cannot wonder, Miss Bartlett, that for his sake, applause is dear to me. It is dear—I own it. And from you it is the more valuable, because I know you have a correct appreciation of beauty and of eloquence—and your approbation is an earnest of my future success in a higher and wider sphere. You must not think me ridiculous for receiving your commendations so seriously; light and frivolous as I may appear in my ordinary manners, the true element of my character is deep and serious feeling.'

Madeline felt tears upon her cheeks. The full moon was shining in her face, and so were Henry Waldo's eyes. She was glad, therefore, that their arrival at the house precluded the necessity of a reply; but the kindness of her voice as she bade him good night, was long treasured in his memory, and never reverted to but with a thrill of deep and mysterious joy.

A few evenings after, the schoolmaster called with his port-folio, which was half filled with colored miniatures—some done upon paper, others upon ivory. They were mostly likenesses of his friends—but a few were copies from the engraved heads of poets and distinguished men. Among others he showed Madeline a prettily colored paper-sketch of Aunt Lydia, which he had painted one evening when he had too bad a cold to read aloud, as was his usual custom, when paying her a visit. One of the most beautiful of the paintings was a miniature of his father, which Madeline admired much for its fine expression, and the blandness and benignity of the countenance.

'The countenance is a true emblem of the soul,' said the schoolmaster, earnestly. 'Here are two—the faces of my sisters, Miss Bartlett. They are plain girls, but good and intelligent. I am sorry I have no record of my mother's face—she died when I was an infant.'

'What an enviable art is this,' exclaimed Madeline, warmly, 'which can transfer to small surfaces the looks and lineaments of those we love. How I wish it were mine!'

The young schoolmaster's eyes sparkled. 'It easily can be, Miss Bartlett. You are already so practised in drawing, that a few lessons would be sufficient to initiate you into the mysteries of miniature painting. If you will not refuse so poor a teacher, I shall be very happy to employ some of the coming evenings in giving you all the little knowledge I possess.'

Madeline was slightly embarrassed by this proposition. That Henry Waldo was fond of being near her, was a fact she could not disguise from herself; and though she had but a very pardonable degree of vanity, she did verily believe that farther and familiar intercourse would increase this fondness. Ought she, believing this, to encourage his visits? Could she, without injury to her own and to his feelings, decline them?

'I cannot refuse so kind an offer,' she replied, in a voice that spite of herself faltered; 'but I am quite sure you will find me a discouraging pupil. I might possibly learn to copy a painting or engraving; but I fancy a living face would appal me.'

'That I should suppose would depend upon the character of the face—certainly some countenances are not appalling.' The schoolmaster said this with a look of such earnest admiration upon the sweet face before him, Madeline was fain to turn away to hide the blush that mantled upon her cheek. As she did so, she met Aunt Lydia's roguish smile, 'Ah,' thought she, 'Aunt Lydia sees that even a schoolmaster can have power over me. How ridiculous in me to blush so.'

We need not say that Henry Waldo was punctual in his hours of instruction—that Madeline was a zealous and patient pupil—and that her progress in painting likenesses was not more astonishing than the facility with which she learned to overcome her prejudices against schoolmasters.

One Saturday afternoon, for these seasons were also appropriated to the lessons, Waldo brought with him a fine antique head which he wished Madeline to copy.

'We will both take the picture, Madeline'—he had grown to call her Madeline, now—'and see which can do it most accurately.'

Having given her a few instructions, they went about their task, chatting merrily as they sat opposite to each other at the little round table. Aunt Lydia was near them with her knitting work. Madeline was not a mere copyist. She felt the inspiration of the art; and her pencil had not been long at work before her fair face became all radiant with thought and feeling. Four or five hours the young artists sat steadily at their tasks. At length Aunt Lydia told them they should not confine themselves any longer, but should go out for a walk, while she prepared tea for them. The young master eagerly seconded the proposition. When Aunt Lydia left the room, and Madeline was tying on her bonnet, he held up before her the picture on which he had been employed. Instead of the copy she expected to see, what was her surprise and embarrassment to discover a beautiful likeness of her own animated and expressive face!

'Why Henry!' she exclaimed; 'What have you done! It was not generous in you to take advantage of my unconsciousness. You must give the picture to me.'

'Indeed, Madeline, that is asking too much. If not generous in me to take it, it is not generous in you to require it of me. You must allow me to retain it.'

Madeline did not speak, but laying her hand gently on his arm, looked at him entreatingly with her tearful eyes. Henry blushed deeply. His own eyes were suffused, and he laid the picture carefully between the leaves of her portfolio. 'There is a more perfect and beautiful likeness in my heart, which you cannot take away, Madeline,' he said in low, earnest voice. 'But pardon me,' he added, in a calmer and more indifferent tone, turning at the same time toward the door; 'shall we walk now?'

Once out in the pure bracing air, their agitation was soon forgotten. They talked freely the bright thoughts of their young minds upon every object than surrounded them. In all things they betrayed a unison of feeling and taste. Can it be wondered that in their free and daily communion, a sweet, intoxicating consciousness of mutual sympathies, and kindred sentiments, should have sprung up and gradually filled their whole hearts? The result of this consciousness they dared not analyze. And yet its development could not be long delayed. Already had it begun to reveal itself in involuntary glances of tenderness; in throbbing pulses; in burning cheeks; in tearful eyes. On both sides there was doubt; with both, also, there was hope.

'How soon do you return to the city, Madeline?' inquired the young schoolmaster, as they paused at the brink of the little brook which was rejoicing in the freedom brought it by the first warm days of spring.

'Indeed,' said Madeline, starting; 'I have scarcely thought. As I came with the design of cheering merely the wintry hours to my Aunt, I shall have no excuse to prolong my stay now that beautiful Spring has come.'

'But we shall have many gloomy days yet. Our Spring, you know, is exceedingly capricious. And when those gloomy days come, Aunt Lydia will be more lonely than ever, if you are gone. And some one else will be lonely, too, Madeline.'

'I confess, Henry, I shall be sorry to leave. My visit has been very pleasant here, and I scarcely know when I can pass other days as happily. But I supposed you, also, were soon to leave.'

'In one month Madeline. In one month from this I shall be welcomed home to my father's house. To that home I shall carry the sweet picture which is painted on my heart; and it will be cherished there with tenfold sacredness.'

Dreading what was to follow, Madeline said hastily, and in a voice which to Henry's ear sounded cold and constrained, 'We must return to the house, Mr. Waldo. Aunt Lydia will be awaiting us.'

'Mr. Waldo' obeyed in silence. 'She is offended that I love her,' thought he. 'Well, I will not annoy her with protestations. I have strength, thank God, to smother my feelings in my own soul.'

From this time his visits to Uncle Jotham's became very rare; and when he did call, his intercourse with Madeline was constrained and brief. Aunt Lydia noticed the change, but forbore to mention it to either party, feeling that she had perhaps already gone too far in countenancing their intimacy. Henry was so young and destitute, she reasoned. He had not yet acquired his education, nor formed his character;—long engagements were usually unfortunate;—his feelings might very naturally change as he grew older,—and Madeline, too, was his senior.—She was liable to be sought by persons of more suitable age and condition.—All things future, too, were so uncertain,—it was, doubtless, altogether best the intimacy should cease.

It was a bright afternoon in April. There was a soft Indian summer haze in the atmosphere through which the sunbeams fell, warm and golden, upon the dappled slopes, and through the interstices of the trees into the paths of the woodlands.

Madeline was walking alone in the grassy lane of the woodland that bordered the village stream. On her arm hung a willow basket half full of wild roots, buds, and herbs. In her hand she carried a stout case-knife which she used for digging and cutting, but by the stains upon her fingers, it was evident she was not afraid to make use of those also.

The glow of exercise was upon her cheeks, and a corresponding brightness in her gentle blue eyes. Nevertheless, a slight expression of trouble now and then flitted like a shadow across her fair brow. Still she went on culling her simples as industriously as though her heart had been overflowing with joy. She was kneeling to gather some sprigs of the Chimaphila, when the sound of approaching footsteps startled her. Rising hastily, she encountered the young schoolmaster. He was looking pale and sad. Dropping her knife upon the ground, she affectionately extended her hand. He took it, pressed it gently, but instantly released it.

‘You are sick, Henry,’ she said. ‘It is a long while since I have seen you. I thought you had forgotten me. Are you not ill?’

‘Not at all. If I were, it would be but a matter of little concern to you.’

‘Henry!’ There was a whole volume of reproach in this simple exclamation, and it thrilled to the young man’s heart. ‘Forgive me,’ he said. ‘I ought not to doubt the kindness of your heart after the proof you have recently given of it. I have heard of your good deeds to old lady Whiston.’

‘Oh no particular goodness, Henry. The old woman was alone, and sick. Everybody else was occupied. I had nothing to do but nurse her. She is now nearly recovered. She thinks she should be perfectly well if she could only have a glass of ‘dire drink,’ as she calls it, occasionally. She dared trust no one to gather the herbs for her, for fear of poison, being too blind to inspect them herself. I told her I was perfectly au fait to the business—that I knew every herb and bush and tree, as well as the medicinal qualities of each. This she at first doubted. I, who had always lived in a city, she said, what could I know of ‘arbs? By naming over a long list, and specifying the particular properties of each, she was finally convinced. She consented to trust me—so you see in the basket yonder, the result of my last hour’s employment.’

‘Oh Madeline,’ said the young man somewhat bitterly. ‘You who are so kind to every living thing, however humble and unnoticed by others, why is it that you are alone cruel to me?’

‘Cruel, Henry? I certainly have not been—at least not intentionally.’

‘You have been cold, Madeline.’ She was silent. ‘You have been reserved.’ No answer. ‘You have cherished resentment against my presumption.’

‘“Resentment!” “Presumption!” you deceive yourself Henry. I have never cherished other than the kindest feelings for you.’

‘Madeline!’ he said, earnestly; taking her hand in his, ‘I desire above all things to believe you. As I shall leave town to-morrow, and may never see you again, let us not part in doubt of each other’s feelings—let not our former pleasant intercourse be overshadowed by later estrangement.’

The bright glow faded from Madeline’s cheek—her eye drooped—she had scarcely strength to support herself. ‘To-morrow!’ she exclaimed, in a faltering voice, ‘to-morrow! is it possible that you leave so soon?’

The young schoolmaster witnessed her emotion with a thrill of joy so intense it was almost painful. ‘It cannot be that she is indifferent to me he thought,—it cannot be!’

‘Sit down with me here, Madeline,’ he said, leading her to the mossy trunk of a fallen tree. ‘You know I love you, Madeline, more than it is necessary a master should love his pupil. It may seem like presumption in me to have hoped anything for this love—but, Madeline, was there ever an affection so lowly that it dared not hope? I thought sometimes that your eyes, that your voice responded to the tenderness of my own. I ventured to tell you of my love. You received my expressions coldly. By manner, if not by words, you forbade them. I ought not to complain that you did so—but there was an appearance of pride about you at those times which deeply wounded me. I could bear that my love should be rejected—but Oh Madeline, not scorned! Perhaps I misunderstood you. My affection is sensitive, it shrinks from the sacrilege of contempt. Tell me, dear Madeline, that I have wronged you.’

‘You have wronged yourself more,’ she replied, her face still buried in her handkerchief, to conceal the strong emotion working upon it. ‘You have wronged yourself by supposing for a moment that the affection of so good, so pure, so true a heart could awaken scorn in any human breast.’

‘God bless you, Madeline. I am inexpressibly thankful for these sweet words. Now hear me farther. I am, as yet, but a destitute boy. The humble salary of a village schoolmaster is laid carefully aside to meet the exigencies of a college education. Years must pass before I shall be prepared to engage actively in the duties and pursuits of manhood. My education and humble talents will be my only wealth.

Madeline, what right have I to love—particularly one superior to me in years, in wealth, in all personal and mental endowments? But more than all, what excuse have I for hope—hope, which is the aliment on which love feeds? When I think of these things my heart fails me. I am almost ready to despair. Tell me at once my doom, dear Madeline—and whatever it may be, God is my witness that I will not repine.'

Madeline lifted her head, and turned her blushing, animated face toward her lover. 'The sentence shall not be severe,' she replied, in a voice that fell on his ear like delicious music. 'Were not every lover permitted to apotheosize his lady, I should chide you for the comparisons you have made. I allow that I am your superior in years, perhaps also in wealth—but certainly in all other respects I am more than commensurably your inferior. I deny not that I love you as I never have loved, never can love another. Yet I have shrunk from making this avowal—shrunk even from hearing your confession, but not because I was proud. The future is so uncertain, Henry. You who are so old in knowledge and in talent, are yet young in years and feelings. Six or eight years of your age, make wonderful changes even in the most constant heart. While you are yet in the bloom of manhood—the most joyous period of your life—I shall be passing into the shadow of mature and serious years. Will you love me as well when you see time drawing his unlovely traces upon my cheeks—perhaps even scattering silver hairs upon my head? Shrink not from thinking of all these things, Henry. You must bring them seriously home to your heart, and ask its love if through all these sober changes it can survive as fresh and sincere as now. If romance, if reason tells you it cannot, I beg you to crush it in the bud, rather than leave it to grow old and decay.'

'Madeline! Madeline! if I loved you for your beauty, I might indeed tremble for the constancy of my feelings. But mind, heart—these cannot change in you, except to grow yet more beautiful. Oh doubt me not, Madeline. In sentiment I am not young, for as I told you once before, the true element of my nature is deep and serious feeling. Romance may play upon the surface, but beneath are deep and silent waters. I do not ask you to plight your faith to me, Madeline. I would not be so ungenerous. You have said that you love me, and this assurance is sufficient. Sufficient! heaven knows I have no words to thank you for it. I will bear it with me as a sacred charm through long years of study and toil. It shall spur me on to do and be something worthy of your respect. We shall see each other sometimes, dear Madeline. At Cambridge I shall be near you, and shall not suffer you to forget me.'

We leave the remainder of the conversation, so interesting to the parties, to be imagined by our readers. It was in the common parlance of lovers—a sweet language to those who speak it from their hearts. Little plans were laid; dawning hopes were uttered, present assurances given. The poor old lady's herbs were forgotten till the falling shadows of evening warned them it was too late to think of adding anything to the store; so they returned arm in arm to Aunt Lydia's, happy and hopeful, but with a shadow on their brows at the thought of parting.

As the young schoolmaster was to leave early in the morning he did not long delay his adieus. A few minutes after he had gone, Aunt Lydia drew her chair close beside Madeline, and placed her arm tenderly around her neck.

'I feel really sad,' she said, 'that our little schoolmaster is gone. He has been here so much, particularly since you have been here, Madeline, that I have become quite attached to him. How unfortunate there should be such "insuperable obstacles" to your liking him.'

'Oh Aunt, those obstacles have all vanished!'

'How can that be?' said Aunt Lydia, laughing. 'Even if you have been drinking of the fountain of immortal youth, time has not passed rapidly enough to bring Henry Waldo up to the point where you stood when you first saw him—and the difference in your ages was emphatically the obstacle, you remember. Moreover, Madeline, whatever you may think, I cannot see that he has grown vastly handsome—though I always thought his countenance interesting. Besides, he still belongs to that odious race to which you profess such an antipathy. He is a schoolmaster, Madeline.'

'Dear Aunt!' exclaimed the blushing girl, throwing both arms around her friend's neck, and hiding her face upon her bosom; 'I was very foolish to talk as I did. How little did I know of my own heart, or of its susceptibilities—How little, I may also say, did I know of Henry Waldo. I fear I have been imprudent in so freely yielding him my affections—but it seemed vain to strive against it.'

'You have not engaged yourself to Henry, have you Madeline,' inquired Aunt Lydia a little anxiously.

'No Aunt, he did not ask it.'

'That was right in him. But there has been a mutual avowal, has there not?'

'Yes.'

'Well, I have been so indulgent toward this attachment, I dare not chide you for it, now. But promise me, Madeline, that you will tell the whole story to your father and mother, as soon as you return.'

'I shall certainly do so, Aunt. It is my wish, and it was also Henry's request.'

We know not how we can more satisfactorily close our long story, (which we intended should have been short when we commenced) than with the following note from Aunt Lydia, written the ensuing winter, and Madeline's interesting reply.

AUNT LYDIA TO MADELINE BARTLETT.

My dear Madeline :—What has become of that generous pity, which led you last year at this season to make me that most memorable visit? Let's see if I cannot offer you some inducement to come? We have a young schoolmaster here—ah! I forgot—schoolmasters, I remember, are your aversion—nevertheless, he has some qualities you admire, being handsome and graceful, as well as several years your senior—an indispensable qualification, if I remember aright. Will not he be an attraction?

By the way, speaking of schoolmasters, where is Henry Waldo, and how progresses that little romance you and he so skilfully wove? Will you not write me about it, if you cannot come? Do write, and believe me very affectionately, your aunt,

LYDIA BIRNEY.

MADELINE BARTLETT TO AUNT LYDIA.

My dear Aunt:—I have but a moment to reply to your note—permit me, therefore to be brief. I would gladly comply with your kind invitation, but I fear a visit to the country just now, would sadly interfere with my lessons in miniature painting, which you may remember were first commenced under your peaceful roof. They are still under the auspices of the same teacher, who comes in from Cambridge every Saturday, and remains over Sabbath with us. From this one fact, you are permitted to draw all probable inferences.

Your 'schoolmaster' would be very attractive so far as his profession is concerned—my aversion having changed to a strong liking; but his beauty would be an 'insuperable obstacle' to any partiality on my part. I regard beauty as a foppish appendage, rather than as a necessary qualification; and as for the superior years, I assure you, dear Aunt, it is exceedingly foolish to regard age in an affair of the heart.

Next summer I will pay you a visit.—Till then believe me most affectionately your niece,

MADELINE BARTLETT.

P. S. H. W. has just arrived. 'My love to Aunt Lydia,' he says.

'CHOICE IN MATRIMONY. The whole secret in choosing well in matrimony may be taught in three words—explore the character. A violent love fit is always the result of ignorance; for no daughter of Eve has merit enough to justify romantic love, though thousands may reasonably inspire gentle esteem, which is infinitely better. A woman-worshiper and a woman-hater both derive their mistakes from ignorance of the female world, for if the characters of women were thoroughly understood, they would be too good to be hated, and yet not good enough to be idolized.'

ELEGIATIC STANZAS.

BY MRS. L. J. B. CASE.

Miss M. A. T. P. died at K—n, N. H., May 2, 1842, aged 20. A very beautiful and interesting girl.

Go, gentle spirit, to thy kindred go,
Go where the loving eyes await thee still,
And the sweet streams that found no course below,
Shall flow where death hath lost the power to chill.

Thou couldst not linger here when all had fled,
And sunny smiles that o'er thy childhood shone,
Came but in dreams around thy midnight bed,
But left thy waking pathway sad and lone.

Cradled in sorrow and baptized in tears,
And reared amid the shadows of the tomb,
Through the brief period of thy sinless years,
What saw'st thou of existence save its gloom?

Yet innocence and youth around thee cast
That cheerful light no cloud can ever dim,
And 'mid the memories of the mournful past,
Thy heart still listened to hope's joyous hymn;

Till hope at last went by, as, one by one,
Each household voice grew fainter on thine ear;
Then didst thou feel thine earthly tasks were done,
And go to seek them in a happier sphere.

How shall we mourn thee, loveliest spirit, now,
Though sadness meets us where thy footsteps trod?
Thou hast immortal beauty on thy brow,
And with the lost doth lift thy praise to God!

Portland, Me.

HAVE A REASONING MIND.

AN ARGUMENT AGAINST ENDLESS MISERY.

I PASSED a lady yesterday just as she remarked to a companion—'Any reasoning mind would come to the same conclusion.' I know not to what she alluded, but I went on my way musing on the various applications which might be given to the remark. There is one more important than all the rest, because it involves great consequences—mental, moral, and practical. It is in reference to the rejection of the popular doctrine of endless misery, for we think any reasoning mind must come to the same conclusion to which we have arrived. Thousands adhere to the profession of faith in that gloomy doctrine, simply because they will not reason upon the subject—they will not exercise calmly and patiently their reasoning minds; and consequently they live having really no opinion but one received as unquestioned as the rock receives the influences that harden it more. It should not be so. The glory of mind should be recognized and revered, and the unbound and invigorated intellect should be permitted to grapple with the most time honored and sacred subjects. 'The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord,' and surely there is nothing too sacred for its light to shine upon, that it may be thoroughly examined and its claims to divinity tested.

To aid in this work in one particular, we give an extract from a sermon on Retribution by Rev. Henry Giles, of Liverpool—who the last winter lectured in several of our cities most eloquently on the characteristics of the Irish, and on the history of Ireland. In the following passages from his sermon, he graphically portrays the vast consequences involved in the common doctrine of endless misery. We wish every mind would reason with him—take what he says and deliberately think upon it fearlessly, and examine every position in the light of awakened reason. It will do good to many a one now in the darkness and shadows of a path strewn with splendid and with awful ruins.

'Pain,' says Mr. Giles, 'pain affects us, as it comes near to us. The war, or famine, or any other calamity that afflicts a nation afar off, is a vague report or a distant rumor; it may not pass unheard, but comparatively it is unfelt. It requires that grief shall touch and sting us in our selfishness; that we may know fully and truly what it inflicts on others. And it is thus that God at once rebukes and cures our insensibility, by bringing loss and sorrow home to our own souls: the withered gourd wrung tears from the surly and unamiable prophet: but the prospect of Nineveh with her mighty population in ashes had nothing with which to touch the fountains of his sorrows.*

'Admitting as I do that there is much of selfishness in our nature, yet persuaded that there is also much of sympathy and mercy in it, taking either the character of God, or that of man as a criterion, I have long regarded the belief of eternal punishment as one of those moral paradoxes which you cannot deny, and for which you cannot account. Most of the humane creatures, so far as they accord with their humanity, shrink from inflicting or beholding pain; and when they can inflict it wantonly, or behold it without compassion, we can pronounce on them no sentence of deeper reprobation than to call them inhuman. We tread not knowingly on the crawling worm; we hear not insensibly the inarticulate voice of the sick and dumb animal; and yet many of us who would not look unmoved on the last spasms of an expiring dog, can believe that God regards with ruthless sternness the eternal tortures of eternal spirits. We cannot gaze without compassion on the tear in the infant's speechless eye, and yet some of us can believe that God has created such beings to look up through all eternity from hopeless torture. We cannot think of the racks by which tyrant man has tortured his brother man—on the dungeons in which he has imprisoned him, and shut out from him the sun of heaven and the breath of nature, without a feeling of repugnance and a sentiment of indignation, and yet christians can believe that God, whom they call "the good, the merciful," has constructed for his creatures means of undying anguish and dungeons of boundless darkness, where the smile of hope never gleams, where the light of mercy never comes. We lament war, and yet, if orthodox, we believe that God maintains in his dominions, regions of everlasting warfare; we lament the madness and abuse of passion, and yet, if orthodox, we must believe that God allows that madness and abuse to be eternalized in all their extreme malignity. We lament physical and mental suffering; except on the visitation of mercy none of us would desire to go through the lazar house, where despair and anguish lay low together, where the head is heavy and the pulse is fevered, or through those asylums which give refuge to humanity in its last calamity, and worst; and yet, if orthodox, we can believe that God perpetrates through everlasting ages the worst evils of the body, the fiercest passions, and the most awful madness of the soul. And yet this great glorious universe is his—is his workmanship—it came not up in a night, it is not to perish in a night—the earth is long to be green, and the heavens are long to be bright. Throughout the space that has no limit, throughout the time that has no end, the stars are to shine, and systems are to move onward in their unmeasured and trackless glory. And yet, if orthodox, we must believe there is an endless hell whose smoke of torments must ascend forever against their brightness. These, the works of God's hands, are marred—the majesty of his power defeated. Paradise is made a wilderness, and hell is made populous. If we think of the world with any degree of realizing truth, we shall feel the result to be most tremendous, and we shall wonder that God with infinite power should have created such a lovely universe to be defaced; that he should have peopled it with such capacities only to be immense and eternal capacities for misery. This, if true, is the greatest miracle and the greatest mystery unquestionable in the divine government.

Next to the idea of a God, that of a future state is the most important. The character we ascribe to God operates on our own, or is created by it; and so our conceptions of the future life re-act on human conduct and human sentiments. We may see this painfully in the mistakes and abuses with which harsh views of the future life have clouded the christian church, and poisoned the heart of christendom. These gloomy sentiments have from many robbed religion of solace and the breast of peace. I have seen beings maddened and convulsed by visions of Calvinism. I have heard them long for annihilation as a consummation most desirable—not in the remorse of sin, but in the tortures of superstition. I have seen them look forward with pleasure to the church yard turf under which they were to rest forever from their troubles, and sleep in peace their eternal sleep. This sombre belief has at once desolated and darkened the earth. Faith it has turned to a boundless fear; the dread of the future it makes the bitterness of the present, and is equally the parent of stern self-infliction, or of remorseless intolerance. It was this that in older days drove the ascetic to the desert; that made nature and the face of his fellow hateful to him; that filled his ferocious solitude with unearthly terrors; that trained instead of a saint, a theological savage; it was this which aroused religious wars; which infused into those wars a spirit of fury; that demonized humanity; that made a most merciful nature a stranger to mercy; it was this which brought man in nearest resemblance to that vile and wicked being whom his worst and blackest passions had formed; it was this belief that tore out a heart of flesh, and put in its place a heart of stone—a heart which no appeal could soften, and which no appeal could move. It was not until there was a hell without hope that there was a heart without mercy. I believe it to be quite capable of proof, that no mere worldly wickedness has ever cursed mankind with so many sufferings as the belief of this doctrine; that has ever heaped on them so many cruelties, and made them agents of cruelties in return. Why have wars for religion ever been the worst? The reason is obvious; the soldiers of religion are not soldiers of flesh; the soldiers of religion enter into no earthly service; they enlist under the God of battles and of vengeance. It is against the hated, and the vile, and the accursed, and the lost, they carry destruction; they are but the executioners of the righteous decrees of God, and theirs are the championship of piety and the chivalry of heaven. When the weak contend with the weak, mutual need begets mutual mercy; but when the natural ferocity of passion assumes the authority of God, and clothes itself with the armor of the skies, the gulf in which all charity is buried is broad and unfathomable as that which is commonly placed between heaven and hell. This belief was one of the main causes of the most horrible religious persecutions. It was not until the generous and gentle sensibility of the religious nature was debased by coarse picturings of physical tortures and of endless miseries, that the sacerdotal arm became terrible as death, and the sacerdotal spirit was drenched in wrath as dire and unrelenting as that which they fashioned beyond the grave. Before priestly and popular imaginations God became an awful punisher. They created in heaven a throne of inexorable judgment, and from that throne the word of fate went forth which could but once be spoken, and cut off hope forever. They freed themselves from human compunctions, and emulated the stern despotism which they preached or believed. Fear is the parent of cruelty—and in religion, as in character, the slavish spirit is ever the most unfeeling. The truth is, that whether in idea or in act, familiarity with torture stupifies the heart, and indurates the senses. That frequent contemplation of pain destroys sympathy, and that pain, when once it can be carelessly seen, can be easily inflicted, are facts which observation has placed beyond the need of argument, and experience beyond the reach of contradiction.'

'PONDER THE PATH OF THY FEET.'

AN IMPROMPTU.

BY IONE.

A GULF doth yawn before thee. Thou art treading
E'en as a child upon an adder's nest!
With dazzled vision, thou thy course art threading
Mid tangled paths that have no goal of rest!

Beware the phantom thou art now pursuing
With the wild energy of baffled will!
Beware the spirit thou art now imbuing
With giant strength to lead thee captive still!

Pause for a moment. List the gentle pleading
Of the undying monitor within;
Though thou art now its angel voice unheeding,
It strives to win thee from the verge of sin!

Pause thou again—if yet the power remaineth—
And drive the phantom from thy path away!
Rekindle in thy breast the spark that waneth,
And, fed with care, 'twill burn to perfect day.

THE DEPARTED.

CONSOLATORY—TO A BEREAVED FRIEND.

BY REV. JOHN G. ADAMS.

'Quenched is the spirit's light,
From the filmed vision of our mortal eyes,
Extinguished here to shine beyond the skies
The more intensely bright.'

THE night, my dear friend, has come; and I have wept with you in your bereavement and desolateness in this lone hour. And although through the long day excessively occupied, yet a pause must be had—a sacred pause—full of deep reality—impressive thought—wonderful instruction—unutterable emotion. Come faith, come hope,—speak the word of inspiration! Tell us, creatures of frailty and dust, not so much of our earthly weakness, as of our heavenly strength; not so much of death, as of life; not of the 'Flickering pulse, glazed eye, and brow with shadow o'er it thrown;'

of death, with its dreariness and darkness, its damps and chills, its shrouds and tombs; but of freedom from all these; of the resurrection, of heaven, glory, honor and immortality! Soothe and bless us with assurances of 'a better country, that is, an heavenly,' where God shall wipe away all tears, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain. On this holy mission,

'Come—condescending Spirit—come!'

You are sufficiently acquainted with my heart to anticipate in some degree my thoughts concerning you on this impressive occasion. Deeply do I feel with you that we have lost a friend, sister, companion, mother, and Christian; one whose virtues were continually weaving new cords of affection around us, binding our spirits more closely to her own. Solemnly are we led to look upon the past when life and actual intercourse were so free, and contrast that with the present, upon which such a cloud of darkness has been lowered. She whom we loved has departed. No more shall we greet her 'this side the realm where angels have their birth.' God help us to say 'tis well! tis well!'

During my acquaintance with that now sainted spirit of our mutual Christian affection, it has seemed to me that we were forbidden to promise ourselves too much in her earthly presence with us. She has ever seemed to understand that at no distant period she would give us the word of departure, and go to her other—her everlasting home. This impression on my mind has rendered my acquaintance with her one of melancholy pleasantness, and my sympathy for you in view of her departure such, as knowing my own susceptibilities, I have never attempted to describe. This I cannot now do. My soul is too full for adequate utterance. Let us be still, and know that God reigns.

You sorrow; and well you may. You and your tender offspring now sustain an irreparable loss.

'Many may love them—and you, in truth,
Be loved—but not with the love of youth;
Ever around your joy will come
A stealing sigh for that long-loved home,
And her step and her voice will go glidingly by
In the desolate halls of memory!'

This is the dark side. But when at frequent times you view it, do not forget to cast an eye upon the other. In God's chastisements forget not his mercies. How full of thanksgiving should you be that the Father of all ever gave you such a companion; that so long he permitted you to hold communion with such a spirit; a spirit that has infused its like into your loved offspring—into your own heart—into every thing connected with your hallowed home. She has sanctified that home forever. Give thanks! And then, she was a Christian;—she was a CHRISTIAN. And when I say this, the dark cloud is pierced with a light above the brightness of the sun; the mists scatter; and a radiance from the everlasting throne bids gloom depart, and rejoicing come. 'O grave, where is thy victory?'

Therefore, faint not. Walk on. True, the pathway is dark just now, and you seem bewildered. But this is the way—right on;—and God is here—and Christ—and ministering spirits. You will not be forsaken. Pray—praise—have faith! Say, 'Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him.' You know the rest. 'They that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion that cannot be removed, but abideth forever.' So trust, and so abide.

Sainted spirit of the departed! Never will the holy influence given out by thee when in thy earthly habitation, leave this soul. Thy mildness, faithfulness, decision, resignation; how have they instructed me, and with what earnest pleading comes thy life to make me faithful, vigilant, and true, 'always abounding in the work of the Lord!' And now thou hast gone up to thy rest, and we are to see thee no more, we will rejoice in thy emancipation, and still commune together. 'One in Christ Jesus,' may we not? Clothed upon as thou art with thy heavenly house, wilt thou not continue to instruct and bless us?

Accept, beloved friend, this involuntary outpouring of my meagre thoughts. Poor though they be, they are thine,—all I can bestow. But they are fresh from the heart,—a heart whose prayers and sympathies will mingle with yours while hand in hand we walk the shores of time, awaiting in faith our departure to that better land where sorrow and death come not, and life immortal reigns.

'Anoint, O Lord, anoint our sight,
And fit us for that world of light!'

BRIGHTER YEARS.

BY MISS M. A. DODD.

COME, cheer thee love, for the shades of night
Are fading fast in the early light;
The fresh winds wake and the vapors fly,
While the clouds disperse from the rosy sky;
And see, o'er the purple hills afar,
The blessed beam of the morning star!
O, forget the night of thy pain and tears,
And look to the dawn of brighter years!

Thou hast watched and wept, and thy cheek is pale,
Thy lips are wan and thy footsteps fail,
And traces of tears and anguish lie
In the hollow depths of thy faded eye:
O, how freely now would I yield my life,
Could I bring back joy to my injured wife!
There is One above who has marked thy tears,
He will bless thee yet with brighter years.

The bloom on thy cheek the rose defied,
When I led thee forth a happy bride :
Years, sad years, since that hour have flown,
And the hue of health from its place is gone ;
It would ease my heart of this weary pain,
Could I call the rose to thy cheek again.
Let me wipe away all thy bitter tears
With the cheering hope of brighter years.

Thou wert young and gay when I won thy heart,
Thou hast seen the joy of thy life depart ;
Thou hast met reproach and neglect the while,
And gave me back but an angel smile ;
Thou hast suffered want and many an ill,
But thy heart is fond and forgiving still :
Let us turn from the past with its grief and tears,
And look through the clouds to brighter years.

Oh ! thy patient love has been to me,
Like an island green in the wide, deep sea ;
Like a cooling stream to the fevered taste,
Or the shady palm in a burning waste.
I have wandered long in a gloomy night,
Where thy constant love was my only light :
Let that light beam through thy silent tears ;
Let thy heart still hope for brighter years.

From the revel loud where the wine flowed free,
I have turned again to my home and thee ;
I have dashed from my lips the poison bowl,
And prayed for help to redeem my soul ;
I have mourned with my spirit bowed in dust,
O'er thy wasted hopes and thy broken trust ;
But I trembling look through repentant tears,
To peace restored and to brighter years.

O, ask of heaven that the sinful one,
Whose work of reform is but just begun,
May conquer the foe, and keep the faith,
Through temptation strong, through pain and death ;
May he strive, with the aid of One above,
To reward thee yet for thy suffering love ;
May he see thee smiling through blissful tears,
And know thou art blest with brighter years !

BIOGRAPHY. NO. I.

MARY HOWITT.

ONE of the sweetest poets to wake kindly feelings and strengthen good affections, is Mary Howitt. Pure as a mountain stream gliding like a silver vein through an emerald in the meadow, is her poetry ; near to the heart does she bring the good, the true, and the beautiful ; and upon the reverent spirit does she pour the kindly influence of a pure heart that sees God everywhere. Her voice finds a universal response, and we have been right glad to read from her 'Birds and Flowers' and watch the pleasant light radiating every countenance of a large company, manifesting that she so speaks that all are willing to listen. She is childhood's poet, and many a mother blesses Mary Howitt.

The following brief sketch we give with pleasure. Its origin we know not. It will give greater interest to her works.

Mary Howitt was born in Coleford, in Gloucestershire, where her parents were making a temporary residence ; but shortly after her birth they returned to their accustomed abode at Uttoxeter, in Staffordshire, where she spent her youth. The beautiful arcadian scenery of this part of Staffordshire, was of a character to foster a deep love of the country ; and is described with great accuracy in her recent prose work, "Wood Leighton." By her mother she is descended from an ancient Irish family, and also from Wood, the ill-used Irish patentee, who was ruined by the selfish malignity of Dean Swift,—from whose aspersions his character was vindicated by Sir Isaac Newton. A true statement of the whole affair may be seen in Ruding's "Annals of Coinage." Charles Wood, her grandfather, was the first who introduced platina into England from Jamaica, where he was assay-master. Her parents being strict members of the Society of Friends, and her father being, indeed, of an old line who suffered persecution in the early days of Quakerism, her education was of an exclusive character ; and her knowledge of books confined to those approved of by the most strict of her own people, till a later period than most young people become acquainted with them. Their effect upon her mind was, consequently, so much the more vivid. Indeed, she describes her overwhelming astonishment and delight in the treasures of general and modern literature, to be like what Keats says his feelings were when a new world of poetry opened upon him, through Chapman's "Homer,"—as to the astronomer,

"When a new planet swims into his ken."

Among poetry there was none which made a stronger impression than our simple old ballad, which she and a sister near her own age, and of similar taste and temperament, used to revel in, making at the same time many young attempts in epic, dramatic, and ballad poetry. In her twenty-first year she was married to William Howitt, a gentleman well calculated to encourage and promote her poetical and intellectual taste,—himself a poet of considerable genius, and the author of various well-known works. We have reason to believe that her domestic life has been a singularly happy one. Mr. and Mrs. Howitt spent the year after their marriage in Staffordshire. They then removed to Nottingham, where they continued to reside till about twelve months ago ; and are now living at Esher, in Surrey.

Mary Howitt published jointly with her husband two volumes of poems, "The Forest Minstrel," in 1828 ; and "The Desolation of Eyam, and Other Poems," in 1827. In 1834, she published "The Seven Temptations," a series of dramatic poems, a work which, in other times would have been alone sufficient to have made and secured a very high reputation; her dramas are full of keen perceptions, strong and accurate delineations, and powerful displays of character. She is now preparing for the press a collection of her most popular ballads, a class of writing in which she greatly excels all her contemporaries; many of them are favorably known to the public through the periodicals in which, at various times, they have appeared. She is also well known to the young by her "Sketches of Natural History," "Tales in Verse," and other productions, written expressly for their use and pleasure.

Mrs. Howitt is distinguished by the mild, unaffected, and conciliatory manners, for which "the people called Quakers" have always been remarkable. Her writings, too, are in keeping with her character; in all there is evidence of peace and good will; a tender and a trusting nature; a gentle sympathy with humanity; and a deep and fervent love of all the beautiful works which the Great Hand has scattered so plentifully before those by whom they can be felt and appreciated. She has mixed but little with the world; the home duties of wife and mother have been to her productive of more pleasant and far happier results than struggles for distinction amid crowds; she has made her reputation quietly but securely; and has labored successfully as well as earnestly to inculcate virtue as the noblest attribute of an English woman. If there be some of her contemporaries who have surpassed her in the higher qualities of poetry,—some who have soared higher and others who have taken a wider range,—there are none whose writings are better calculated to delight as well as inform. Her poems are always graceful and beautiful, and often vigorous; but they are essentially feminine; they afford evidence of a kindly and generous nature, as well as of a fertile imagination, and a safely-cultivated mind. She is entitled to a high place among the poets of Great Britain; and a still higher among those of her sex, by whom the intellectual rank of woman has been asserted without presumption, and maintained without display.

RELIGION ENJOYED.

I just took up a small scrap of paper that contained what appeared to be the heading of a newspaper article—'The man who enjoys his religion.' Of course, said I to myself, he must have a religion that can be enjoyed, and it is not so with all professed religionists. Some tell us of their religion making life 'a cruel bitter;' and others tell us of their going forth into the depths of the forest that they might groan and weep aloud to give ease to their anguished spirits. Thousands have imprisoned themselves in the gloom of the cloister, and lived separated from their kind—from everything bright and cheerful. Such had a religion that could not be enjoyed. It was bitterness to them; and filling their souls with gloom, it made everything of a cheerful nature to be repulsive as 'songs to a heavy heart,' or light to a diseased eye.

The spiritually practical Universalist is the man to enjoy his religion. He has a religion that, like the sunshine, is always pleasant, and touches nothing without gilding it with beauty. It is in his soul like a fountain of living waters; it impels the upspringing of glad thoughts, which are as beautiful as the watery pearls of the leaping streams glistening in the sunshine, and sweet as those drops when they make their home in the violet's cup.

He bears his religion with him everywhere. It is a part of his very being. It gives a zest to labor. It restrains aright in pleasure. It dictates his studies and reading. It governs him in conversation. It makes him courteous at all times. It is candor, charity, kindness, forbearance, or whatever he needs to keep him true to his personal integrity and faithful to the duties of his social relations.

He can enjoy his religion when there is nothing else for him to enjoy. It is 'songs in the night' when sleep deserts him. It is 'the sweetness of his couch' in the time of sickness and weariness. It is the light of the shadowy valley, when the pulse of life beats faint. It is the praises of seraphim when the ear is dull to all human sounds. It is 'Victory!' in the last struggle, and gives 'Halleluia!' to the last breath.

Such has Universalism been to the spiritually practical believer. The mere theorist does not, and cannot know this enjoyment.

THE WANDERER TO HIS MOTHER.

BY MRS. N. THORNING MUNROE.

I HAVE come again, my mother,

I have come again to thee;

The wanderer loves no other,

O say wilt thou welcome me?

The waters seek their fountain,

The birds their parent tree,

The wild deer flies to th' mountain,

And, mother, I come, to thee.

All restless things do seek their home,

For this, thy wandering boy hath come.

As the child at the sunset hour,

From his play with that bird and flower,

Comes wearied and tired at last,

When the shadows are gathering fast,

And leans his head on his mother's breast,

Murmurs his prayers and sinks to rest;—

E'en so would I come and I'd kneel,

At thy feet, as I've knelt of yore,
And kind mother, O let me feel
Thy hand on my brow once more,
And let me breathe that simple prayer,
That I learned in my childhood's hour,
'My Father in Heaven,' O where
Have the words such a holy power,
As when breathed at this holy shrine,
Now 'tis said, and sweet mother mine
Let me lay my head on thy gentle breast,
And calmly and sweetly I'll sink to rest.

For the world is a sad, sad place,
And I've longed for my quiet home;
I have longed for thy sweet, mild face,
For thy kind and gentle tone.
My heart is stricken; is this thy boy
Who left thee wild, with untamed joy?
I have tasted of joy on earth,
But the cup has long passed by;
I have joined with the lovers of mirth,
And laughed, when the glad were nigh.
I have breathed the fond words of love,
And worshipped a being of clay;
But a voice—a word from above,
And my idol had passed away!
Then I turned me and sought for fame,
And e'en as I spake, it was near,
It was but a sound, but a name,
And touched not the heart, but the ear.
'Twas frailer than love, for a breath
Could blast it with poison and death;
Then I turned to wealth and I sought
For the riches a monarch might share,
The wealth of the Indies were sought,
They were mixed up with sorrow and care.
But a bright, and a sudden light
Gleamed at once on my spirit's night,
A tone—and as memory went back
To my childhood's familiar track,
On my brow a soft hand was laid,
A sweet voice all my murmurings staid,
And it said, 'Come back to thy home,
To the one heart that loves thee, come.'
And mother, sweet mother, I'm here,
'Tis thy voice and thy tone can cheer;
The wanderer comes on thy breast
To sink to his last, long rest!

MUSIC PICTURES.

BY MRS. L. J. B. CASE.

[In a late No. we gave an elegant article from Mrs. Case, entitled 'Music Visions,' and we opine that our readers will be glad to greet the following as the companion of that sweet prose poem. We extract it from the 'Star of Bethlehem,' and feel happy in knowing that thus we shall present it to thousands who never greeted that paper.]

THERE! Just let down those curtains. I would not that envious snow should be looking in on our comfortable fireside. It is doing mischief enough, in freezing the ears of the traveller, and benumbing the fingers of the errand boy who has just gone to the Post Office. It has no business to thrust its saucy face in at our windows, telling us long, sad tales. There! That will do. Now, one stir of the poker, to give the coal a warning. Now, draw your chair to the Piano. Do not be frightened. I know you are no lover of melody, nor will I inflict on you any of these desperate marches, with their jangling imitations of a martial array, nor will I torture you with any of these die-away songs—but know you not my little music book is a mighty magician, at least to me, and these mysterious signs, the mere performer calls notes, are the spells of a powerful necromancy? I know you love not music, but you love to sit in the dim light, and listen to the wild vagaries that flit through my mind. You often say my voice is musical when I am telling you of the unearthly scenes, and the vague, visionary forms, that crowd my thoughts until they force themselves into language. Well, love, to-night I have no tales of the shadowy, spiritual existence—no visions of that mysterious realm, that, whether we will or not, at times unlocks itself to our communion, till the soul is faint and trembling before the solemn grandeur of its revealings. But I will show you the past as it comes forth at the bidding of the magician. Hark! That sleet will not be forgotten! But never mind. Now lean that broad, high forehead on the Piano, and shut your eyes, and you shall see sights.

A few strains of music, mine own, just to summon the spirits. Lightly, softly, they will not come else, for some of them have made their abodes in the land of ceaseless harmony.

One strain of the Vale of Ovoca. Hark! as it dies away, there is a rustle of leaves stirred by the summer air. There is the note of the robin, and the shrill whistle of the locust, in the linden-tree, that one linden. It is an ancient country-house. The moss of years is on its roof. Tall, aristocratic-looking elms droop even to the arch of the old-fashioned doorway, and the lilac and the rose are curious about the interior of the mansion. Time has been upon it, and while you gaze, you are thinking of a generation that has passed from beneath its portals,—some to a home of yet busier action, and some to that rest no turmoil can disturb. These old rooms are full of memories. Shadows glide through them in the twilight. We listen for the sound of invisible wings. These chambers, so still, so sacred to repose, with low windows looking out on the quietness abroad; these are no rooms for sleep. They are haunted to such as you and I. Strange sounds wander through their darkness. The summer night is full of them. Echoes of voices long silent, are creeping through the gloom. And when the winds are unloosed, you will lie awake with your whole soul thrilling to the grand organ-tones that sweep through these old trees in the depth of midnight, or, as they moan in their gentler moods along the keyholes, you will be thinking of the wail of human life, and the solemn lesson of its eventful journey from the cradle to the bier.

It is evening—and a small family group are gathered in that parlor. The old man is leaning upon a cane. That noble head betokens intellect, and moral elevation, but the eye has a subdued light. Sickness has spread a haze over the mind, but left undimmed the affections. Is not this a beautiful sign-manual of heaven, in token of their enduring nature? Surely God has thus witnessed their claim to immortality, by a visible and never-to-be-questioned impression on the undying soul. The lamp stands in a shaded corner of the apartment. A kind, matronly face looks anxiously at the aged one, so feeble in his premature decline. A rosy-cheeked girl is near, with sweet fifteen in her joyous face. At the Piano sits another, older and paler than the former, and thought has already thrown a shadow over her young brow. She has pondered the mysteries of life, and death, till the world wears a saddened look. Yet the shadow is of the slightest tone. Years may deepen it; yet fear not for her. Fear for the joyous-looking one, for when the song of the bird has died in her bower, the first winter blast will lay her among the fallen leaves. The pale girl is playing the 'Vale of Ovoca'—that fair-haired, slender young man is singing with her. The aged one looks pleased. That tune is to him as angel minstrelsy. Again—the group are lifting their hearts in prayer. That young man kneels, and the old and the young, the summoned and they whose hold on life seems strong, are bending in the lowliness of dependence, to Him who keeps the issues of life and death.

Dear one, is not this a sweet and touching scene?

Come, 'Blue-eyed Mary,' with your fairy spells of another cast! Listen! The light notes waver, and lengthen, and become mellowed, even as the softest whisper of first and hallowed love. It is no longer the ringing note of the piano you hear, but the low, plaintive breathings of a flute, the most spiritual of all sweet tones. Why need love ever seek another language to give out its indwelling harmony, or shadow forth its entrancing dreams? These full, clear, yet melancholy gushings of the beautiful in sound, what are they but the voice of mortal affection, sending forth an irrepressible current, strong, sweet, yet murmuring mournfully of separation and the grave? The old mansion-house becomes ill-defined. A misty atmosphere has enveloped it, and swift-gliding shows rise and disappear where it stood. Moon-lit groves, flower-gardens, laughing groups of boys and girls, all come and go in their shadowy array. Now there is a bend in a softly-flowing river, and green as early Eden is that lone haunt of the squirrel and the bird. Three figures are moving about—the sisters of the old mansion-house, and a youth. Now there is a secluded pond, fringed with the loveliest of forests, with a narrow beach. It is but a gigantic mirror of wood and sky. A boat is upon it. A dark-eyed youth, and a girl are in it. Thou wilt know her face though it is now lighted with something of the romance of life. He is playing the flute, and his eyes, those dark, lustrous eyes, have depths of unfathomable feeling and thought. Glorious, Italian eyes! Well may hers sink beneath the burning splendor of their gaze! She is looking intently in the water. Ah, young maiden, other visions than the graceful inhabitants of the flood, lie in those depths, as beautiful, as fascinating to the eye, yet as soon to glide away.

Again a change. It is a wild sea-beach. Wave after wave lifts up its voice in thunder, and shakes in triumph its plumed crest, then sinks beneath the advancing foot of its successor. A pleasure-party are there, but two of them have wandered from the rest—the youth dark, glowing eyes, and the pale girl—and her brow is thoughtful now. The roar of the ocean is in their ears, but their souls are listening to gentler melodies. So say the tell-tale faces. Is that saddened expression prophetic? Never again on earth shall they meet as they have met.

Enough of these. Fade away, ye shadows of early dreams, fade away, and bring the phantoms of holier realities!

A mournful Scottish melody brings back the parlor of the old mansion. The family group are there. The pale girl is playing, and the eyes of the summoned one are glistening, for he feels that he too is 'wearing away to the Land of the Leal,' with each descending sun, and human love ever clings with strong fibres to its objects. But the feeble invalid sinks in his seat. Surely that pallor is the touch of death. The Angel has come among them, and the spirit struggles to go with him. A tall, manly form, full of intellectual expression, supports the invalid, and speaks comfort to the desponding group. His voice is melody. The tone of kindness at such an hour is harmony itself, though the voice be untrained to song. But the invalid revives. Know you that manly form, with the broad, high forehead, so regal, with the lofty soul looking out through its noble expanse? Years may have done work upon it, but they have left there the laurels of the conqueror of years. Time-scars may be there, for that soul has battled bravely with circumstance, but it is regal still, for it has never bowed but to its inherent sense of the right.

A 'march in Timour the Tartar.' The clang-note of war—what does that usher in? The tramp of an armed multitude? The prancing of the war-horse? The proud panoply of plume, and mail? The glittering of swords, and the shock of antagonist armaments? Trumpet and Kettle-drum, ye have a fearful sound of the strife which arises between human dust;

but ye bring not now the haughty tread of the Asiatic conqueror, hurrying over nations like a living tornado. Soft! soft! Ye usher in the shadow of a fair, sweet girl, whose day passed on in most unruffled happiness, and to whom the night came, so full of holy calm, that she seemed only to have lain down beneath the mantle of perfect peace. See! the spring time of life is on her brow, but the autumnal rose has blossomed on her cheek; and her wan hand is almost transparent, and each vein shows like the tracery of marble. She is reclining on a sofa. Her glossy curls have wandered from their band, and nearly hide the page she is reading. Mark her spiritual expression. She is almost ready for communion, full and perfect, with the holy ones of heaven. But she is no longer alone. He who sits by her side, with her thin hand clasped so tenderly in his own—he was to be her husband. But Death has come between their hearts, and he may not be cast aside. There is anguish on his face, but hers tells of submission to her Father's will.

Again: she is propped by pillows in her death-chamber, and her face is veiled. A bell is tolling in the distance, and far away, even on the verge of indistinctness, is a funeral procession. The oak has fallen before the faded flower. There shall now be no widowhood of hearts—for Death has indeed come between them only the sooner to re-unite. The bridegroom has gone first, and when they shall meet again, no earth-gloom shall be on their love, hence, forevermore. While you gaze, she fades away from the sight, till she is utterly gone.

Go, beautiful phantom, to the land of dreams! Were your brief appearance here aught than a reflex in the mirror of our necromancy, I would kneel down, and beg forgiveness for the desecration of your immortality.

'The Bonny Boat.' Now, the quiet of domestic life. It is a small sitting-room. A cradle holds a conspicuous place in its arrangements, and a cherub face is peering above the little quilt, beautiful in its sinless repose. One little plump hand lies on it, dimpled, and very white. Alas! it may hold the dagger of the assassin, as well as wield the sword of protecting justice;—merciful is the darkness of the future! The fair mother sits by, smiling at her work on its little vestments. Hope is always the painter of a mother's dreams;—again, thrice merciful is God! The infant wakes. It essays to spring from its bed, and kind hands watch and assist its efforts. Now it is springing, and laughing, and shouting in its glee, and the apartment rings with its instinctive merriment. There is a shadow on your face. You are thinking of the time when, perchance, that agile foot shall falter with the loneliness of its weary way. But the magician does not unveil the future.

One more picture, dearest, and I have done. It is a spacious room. The coal is burning brightly in the grate, though the tracery of the frost-spirit lies on the window-pane. A woman is seated at an open piano, but her fingers create no sound. She is reciting fancies to her companion. Look at her face. Mark it well. You have seen it, ay, times without number; but you have not forgotten it, though Life has written lines somewhat harshly on it, since first it met your eye in the parlor of the old mansion, beneath the embowering elms. Now, know you him of the lofty brow? Mark him, also,—for the magician sends you a message to bear him. When you meet him in the press of care; when unjust censure, and undeserved reproach are cast on him, as he goes forth in the performance of his life-duties; say to him, 'Be strong!' Say to him, that 'those who are true to their nobler and better natures, never lose the ultimate reward;' that 'faith untarnished, energy, and a pure heart, though late, are sure to meet their just appreciation.' Say to him, 'There is one who can never leave or forsake him, though peril, and shame, and even death rise up in his path—for when the "waters passed over that soul," he was with it.'

Now, love, how like you my music-pictures?

THE CHILD'S EVENING PRAYER.

COME, little one, the twilight shade

Around us softly creeps;

The earth for slumber is arrayed,

And wearied nature sleeps.

Upon its stalk the sleepy flower

Reclines with half-shut eye;

A stillness consecrates this hour

Of holy ministry.

Put up thy toys, rejoicing child,

When day's departing sigh

Is breathed where morning glories smiled,

The time of prayer is nigh.

Ask Him whose hand the sparrow keeps,

To watch o'er thee to-night;

To guard the bed where childhood sleeps

Securely in his sight.

Thou hast been roaming, all day long,

With butterfly and bee,

And echoing each happy song

The birds have sung to thee.

Give thanks for nature's living wealth,

Enriching heart and mind;

For every day's continued health,

Thy happiness refined.

Thy kitten, doll, and faithful Spring,

To play with, thou hast had;

Be thankful for each little thing

That makes thy moments glad.

Give thanks for kind and loving friends

That watch thy steps by day,
To Him who every blessing sends
Which beautifies thy way.

Rest, now, in quiet, trusting one,
God's love protects thee here ;
Sleep till to-morrow's rising sun,
Unruffled by a fear.

MIMOSA.

REFLECTIONS AT A GRAVE.

It is sweet to die in the spring time of life ; to leave the world in all its freshness and beauty, ere the feelings are inwrought with its cares, or blighted with its treachery or baseness. It is pleasant to lay aside the spirit's earthly clothing while the heart is yet pure and holy, and the affections are glowing with dreams of love, and life, and joy. It is blissful to leave the world with all its charms, ere the cup of sorrow has been drank, the fondest hopes crushed, or the bitterness of grief felt or tasted. It is glorious to bid adieu to earth with resignation, to leave its vivid scenes, its untold joys, its sunny places, its bright oases, and its flashing streams, ere yet the vision is darkened to the glory, or the beauty of the scenes is veiled.

More to be desired than earth's vicissitudes, is that haven of rest, that unalloyed peace which is given to the freed spirit at the right hand of the Almighty Father, where flow the pure waters of everlasting life, from the inexhaustible fountain of unfailing love. Yes, that blessedness is more to be desired than all that wealth and splendor can bestow—yea, more than the imagination can conceive, or that can be dreamed of by the most enraptured soul.

I stand by the grave of the departed—the lovely and the loved—the idol of a doating mother, the pride of the family circle, and the hope of many fond hearts. Thoughts that cannot be uttered—feelings 'too deep for tears,' have possession of my mind. The loved one is present to my imagination in all the freshness of youth and beauty. I see her sylph like form, her speaking countenance, her winning smile. Her grace of manner, her bright anticipations, her joyous hopes, are all before me—for I knew them all.

I stood by her dying bed ; I witnessed her peace of mind ; I listened to her last request ; I was entrusted with her dying message to the loved one in a far distant city. I watched the last flickering ray that lit up the pallid face, and the last breath that escaped the heaving bosom.

The future to her was arrayed in its most brilliant hues, nought but bliss was in prospect ; her heart was united and her hand pledged to her first and only love—a few intervening weeks and the union was to be consummated. But sickness came, the mandate went forth, 'Dust thou art, and unto dust thou must return ;' the motionless form is dressed in the bridal attire, and the freed and soaring spirit arrayed in the white robe of righteousness. Beautiful as the morning, lovely as the blooming rose was she. I watched her departure as she passed away with calm resignation, nor would even my rebellious spirit call her back to earth. Gifted by nature with purity of feeling and goodness of heart, she was called to a more genial clime, and a purer sphere in which her amiable qualities could more fully develop themselves. Though my spirit was wrung with anguish, though the tear drop would start, and the quivering lip give utterance only to the heartfelt sigh, yet there were healing and sweet waters gushing up from the fountain of sorrow, happy, yea blissful emotions blended with agonizing feeling, for Faith was near to whisper, Ye shall meet in heaven.

And now as I stand by her grave, hope and joy mingle with my regret at her early death. Her trusting heart never bled at the treachery of the world ; her buoyant spirit was never broken by toil or misfortune ; the picturings of glad hope were never veiled by clouding care ; friendship's blossoms were to her never blighted by ingratitude or deceit ; and the morning smile of existence was still on the face of all things.

The centre of her affection, the chosen of her heart, was also called from earth ere the knowledge of her loss was communicated, and by the mysterious order of an unerring Providence, the spirits united in affection and mutual vows on earth—though separated by thousands of miles—together soared in their upward flight, and mingled their glad voices in the paradise of our God—'to part no more.'

Who that has felt and known the trials that 'flesh is heir to,' can lament their early departure ? Who could murmur at the divine decree, or cease to joy in a death like this ? Let us rather rejoice that the gifted and the good, the pure in heart and the fair of form, are spared the struggling with trials that oft-times crush the strongest mind, and that the fair flowers of earth are transplanted to a holier atmosphere, where they shall continue to bloom and expand in perennial beauty.

Who then would mourn their early loss ?

Their spirits mingle round the throne ;

Blended in one, their hearts unite

In giving praise to God alone.

VISITING THE SICK. What office of mercy is there more angel-like, than that of administering to the wants, and alleviating the sufferings of the sick, the poor-sick, those whose scanty and hard earned pittance, barely suffices from the rising to the setting of the sun ? How beautiful shines woman as an almoner of relief at the bedside of the anguished mother, when tears, hot scalding tears are coursing down the sick one's cheeks, caused by pining want ! PR.

DO GOOD IN A GOOD WAY.

BY HENRY BACON.

THERE are two characteristics of christianity as a religion of Duty, that are not sufficiently considered with a reverent spirit, and it is the neglect of these that produces more than half the evils which disturb the peace and harmony of society. These important characteristics are the frequent enjoining of the duty of mingling the social element with all our feelings and passions, and carefulness in seeking to do good in a good way.

Because of this, our Savior, and those who taught under him, often alluded to the duties of social life—even to the common courtesies and civilities of every day, and enjoined the necessity of keeping alive the social feelings at all times and everywhere. This would keep down the obstinacy of a perverse self-will, the foolish contempt for the opinions of others, and that wildness of passion which vents itself in dogmatical assertions and ends with the don't care! flourish. It would also cause us at all times to keep in mind not only the influence which we exert by the utterance of our opinions, but also the influence of the manner with which we utter them. We are to be careful not only to seek to know what is right, but to bring it about in a right way. The end does not sanctify the means—the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God. The violation of this great truth has led to the most wanton outrages on everything good; and history is full of illustrations of its madness. These illustrations are too little heeded, and even in this enlightened age, we hear it too frequently asserted that 'Right is Right, however obtained.'

The Apostle Paul warns us against this error—this error which has blasted many a good and noble Reform in its first buddings, and heaped up obstacles in the way of the onward rolling of the car of progress. 'Let not your good be evil spoken of,' said he;—i. e., do not rest too much in the purity of your motives and your good intentions, but use the utmost discretion in preventing the misinterpretation of those motives and intentions. We are to endeavor to disinterestedly scrutinize our own actions, as others will scrutinize them without the qualifications and reservations which may exist in our own mind. Others have only the action to deal with—they can only take hold of the outward, and according to what is within them of feeling and prejudice will be the judgment they will pronounce. And by these considerations we must govern ourselves, that we may exercise the utmost prudence of which we are capable, that our good may not be evil spoken of—our good intentions may not be misinterpreted.

We find a good illustration of this matter in the incident connected with the Savior's utterance of the words—'Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of.' The disciples had been into a village of Samaria to purchase food and to prepare entertainment for the Master. The Samaritans would promise them no privileges, and they came back undoubtedly feeling that it was well to be angry. It was their reverence for Jesus that made them indignant at the absence of common hospitable feelings; they could not brook such an insult to one to whom the palace and the cottage should alike be open, and to whom should be given the freedom of the world. Their respect for Jesus was good. Their desire for hospitable entertainment for him was good. Their indignation that the commonest hospitalities of the East should be withheld under the circumstances of the case, was good. All this became the disciple—all this accords with true manliness. But their good was and is evil spoken of because of the untempered manner by which it was made known, or because of the unworthy passions with which it was permitted to mingle. For eighteen centuries their conduct has been censured; their speech has been quoted as the utterance of an unlovely zeal, and men have expatiated on the lessons taught by it more than they have heeded them. 'Shall we call down fire from heaven to consume them,' was their language. Shall not such ungenerous beings be swept away by destruction, as a signal judgment on such inhospitality? This was the language of a zeal that probably had been overheated by earnest, and perhaps rash, conversation with the Samaritans; but our Lord rebuked them as they vented their indignation. 'Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of'—ye know not that ye are venting the same feelings that ye are condemning; ye are answering evil with evil.

When the searching, yet mild gaze of the Master had thus been fixed upon them and they had heard his rebuke, they doubtless felt they ought to change their invocation, and pray for a fire to come down from heaven to purify themselves—to consume the evil yet abiding in their own hearts, and to refine the passions which had as yet too much of earthliness. From that time, we may well conclude, the disciples aimed more to guard their passions, to mingle with them more of the social element, and to so act wisely that their good might not be evil spoken of. The result of this we see beautifully exhibited in the affectionate character of John the beloved. He was one of those whose zeal was rebuked; and had he justified himself by the plea—'I can't help it!' or thrown himself upon the pride of character which is so common, history would have lost one of its most beautiful biographies, and christianity would not have been glorified by such a noble moral martyr as was St. John.

The extensiveness of the application of our theme, will be confessed by all. We are all to be devoted to that which is good. This is the christian law of Greatness—this is the rule for the obtaining of the richest blessing—this is essential to the harmonious development of the attributes of a true man. It enjoins upon us the duty of taking large and generous views, and to judge men by the circumstances with which they are surrounded, as well as the great laws of duty and character. It tells us that the glory of a good deed may be veiled or shadowed by a wrong mode of doing, and that we must walk wisely concerning them that are without, if we would have them possess the best means of appreciating whatever good motives or intentions may impel us to act, or if we would excite in them that grateful sympathy and friendship which alone can perpetuate good feeling and promote truly social intercourse.

Let us cultivate all that is good within us, and exemplify the power of an enlarged and noble sympathy to overcome every form, and seeming form, of evil with good—with good thoughts, good resolves, good feelings, good affections, and good actions. Then shall we be true under all circumstances to the demands of the great cause of Truth and Holiness and Love; and having root in ourselves, we shall endure when persecution or tribulation ariseth, and shall be faithful to the end.

May God give us wisdom for all the exigencies of life, that we may demonstrate the divine adaptedness of christianity to all the wants of human nature. Then shall we yield the non-essentials to the essentials of the happiest life, and as much as lieth in us, we shall live peaceable with all men, aiming so to act judiciously that our good may not be evil spoken of.

VOICE OF GOD—A HYMN.

BY MISS PHEBE CAREY.

[THE author of the following which we take from the 'Star in the West,' has written several very beautiful poems for that excellent paper. We shall give some specimens of other poetic contributions to that publication.]

FATHER! we hear thy thrilling voice,
Amid the quiet shades of noon;
We hear it as the leaves rejoice,
And harps which wandering breezes tune,
Send up their holy songs of love
To thy eternal throne above.

And in the hushed and stilly night,
When stars are burning in the sky,
And dew-drops sparkle in the light,
The blessed sound comes stealing by;—
So soft, so sweet, that voice of thine,
The soul o'erflows with love divine.

And when the morning bright unfolds
Her purple wings o'er vale and hill,
And earth is bathed in floating gold,
We hear the same low whisper still:—
That voice that cheers the heart's lone springs,
Like healing borne on heavenly wings.

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF WOMAN'S LIFE. NO. IV.

BY CHARLOTTE.

THE IRISH DAUGHTER-IN-LAW.

'Room, mother, in thy heart! place for her in thy prayer!'
WILLIS.

THE beams of the morning sun shone brightly into the breakfast parlor of the Willows, a beautiful country seat on the banks of the Hudson, the residence of Mr. Channing, a wealthy merchant of New York. A cheerful group was gathered round the breakfast table, consisting of the merchant himself, a fine looking man something past the prime of life, who was busily engaged in discussing alternately his coffee and the daily paper; his wife, a stately, fashionably dressed woman; Alice and Mary, two grown-up young ladies; Sydney a fine lad of sixteen; Lizzy and Fanny, the younger girls, and Miss Beaufort their governess.

'Letters! letters!' exclaimed Ellen, the youngest of the family, a bright-eyed, rosy-cheeked lass of seven years, as she bounded into the room with a huge package which she had just taken from the postman, and placed it in her father's hands for distribution. There were letters of friendship and of compliment—business letters for Mr. Channing—sentimental effusions from young-lady friends, for the elder girls, and a love-letter for the fair governess, if one might judge by the ill-suppressed smiles and brilliant blushes with which she received it, and put it in her pocket without reading; and last of all was a large one for Mrs. Channing.

'Post-marked in Dublin! from Frank, I suppose,' said Mr. C., as he handed it to his wife; 'read it quick, for we are all impatient to hear from him.'

She broke the seal, and read on in silence till she had nearly reached the bottom of the second page, when she suddenly dropt the letter, exclaiming, 'Preposterous! well really this is too bad!'

'What news?' said Mr. Channing, and 'what news?' was reiterated by every one at the table.

'News indeed!' was the reply; 'Frank is married!'

'Is that all?' said her husband, bursting into a hearty laugh, 'well, really', my dear, I see no cause for such weighty indignation on your part. Frank at six-and-twenty, has surely arrived at years of discretion, and if you recollect, I was four years younger when I entered the matrimonial noose.'

'I wonder if she is very handsome,' said Alice, the beauty; 'does he say who she is? is she fashionable?' inquired Mary, the belle. 'I dare say she is handsome enough and good enough, if she is Frank's choice,' said Sydney, and 'so do I,' and 'so do I,' was echoed by the younger ones.

'But you have not heard all yet,' said Mrs. Channing, 'I have not yet told you that Frank's bride is an Irish girl, and her name Bridget O'Brien! I do think, well as Frank knew my prejudices against that nation, he might have spared me this mortification.'

'Such a name too!' cried Mary, 'she is doubtless some vulgar, showy girl, who, attracted by Frank's elegant person and gentlemanly appearance, has had art enough to inveigle him into marrying her.'

'I can fancy how she looks, exactly,' responded Alice; 'I suppose she is some tall, awkward, red-haired girl, fair and fat, with peony-hued cheeks, and a rich brogue which my enamored brother will doubtless think full of music. Bridget, forsooth!—Why, how can you laugh, Eveline?' she continued, turning to Miss Beaufort, whose large hazel eyes were liquid with mirth, while her low, musical laugh displayed to advantage her handsome mouth, and teeth of surpassing whiteness and brilliancy.

'No one could refrain from laughing, Alice, who heard your glowing description of your brother's bride; you give him credit for little taste and judgment, I think.'

'He has shown his want of it in his choice, surely; but mother, when is this Irish damsel to claim relationship in propria persona? does Frank mention the period of his return? pray Heaven it be not very near!'

'He does not name the precise time,' returned Mrs. Channing, 'but he says he shall probably be with us by the commencement of the New Year, so we have still a respite of several months to prepare ourselves.'

'Well, well, what's done can't be helped,' said Mr. Channing, as he left the table, 'and I see no other way for us to pursue, than to make the best of it, and to receive our Irish daughter-in-law with courtesy and affection. It may be that she is the tenderly cherished child of fond parents, from whom she is now to separate, and whose long-trying and sure affection she is to exchange for the love of a stranger. Think what your feelings would be in leaving the home of your childhood, for a foreign land, relying solely on the honor and faith of one, who perhaps is but the acquaintance of a few brief months—think of this, and I am sure you will not be wanting in kindness and attention to your brother's wife, let her nation be what it may. And what prouder birth-place can she have than that of Emmet, and Curran, and Moore and Sheridan?'

Sydney followed his father from the room, Miss Beaufort retired to her own apartment, the younger girls sought the garden and play-ground, and Mrs. Channing was left alone with her elder daughters.

'It is too bad, I declare,' exclaimed Alice, 'I can never forgive Frank for frustrating my plans; ever since Eveline Beaufort became a member of our family, I have set my heart upon a match between her and my brother.'

'What, a governess!' cried Mrs. Channing, 'and a person of whose birth and connections we are totally ignorant?'

'A maiden dowered with Eveline's brilliant beauty, talents and accomplishments, needs not, in my opinion, rank or wealth to recommend her; nature has placed her on a level with the proudest, though no one, I think, who witnesses the graceful dignity of her deportment and the ease of her manners, can doubt her gentle blood and breeding; and for her name, surely that is unexceptionable. I wish we could prevail upon her to go into society more, and I would venture to predict that she would be the star of fashion.'

'One would think you were yourself, Eveline's lover, from the animation with which you speak of her,' said Mrs. Channing, smiling.

'I am,' replied Alice, 'if intense admiration of her beauty, and deep love for her numerous good qualities of head and heart, comprise the necessary requisites to be one, and I hope she will never have one less sincere.'

While this conversation was passing, the fair subject of Alice's lamentations was quietly seated in her bed-room, perusing with sparkling eyes the letter she had just received, and while she is thus engaged, we will give the reader a slight account of her. Some two or three months before the commencement of our story, Mrs. Channing was busily seeking a governess for her younger girls, and in reply to her many inquiries, after having rejected several applications, she received a letter from a near relative, recommending a young friend of her own as admirably qualified to fill the situation. No information, beyond the name of the young lady was given, but as the friend who recommended her was wealthy and influential, and one whom Mrs. Channing cared not to offend, no questions were asked, and Eveline Beaufort became a member of the family at the Willows. She was apparently not more than nineteen years of age at that time, and was gifted with rare and exceeding beauty, and many and varied accomplishments. She won the love of her pupils as if by magic, and by degrees twined herself round the hearts of all.

Alice Channing had, even as she stated to her mother, formed the idea of promoting a match between her brother Frank and Eveline, and she had accordingly in her correspondence with him, been lavish in descriptions and praises of her friend.

'You tell of the charms of foreign ladies,' she wrote, 'but if you were here, I could show you one who will rival the fairest. Eveline Beaufort, the girls' governess and our dear friend, is the loveliest creature you ever beheld; but even her beauty, well as I love and much as I talk of it, is scarcely to be compared with her admirable temper, her generous spirit and sweetness of disposition. I defy all Europe to produce her equal.'

Lizzy and Fanny too were eloquent in her praise. 'I wish you could see our governess, Frank; she is so pretty and gentle and good and kind, I am sure you would love her if you knew her as well as we do.' With Mr. Channing, also, Eveline was a prime favorite, and during that winter she was enabled to render services to the family which effectually secured her a high place in the esteem and affections of all. She had not been long an inmate of the Willows, when little Ellen was attacked with the measles, a disorder which was that year peculiarly malignant. Eveline was her constant attendant, and the child could bear no other to approach her. Night and day she was at the couch, and ere the disease had reached its crisis, Lizzy and Fanny took the infection and were added to Eveline's charge. The duties of the school-room were now exchanged for those of the hospital, and with the exception of a short interval, now and then, to eat her meals, or to take a little out of door exercise, she never left the room. The children all recovered, and the physician paid their governess the highest encomiums; for to her careful and tender nursing, he said, was owing, under Providence, their complete restoration. The gratitude of the parents knew no bounds, and was made manifest to Eveline by a thousand delicate attentions. Nor did their obligations end here. Scarcely were the children restored to health, when Mrs. Channing was attacked with a slow nervous fever, which required perfect quiet, and untiring patience on the part of the nurse. None could preserve order and manage everything so well as Eveline, and she was again, at her own request, stationed in the sick room. She remained at her post, faithfully fulfilling all the requirements of her vocation, till the fever was broken up, and then resumed her duties in the school-room, with the exception of a short interval which was devoted to attendance upon Mr. Channing during a severe fit of rheumatism, when, as every one who has ever seen or experienced anything of the disorder is aware, the querulousness and impatience of the sufferer renders the task of the nurse by no means pleasant or easy. Her gentleness and assiduity, the earnestness with which she anticipated his wants, and her kindness in ministering to them, won upon the frank, generous heart of Mr. Channing, and he often declared that Eveline seemed quite as near to him as his own dear girls. Her services were faithfully recorded in the letters which told Frank of their domestic afflictions and their safe deliverance therefrom, and Alice had fairly persuaded herself that her brother could not fail to be intensely in love with the portrait she had drawn of her friend, and quite ready on his return to enter into her plans, when the letter came which brought the news of his marriage, and worse than all, with an Irish girl, whose very name suggested nothing but awkwardness and vulgarity.

The months that were to elapse before Frank Channing's return to his native land flew swiftly by. Alice, at her father's request, uttered in a tone too decisive to admit of any demurring, had written to congratulate her brother on his marriage, and to bid his foreign bride, in behalf of the whole family, a friendly welcome to her new home. The day was fast approaching for the return of the long-absent one, when Miss Beaufort suddenly announced her intention of going to pass a few days with a friend who had just arrived in the country after a long separation. 'Pray do not go, Eveline, till after my brother's return,' urged Alice, 'I want your countenance in this first interview, and then I shall be in less danger of any breach of perfect courtesy to my Irish sister. And then too, Frank has heard so much of you, I am sure he will wish to see you—indeed, Eveline, you shall not go yet.'

'Indeed I must, Alice! but you need not feel so disappointed; I think very likely I shall return in season to witness your reception of your brother and his bride, and I am sure, dear Alice, your own kindness of heart, and your love for your brother will not allow you to receive her otherwise than with affection and politeness.'

New-Year's eve came, and Mr. Channing's family were collected around a bright coal fire in their large cheerful parlor, busily engaged in conversation concerning the expected visitors, and in lamenting the continued absence of the governess. Soon the rattling of wheels was heard, a carriage drove to the door, and ere any one could reach it, the long absent, the beloved son and brother entered the apartment. It was many minutes ere the warmth of their greetings subsided, and Frank Channing turning, presented his wife. He had entered a little in advance of her, and as she remained in the back-ground, she had been quite forgotten in the excitement; but now as he led her forward, she removed the thick veil from her face and as her low musical laugh burst forth, the warm hearted, eager Alice grasped the hand of the new comer, exclaiming, 'My sister! our own Eveline!'—and the name was repeated in joyful accents by every voice.

'Our Eveline, your wife!—Eveline Beaufort the governess—Bridget O'Brien, the Irish girl!' cried the puzzled mother.

'The very same, my dear mother,' returned her happy son; 'can you forgive the little deceit we have practised upon you? I well knew, amiable and lovable as you are in all other respects, that your prejudices against the Irish were very strong, and that the "milk of human kindness" in your heart flowed not towards them. Had you dreamed that my sweet Eveline, lovely and good as she is, was one of that luckless nation, your prejudices would have blended you to her merits; but in any other light I was very sure that her beauty would prepossess you in her favor, and her sterling worth gain daily upon your affections. I have learnt with the greatest pleasure from the letters I have received, of the progress she has made, and I felt that our object was now attained, and that I might safely present to you your Irish daughter-in-law, and to the girls their "tall, awkward, vulgar" sister, and let her "rich brogue" speak for itself.'

And now, dear reader, would you like to hear a brief history of Frank Channing and his fair Irish bride? Frank was the eldest of the family, by turns the playfellow and counsellor of the little ones, the chosen friend of Sydney, who looked up to him with mingled admiration and love, and thought him the most perfect of human beings—the pride of his fashionable mother and sisters, and the object of his father's fondest wishes; and while his personal graces rendered him the delight of fashionable society, he also possessed a fund of knowledge and humor wherewith to instruct and amuse the home circle. At the time our story commences, he had been travelling two or three years in Europe, and about six months previous to his introduction to the reader, he had stopt with the intention of passing a few days by the celebrated Lakes of Killarney. On the banks of one of the Lakes was a small, picturesque-looking cottage, half-hidden by the dense foliage of some old trees, which grew up before the door and threw their waving branches over the roof, while its smooth green lawn sloped almost to the water's edge, and here and there a clump of trees shaded a neat garden-chair, and tempted the weary traveller to rest. This rural spot was the abode of Mr. Beaufort, an Irish gentleman descended from some of the noblest of Erin's sons, and himself a prototype of what they were, in the days when the land of the shamrock was in her glory, ere the 'harp was hushed in Tara's halls.' Mr. Beaufort had been the father of seven children, but they had died, one after another in infancy, and one only, the youngest of all was left to him. Widowed when the little one was scarce four years old, he had devoted himself exclusively to her nurture and education, and at seventeen Eveline Beaufort rivalled the celebrated 'Kate Kearney' in beauty and witchery, though fortunately unlearnt in her coquetry. Tall, and possessing a figure to which 'superb' is the only word that will apply, and which a sculptor would have longed to model—a complexion, not fair, for that word is far too tame to show forth the rich, delicate, ever-varying tints of her face, or their constant alternation of light and shadow—features finely chiselled, and the small, mobile mouth completely embedded in dimples—a wealth of raven tresses, and long, jetty lashes that swept over the eloquent cheek, and when raised revealed a pair of large, radiant eyes that would have set a Mussulman raving. Such was Eveline Beaufort, the Flower of the Lakes, when she burst in her queenly beauty upon the amazed vision of Frank Channing, and ere long the young American was a frequent and welcome visitor at Beaufort Cottage. But if her rare loveliness had witchéd his senses at first sight, how was his heart enslaved, when thus brought into daily communion with her, he saw her in the constant exercise of every virtue that renders woman truly lovely and beloved. When he witnessed her filial piety, her gentleness, truthfulness, and purity of heart; when he saw her in the lowly cabin of poverty, at the miserable couch of the sick, relieving distress and ministering comfort—when every eye brightened at her approach, and every lip breathed blessings on her name. Day by day his visits grew more frequent, his devotion more apparent, his love more intense; and still he dared not hazard an avowal. Was not Eveline beautiful, gifted and high-born? did not the most brilliant establishments court her acceptance? were not the proud, the titled, the wealthy and the gay, worshipers at her shrine? and how could he expect she would resign any or all of these for him? 'And yet,' he would ask himself, 'can it be that she is wholly indifferent to me? in the midst of fulsome adulation and compliment, do not those glorious eyes often turn to me as if seeking my approbation alone? if she sings, is it not the songs I love? if she reads, is it not from my favorite authors, and does she not dwell with peculiar emphasis on those passages we have both loved and read together?' And so the result of all this was, that one fine moonshiny eve, Mr. Frank Channing persuaded Miss Eveline that a walk round the margin of the beautiful Lake would be delightful, and during that most romantic ramble did the hoping, doubting lover pour forth a most eloquent rhapsody, and the maiden listened with mingled smiles and blushes, which certainly presaged no very unfavorable answer, and so as the reader has of course supposed, Frank and Eveline parted that night, affianced lovers.

Now Frank Channing was very well aware of his mother's inveterate dislike to the children of the Emerald Isle; these prejudices he made known to his lady-love, and Eveline, possessing no small share of the ready wit and humor that distinguishes her countrymen, proposed to introduce herself incog. into the family of her lover, and thus make her way into their good graces. Accordingly their plan was laid as follows. Mrs. Channing had an old Aunt, unmarried and wealthy, who was generally considered an oddity, and but for her situation in life, would have commanded but little attention from her relatives. But Aunt Achsah was nevertheless a woman of good heart and generous impulses, and withal a spice of romance, which had no small influence upon her actions. With this good lady, Frank had always been a favorite, and as children usually know, instinctively, as it were, who really love them, he had attached himself warmly to his old Aunt, and as he grew older, she had still retained his confidence and affection. To her he now wrote, stating how his love affair stood, and asking her assistance to farther Eveline's plan. The good lady entered into it with avidity, offered her home to receive them, and promised her aid and secrecy. The result was, that Frank and Eveline were privately married, and soon afterward the bride, escorted by her father, sailed for America, and was duly received into the hospitable dwelling of Aunt Achsah, from which she was soon after transferred, as the reader already knows, to the Willows, as the governess of her young sisters-in-law. An account of her proceedings was faithfully transmitted to Frank, who then, in compliance with the arrangement previously made, wrote to acquaint his family with his marriage.

With the effect of the letter, with Eveline's subsequent history, and the denouement, the reader is already acquainted. And now in conclusion, we have only to say, that Eveline is the pride and delight of her husband's family, and the admiration of all their friends; that Mrs. Channing's foolish prejudices against the people of Erin, have been fairly combated and destroyed, and if there is one particular subject on which, more than on any other she delights to dwell, it is the inimitable graces and matchless virtues of her IRISH DAUGHTER-IN-LAW!

LITERATURE AND RELIGION.

EXTRACT FROM CHANNING.

WE give an extract from Channing, in which truths of great importance are set forth in a stately style. We ask particular attention to his remarks on 'the sportive and comic forms of composition,' as just and deserving consideration. 'Religious literature,' so called, is proverbially dull, and it is deemed 'out of his sphere' for a minister to relinquish a gravity that never smiles and indulge in composition that will give life and vivacity to the feelings which are gratified by sportiveness. How contrasted is the modern from the old English pulpit! Wit now never spreads its sunshine over grave subjects, as light steals into a dark forest to give it a majesty and glory it cannot otherwise have. Can we not keep from the eccentricities of old preachers and writers, and yet retain their pleasantness and vivacity? But to the extract.

'We are aware,' says Channing, 'that objections will spring up to the doctrine, that all literature should be produced under the influence of religion. We shall be told, that in this way literature will lose all variety and spirit, that a monotonous and solemn hue will spread itself over writing, and that a library will have the air of a tomb. We do not wonder at this fear. Religion has certainly been accustomed to speak in sepulchral tones, and to wear any aspect but a bright and glowing one. It has lost its free and various movement. But let us not ascribe to its nature, what has befallen it from adverse circumstances. The truth is, that religion, justly viewed, surpasses all other principles, in giving a free and manifold action to the mind. It recognizes in every faculty and sentiment the workmanship of God, and assigns a sphere of agency to each. It takes our whole nature under its guardianship, and with a parental love ministers to its inferior as well as higher gratifications. False religion mutilates the soul, sees evil in our innocent sensibilities, and rules with a tyrant's frown and rod. True religion is a mild and lawful sovereign, governing to protect, to give strength, to unfold all our inward resources. We believe that under its influence, literature is to pass its present limits, and to put itself forth in original forms of composition. Religion is of all principles most fruitful, multiform and unconfined. It is sympathy with that being, who seems to delight in diversifying the modes of his agency, and the products of his wisdom and power. It does not chain us to a few essential duties, or express itself in a few unchanging modes of writing. It has the liberality and munificence of nature, which not only produces the necessary root and grain, but pours forth fruits and flowers. It has the variety and bold contrasts of nature, which at the foot of the awful mountain, scoops out the freshest, sweetest valleys, and embosoms in the wild, troubled ocean, islands, whose vernal loveliness and teeming fruitfulness, almost breathe the joys of Paradise. Religion will accomplish for literature what it most needs; that is, will give it depth, at the same time that it heightens its grace and beauty. The union of these attributes is most to be desired. Our literature is lamentably superficial, and to some, the beautiful and the superficial even seem to be naturally conjoined. Let not beauty be so wronged. It resides chiefly in profound thoughts and feelings. It overflows chiefly in the writings of poets gifted with a sublime and piercing vision. A beautiful literature springs from the depth and fullness of intellectual and moral life, from an energy of thought and feeling, to which nothing, as we believe, ministers so largely as enlightened religion.

So far from a monotonous solemnity overspreading literature in consequence of the all-pervading influence of religion, we believe, that the sportive and comic forms of composition, instead of being abandoned, will only be refined and improved. We know that these are supposed to be frowned upon by piety; but they have their root in the constitution which God has given us, and ought not therefore to be indiscriminately condemned. The propensity to wit and laughter does, indeed, through excessive indulgence, often issue in a character of heartless levity, low mimicry, or unfeeling ridicule. It often seeks gratification in regions of impurity, throws a gaiety round vice, and sometimes even pours contempt on virtue. But, though often and mournfully perverted, it is still a gift of God, and may and ought to minister, not only to innocent pleasure, but to the intellect and the heart. Man was made for relaxation as truly as for labor; and by a law of his nature, which has not received the attention it deserves, he finds perhaps no relaxation so restorative, as that in which he reverts to his childhood, seems to forget his wisdom, leaves the imagination to exhilarate itself by sportive inventions, talks of amusing incongruities in conduct and events, smiles at the innocent eccentricities and odd mistakes of those whom he most esteems, allows himself in arch allusions or kind-hearted satire, and transports himself into a world of ludicrous combinations. We have said, that on these occasions, the mind seems to put off its wisdom; but the truth is, that in a pure mind, wisdom retreats, if we may so say, to its centre, and there, unseen, keeps guard over this transient folly, draws delicate lines which are never to be passed in the freest moments, and, like a judicious parent watching the sports of childhood, preserves a stainless innocence of soul in the very exuberance of gaiety. This combination of moral power with wit and humor, with comic conceptions and irrepressible laughter, this union of mirth and virtue belongs to an advanced stage of the character; and we believe, that in proportion to the diffusion of an enlightened religion, this action of the mind will increase, and will overflow in compositions, which, joining innocence to sportiveness, will communicate unmixed delight. Religion is not at variance with occasional mirth. In the same character, the solemn thought and the sublime emotions of the improved christian, may be joined with the unanxious freedom, buoyancy and gaiety of early years.'

A PRAYER AT NIGHT.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

THOSE lone, bright spheres! How beautiful their light

In the wide solitude of space! How far

O'er reefy shore, and bold Norwegian height,

And tropic desert, will one small, faint star

Its cheering radiance throw!

And they who toil below—

The weary voyager on the trackless sea,

The pilgrim thrown beneath the wayside tree,

O'erworn with care and pain;

O shall not these take heart of grace again,

And struggle on through all the awful night

Cheered by that small, sweet light?

Grant me, O God, a high, soft star to be!

Calm, still, and bright, to trace my way in heaven,

And shed my light o'er life's tempestuous sea,

Where human hearts, like fragile barks, are driven

Mid rocks and hidden shoals.

A soul mid glorious souls—

A small, pure star within the glittering band

That high above the clouds, undimmed and grand,

In placid beauty rolls,

To herald on the weary to the land

Where all is rest and peace; to guide the way

To heaven's unclouded day!

'PROVIDENCE EMPLOYMENT SOCIETY.'

INDUSTRY MADE ATTRACTIVE.

In our notices for the last month, we mentioned the above named Society, and promised a more enlarged notice of it—because of the novelty of its prominent features and the great good of which it is the unostentatious instrument.

Among the Reforms on which we look with peculiar favor, is that which regards the great evils in our land as not political but social, and aims to restore or produce order by effecting a harmony of interests through attractive industry. This is the sound doctrine of Fourier, and it would have received far greater attention than it has received, were it not for the new coined technicalities, by which the ideas are shrouded and the common mind bewildered. Plain speaking men of brave hearts and earnest minds will yet teach it, and a movement will be made that shall astonish and delight. To make industry attractive—to throw around toil those associations which will banish the idea of drudgery, is to give to the laboring masses the means of self elevation, and it will win them to the pursuance of a course that leads to the purest happiness. This is one great object of this society.

The lamented Matthew Carey—the tried and true friend of the poor—wrote much in reference to the evils produced by the miserably low prices which were paid for work to poor women, and severely did he denounce the sordid oppressions which weighed down in despair many a noble spirit. His pictures of pining wretchedness were enough to make a generous heart bleed, and a conscientious soul to tremble for the awfulness of the judgments that must come upon the oppressors. Indeed what can be more melting to sympathy than the picture of the widow toiling at her needle from early morn to midnight, hastily preparing and partaking of the scanty repast at intervals, fearful that the work she may do will not afford her sufficient to keep cold and hunger from her dependent group of children.. No time for relaxation—no seasons of reviving social intercourse—no hours for intellectual improvement—but all toil, toil, and the utmost reward from the employer—a few cents an hour! Goaded by agonizing fears of want and oppressed by the toil of the long day, she hurries her work, as the solitary candle burns dim, and when the morrow's light dawns, she discovers that it will be said of her work—'You have slighted this!' and perhaps all further employment will be denied her!

The few cents are paid her, and the mercenary soul who so cheapens labor, severely reprimands the employed who can so slight his work! while he adds that he cannot afford to pay so much for so poor work! What scenes like these are to be witnessed in every city, but how seldom are they looked upon, and what a slight degree of consideration is given to them!

We rejoice in every demonstration of interest in this class of the poor, and we are made glad by every token of zeal to elevate the depressed by the means of attractive industry. We read, therefore, with the highest degree of satisfaction the Reports of the Providence 'Employment Society,' and congratulate its conductors and members on the vast amount of real good accomplished by their institution. It has been in operation five years; it has had much to contend with, and nobly have its managers pressed on till they have established the society on permanent grounds and given to it a uniformly successful operation. The first Report says,—'Our plan is simply to give employment to industrious females who need it, and to pay them a fair compensation. This we believe to be the true principle of charity.' But the public should remember how much of patient labor is necessary to carry out this plan; the needy must be sought out and visited; their circumstances enquired into; work given adapted to their abilities; encouragement afforded to animate them to improvement; while at the same time knowledge is extended to other institutions of those who are real and meritorious objects of charity.

In the 'Proposal' by which the existence and designs of the Society were first made known to the public, the principles of the association were thus set forth,—'Our first and leading principle is, that the great object of benevolent associations should be, not to supply the wants of the poor, but to encourage and enable them to supply their own wants; not to make them dependant on the public, or Societies, or individual charities, but to afford them every facility of supporting themselves by honest industry.'

'Another principle on which we proceed is, that the worst of all charities is that which gives money—and the best of all charities, that which gives employment. Between these, there are many objects and modes of greater or less utility, with which we have no concern. Our present plan of charity turns wholly upon employment; and may be called, as it has been, A CHARITY OF WAGES.'

These principles are sound and worthy of all acceptance. This we say, because the testimony of every philanthropist who has mingled with the poor, tends to the same conclusion. But as it is easier to give money than to extend Charity in any other way, there always will be untold evils arising from an indolent benevolence that satisfies its conscience by the bestowment of a sum of money. Facts might be cited that would set forth in a clear light the tendency of this kind of Charity—how it has given means to feed intemperate habits, and fostered a laziness that palsies every power of self-exertion. To give, is one thing; to give wisely, is another and vastly more difficult matter. To give, so that immediate wants are supplied, without encouraging non-exertion or turning the mind away from the resources to be opened by industry, is the perfection of Charity, and can be attended to only by those who have a peculiar tact from long experience as almoners. We are gratified to perceive that several of the officers of the Providence Society at its first establishment, still continue devoted to its interests, for experience gives aids to promote effectually the objects of the Association that no talent can bestow. 'Be not weary in well doing,' for its great reward is the increased power of doing good.

Upwards of three thousand dollars passed through the hands of the Society the first year, notwithstanding numerous discouragements. 'We have employed in all,' says the Report, 'within this first year, two hundred and twenty-two women, to whom we have paid thirty two hundred and sixty-five dollars.' Well done! The Report adds—in speaking of certain kinds of work—'This work has been given to a number of poor women—chiefly widows—who could seldom obtain any from other sources, and who have assured us that if we could but keep them constantly employed, at our prices' (mark that for good!) 'they could live comfortably. A committee of ladies has been appointed to visit these persons, and ascertain their situation and wants from their own lips. They are generally satisfied and grateful; and we are convinced that we need only an increase of means, to do a greater amount of good to them and others in similar situations, than could be done, with the same means, in any other way.'

We should have mentioned before this, that the 'Employment Society' has a store—No. 48 Arcade—where the articles made by those employed for the Society—save contracts—are on sale. A beautiful variety is always to be seen there, and a peculiar charm is given to it by the thought that it was wrought by those who thus kept want from them and theirs.

During the past year, says this Year's Report, 'we have pursued steadily the object of the Society, and have been able to enlarge its operations. There are now 125 women in its employ; but the increase of business is not shown so much in the addition of the number of those employed, as by the greater supply of employment to such. More work has been distributed than ever before, particularly the most desirable kind—coarse sewing. The sale for this has increased in our city, and the plan which has this year been adopted, of sending coarse garments into the neighboring villages, has been successful, and greatly added to the demand. The cases of sickness and destitution, of temporary exigences among the poor, have been most kindly and judiciously considered and relieved by the Superintendent of the Store, to whom the ladies of the Board owe many thanks for her untiring exertions in behalf of this Society, and the distressed women many comforts.—The applications for work are constantly increasing, and we look forward to the time when our patronage shall be so extended, that not one supplicant shall be turned away from a participation in this truest of charities, "where the poor are enabled to supply their own wants."

A great portion of the work provided for the Society—save heavy contracts—being of a nice kind, requiring skill in the use of the needle, the managers found it difficult to confine the supply of work to the poor—to those who needed it; hence the great number mentioned in the first Report. It seems that they have been faulted in this matter, but the faulting only became a means of bringing out new tact for their mission, and led to the adoption of a plan that has produced extensive good and is promiseful of great results. It is this;—The children of the poor, whose parents are incapable of doing, and therefore of teaching, nice sewing, are put to school where they are taught this art. Nine children were sent to school the first year of the adoption of the plan, and in the Report it is said they 'are rapidly improving in this important branch of female education.' 'The original donation for this object was $22, but by the sale of articles on Christmas week, it was increased to $102, which sum is now devoted to the support of these children at school. But we were not satisfied with this partial accomplishment of our hopes; our means were not adequate to meet the great demand, and we had no way of increasing them—therefore, with the advice of gentlemen, interested in the plan, we proposed to lay this subject before the School Committee, as the only effectual method of supplying the want.'

The School Committee were memorialized, but no formal answer was returned—which certainly was not gallant in them, to say the least. But the Society continued and continue their efforts in this novel and excellent branch of charity, and the report for the present year says,—'Twelve children are now sent to school for this purpose, and through this instruction, already, in several instances, has relief been afforded to families. The children at school have made garments for the Store, and the profit therefrom has furnished them with articles of clothing. In a visit of one of the Board to a school in which are several of those children, one of the little girls came forward to show the lady a pair of shoes which she had bought with her own earnings. Thus good is unquestionably effected in two ways—by preparing the child for future usefulness, and exciting thus early a healthful feeling of the pleasures of industry and independence. We hope to be able to extend this part of our charity, and ask for the assistance of all favorable to it. It is dependant at present upon the interest of the fund, and the profit from the yearly sale of Christmas presents.' Donations will gladly be received at the Store, or by any of the Board.

The Report closes with this earnest language:—'And we trust by warm and united effort on the part of those interested in the cause of female employment, that our Society may go on widening its sphere of usefulness. We call upon all to unite in its furtherance. It is often asked, is not this a sectarian movement, is its management monopolized by one denomination, and thus limited in its operations? We answer, No. It is a Society, standing upon the broad ground of christian charity. Its object is to benefit the poor, by teaching them to help themselves. It goes about doing good—carrying to the desolate mother, as she sits in poverty, in the midst of her helpless children, brooding over her woes, employment—urging her to rouse from her lethargy, and by the active use of her energies, and opportunities, to earn her daily bread, rather than beg it. It is a Society which brings within its influence, all who ask for, or are willing to receive employment, of every name and religion. As applications for work are made to the Superintendent, but one question is asked—Do you need it? and when that is satisfactorily answered, their names, whatever be their country, or family, or church to which they belong, are enrolled upon the list of those to be employed, and watched over by this Society.

'We call again, upon all, therefore, to unite with us in this work. Friends of the indigent, help it! It is for man to plant and water the good seed, and God will give it the increase.'

We cannot but express our pleasure at the excellent answer given to one objection in a note appended to this Report:—'It is often objected to the Employment Store, that while its work is done no better, the public are obliged to pay more for it than at other places. Thus it may be proper to remind the public, that the objects of this Institution are benevolent—to encourage those who have laid upon themselves the hard task of supporting themselves, by a fair, or even liberal, recompense for their labor. At the same time, it must be remembered by the objector, that there is a mutual accommodation; because those who give work to the Store, are relieved from cutting or preparing it, or looking up a suitable seamstress; for all which a premium should in justice be paid.' Good!

We hope that the above hasty—necessarily so—sketch of an excellent institution, will commend its objects to the consideration of many in places where similar societies might be established as instruments of great good. Let the plan be well digested; have a bold spirit of determination to succeed; go forward earnestly, yet prudently to demonstrate its utility, and the blessing of many, relieved by attractive industry, will come warm and holy from the grateful heart.

We hope a deeper interest towards the Providence Society may be awakened in this community, and that the managers will be furnished with more abundant means to advance the charity to the children of the poor. Holy and blessed is their mission, and its fruits, culled by memory, will be sweet to the soul as fruit from the 'tree of life' that groweth in beauty and luxuriance by the river of Grace.

THE INVALID'S PLAINT.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

THE balmy summer air again is out upon the hill,
Freighted with merry music-tones from many a chiming rill,
Whose glittering treasures dance along to fertilize the plain,
'Till their never-ceasing carols join the anthems of the main.

Sweet buds are opening in the paths through which I used to stray,

The beech its silken tassels casts along the woodland way;
And spirit-voices call me forth to the dim and shady dells,
Where minstrel bands invisible, weave the harmonic spells.

Alas! for me the blushing flowers unfold their leaves in vain,
Their treasur'd sweetness cannot soothe the burning thrill of pain;

It cannot still the fevered pulse, or cool the throbbing brow,
Or bid again in healthful calm, life's purple current flow.

I cannot wander now to list the wildwood minstrelsies,
As through the swaying boughs I gaze upon the glorious skies;

Or watch the chequer'd shadows glide along the dancing
stream,

Whose murmurings soothe the pensive mind, like harp-tones
in a dream.

The weary hours lag slowly on from morn to dewy night;
Then how the mourning spirit waits, and watches for the light!

O many a bitter dreg I've quaff'd from sorrow's darkling wave,

Alas! my very soul is sick, it pineth for the grave.

That calm retreat, where bleeding hearts obtain the long sought rest,

'Where the wicked cease from troubling,' and the weary ones are blest;

Where wrong, nor woe, nor bitterness can chill the kindly soul,

Or fling the noble spirit back, from true ambition's goal.

But though in sorrow and in gloom, affliction's maze I tread,
I know the everlasting arms are underneath my head;
And when my spirit wanders down the dark mysterious way,
The rod and staff of Zion's King shall be my strength and stay.

And when the Jordan-wave is past, that keeps us from our home,

How gladly through the realms of light, shall the freed spirit roam;

Cull the ambrosial flowers that bloom beside the crystal flood,
The living stream that issues from beneath the throne of God.

There frost and mildew cannot mar the ever-vernal scene,
But fadeless amaranths ever smile, in summer's radiant sheen;

There souls that droop'd on earth, redeem'd from ignorance and sin,

In love's unclouded beams shall drink eternal glories in.

No more shall error's misty veil the enfranchised spirit
shroud,

Through boundless climes of light it soars, above or storm,
or cloud;

New scenes of knowledge e'er incite the wondering soul to raise

To the eternal Fount of truth, loud songs of endless praise.

When we have gain'd those starry shores, shall we remember ought,

Of all the bitterness and grief with which our lives were fraught?

Oh no; the hand of love shall wipe each bitter tear away,
And crown the twilight hours of time with an eternal day.

THE LESSON OF THE FLOWERS.

BY REV. JOHN PRINCE.

THE consideration of flowers, simple as the subject may at first thought appear, is a source of profitable instruction. In the stalks, and leaves, of some of those most common, which are oft-times trodden under foot by man, and which thousands pass unheeded, is displayed the most exquisitely wrought workmanship, and evinced the highest degree of wisdom. And I cannot conceive how any person can attentively consider the simplest wild flower, and not feel a conviction that Intelligence had an agency in bringing it into existence. Flowers all bear a silent, yet sure testimony of the existence of an intelligent Creator. And this is the first point concerning which we are instructed, when we 'consider the lilies of the field.' To receive all the instruction which they are capable of imparting, we should observe 'how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin.' Of all things else, they are seemingly the least useful. They do not, like the rich, delicious fruit, and the ripe grain, gratify the taste, or satisfy the cravings of hunger; neither do they, like the grass, afford sustenance to 'the cattle upon a thousand hills.' But, notwithstanding they are thus seemingly lacking in utility, the Savior told his disciples, who were Jews, and who, in common with their countrymen, had heard much of the splendid royal apparel of their kings, 'that even Solomon, in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these.' The robe of that monarch, though sparkling with thousand precious gems,—and his crown, though thickly set with diamonds, of richest lustre,—were mean and insignificant in comparison with some flowers, with which the fields are adorned, and which are free of access to all. Flowers excel the productions of man's art, in the fineness of their texture, in the brilliancy of their varied and beautiful hues, and in their nice blending of shade with shade. But in that spiritual language which they utter, they appear infinitely more glorious than all the laurels and diadems of earthly conquerors and sovereigns; for they speak of the goodness of God! As they are not useful to supply our bodily wants,—as they neither feed nor clothe us—as they neither toil nor spin, and yet are painted so gaily,—and as it is a truism, that 'nothing was ever made in vain,'—I am constrained to believe that they were placed here upon the earth to gratify our love of the beautiful, to feast the eye, and minister delight to our inward perception of all that is winning and lovely. And if God has thus provided for the gratification of our material and mental vision,—if he has decorated the landscape so beautifully,—if he has caused the lily to open its petals to the sunshine, the rose to expand and shed its fragrance on the air, and the violet to bloom in cheerfulness and modesty; if he has caused all these to contribute to our present enjoyment, can it be that he will ever forsake us, or cease to visit us in mercy? It cannot be! And yet, why will not mankind always confide in him? Why is it that thousands are, as it were, 'all their life-time subject to bondage,' through fear of imaginary evils? Why do they, when surrounded with ample provision for their present wants and necessities, suffer their thoughts to wander into the dim future, and contemplate that future with doubt and dismay? and even people it with demons? It is because they have not sufficient confidence in God. It is because they have not attentively considered the lilies of the field and the fowls of the air. It is because they have entertained erroneous views of the character of that Being, who 'hears the young ravens when they cry,' and who 'tempers the winds to the shorn lamb.' They need to ponder, and answer in their own hearts, the question which succeeds my text: 'Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?'

All the poverty and want which mankind suffer, is not attributable to any lack of provision on the part of our Father in heaven. It is true, there are sometimes seasons of drought and famine. But these are very rare in occurrence, when compared with seasons of plenty with which we are favored. And man can, by frugality and industry, fortify himself against times of scarcity. The oppression, the sordid dispositions of men, the treachery and fraud they practise, are what cause more than half the poverty and wretchedness experienced in the world; and the rest is produced by the vices of those who suffer, or of others connected with them, and by ignorance and disobedience of the laws of our being. If all mankind would trust in God for the supplying of their wants, and be as benevolent towards each other as God is towards them, there would not be so much want and wretchedness among earth's children, as there is at present. The 'times' would always be 'good;' for good and bad times would not depend upon the adoption of a government measure, or its veto; but the times would depend upon the provisions of that Ruler and Governor, whose law is never abrogated, and whose bounty is unfailing!

In the political and business world, the times in which we live, are called 'hard times;' and, in some respects, they are emphatically so. And yet, has the Deity withheld his preserving influence, or his blessings? He has not, in the least! No fearful epidemic has prevailed within our borders, sweeping off thousands in a day. The atmosphere, so necessary for our comfort and even our life, is as pure and health-giving as ever. The sun shines as he has shone in time past; the rains fall, and nightly the dews distil. The present season is fruitful; and not only so, but very abundant; and when the sober Autumn time arrives, (and it will soon be here) those who have tilled the soil, will find no reluctance on its part to yield that which was deposited, with a gratifying increase,—some thirty, some sixty, and some an hundred fold. The causes of penury and want are not, therefore, chargeable to any deficiency of God's operations in nature, but they may be found in the overbearing conduct, the oppression and dishonesty of men, who aggrandize themselves at the expense of others.

Let us always cherish confidence in God. When the sound of the world's selfishness, or murmuring, falls upon our ear, let us turn our attention to the works of nature, and remember who it is that 'causeth the grass to grow for the cattle, and herb for the service of man;' who hath planted the fir trees as a house for the stork, who hath made 'the high hills a refuge for the wild goats, and the rocks for the conies.'

Are any doubtful, or distrusting, of God's goodness? Are any trembling and dejected, fearing that the Almighty will be their enemy, and will not always shield and protect them, or that he will inflict misery upon them, when they quit this mortal scene? Let them 'behold the fowls of the air; for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them.' And especially let them 'consider the lilies of the field,' which neither toil nor spin, and are yet more splendidly arrayed than Solomon. Let them do this, and they shall receive lessons of confidence and trust.

'The grain,' said Newton, 'is God's bounty; but the flowers are his smiles.' That is a beautiful sentiment! Flowers are the smiles of Deity! And while we partake of God's bounty, and are made glad by his smiles, are we ungrateful? Do we transgress his laws? Do we violate his wise statutes, which, if obeyed, would make us happy? Can it be, that we are guilty of these things? Let us all ponder seriously this question, and answer it each one for himself.

ILLUSTRATION OF PLATE.

WHY does that old man daily turn
Those pages with that heavenward look?
Is it because his eyes discern
Superior glories in that book?

Ay, 'tis because that glowing page
Contains those truths the stars declare—
That God is love from age to age,
And moves mysterious everywhere.

It is because he loves the songs
Which Israel sang in days of yore;
When they were freed from tyrant's wrongs,
And trod in safety Canaan's shore.

He loves that book—for therein speaks
The holy prophets God inspired;
And prayerfully that old man seeks
To fire his soul as theirs were fired.

He loves that book because 'tis there
His Father's promise meets his eye—
That far beyond this world of care
All men shall live—no more to die.

He loves that book—what else to him
Whose sands of life are nearly run;
Whose locks are white, whose eye is dim,
Whose friends have left him one by one;

What else to him can be so dear
As that blest word, which God has given
To teach his soul to know not fear,
And bear it on to home—to heaven.

PROGRESS TOWARDS TRUTH;

OR THE TWO FRIENDS.

BY HENRY BACON.

CHAPTER I.

'Let the frame perish so the soul survive
Pure, spiritual and loving. I believe
The grave exalts, not separates, the ties
That holds us in affection to our kind.
I will look down from yonder pitying sky,
Watching and waiting those I love on earth,
Anxious in heaven until they too are there.

L. E. L.

A BRIGHTER day never came from heaven to win from the heart of sensibility admiration towards the beauty of the outward world. Mid-summer reigned, and the earth was clothed in its holiday attire—so rich and gay, that I could not but fancy—and the fancy was so vivid that it startled me!—that the time had come, and nature knew it, for the advent of some illustrious being. It was joy to think so, and that joy made outward nature even more beautiful than when first I involuntarily confessed its charms and was transfixed with admiration. And it is ever thus; the hues of our thoughts and feelings will color every object perceived. The pharisees saw shadows, deep and dark, on the face of Jesus, and called him a blasphemer, while the disciples beheld an unearthly light in his countenance, and a halo round his head, and owned him Lord! And so with the material world. All its beauties have been regarded by some as betraying man into a sinful fondness for his prison-house, while to others the same loveliness has been a revelation of the 'first Author of beauty'—his wisdom, power and love.

'The rill is tuneless to his ear who feels
No harmony within; the South wind steals
As silent, as unseen, amid the leaves.
Who has no inward beauty, none perceives,
Tho' all around is beautiful.'

As these thoughts coursed through my mind, I saw advancing in the road that wound round the hill, two female forms clothed in the habiliments of mourners; and as I stretched my gaze, I saw they had come from the grave-yard, from whence quite a crowd was issuing. I soon discovered them to be Mary Hartley and Ellinor Reed—intimate friends—ever with each other when abroad, and both noted for their amiability. They came to the base of the hill on which I stood, and sat down opposite to the lake that spread out its clear and beautiful waters in the distance, reflecting on its surface all the varying hues of the slowly moving clouds and the trees and plants that fringed the borders. I was screened from them by the trees and thick foliage, and could not resist the desire to listen to their conversation, feeling sure it would be in reference to the dead, so solemn were their countenances and tearful their eyes.

'O Mary,' said Ellinor, 'I cannot keep the image of Sarah's poor mother out of my sight, as she looked when she gazed her last on her dear child. There was so much affection mingled with so much anxiety, that the tears forced their way through my eyes, and I wished I could be a daughter to her in her loneliness.'

'Twas the same with me, and my soul groaned within me, so earnest was my desire to speak after the minister had uttered those bitter words.'

'Yes, they were indeed bitter—to declare that so good and amiable a girl as Sarah, would give the world to plead with her young companions, that they might not come to the place of anguish to which she is doomed,—was horrible—too horrible for that time and place.'

'True; but it proved more fully what I have for many years believed, that the popular religion makes man an artificial being—restrains his natural sympathies—ties down his best feelings, and makes him utter the language of cold theology when the religion of the heart should be expressed.'

'Why, Mary! you speak too strongly—you forget yourself.'

'No, Ellinor, no! I do not, nor will you think I do when you have thought as much as I have thought on those matters. I repeat that parson Norwin did only speak as a minister and not as a man—not as the friend of the poor widow deprived of her only child, the solace and comfort of her age—not as Jesus would have spoken in that house of mourning. Sarah was not, as the phrase is, "a professor of religion;" she was not a member of any visible church; but O did not her goodness, her filial devotedness, her active kindness, her meekness, the amiability of her whole life, make professions for her, and prove her a member of the church of the good? Who did not love her, that ever knew her goodness? Who would not have rejoiced to have their daughter or sister like her? Who was ever followed to the grave with more affection and respect than she? and over whose resting place can an eloquent inscription be placed with more justice than over hers? Who will reach heaven, if she has not found entrance there?'

The overwhelmed heart could utter no more. Ellinor fully sympathized in the grief of her friend; they both had loved Sarah with no ordinary affection, and treasured her memory as flowers treasure sunbeams and dew. They had gathered to the funeral with solemn minds and full hearts, as to the burial of one whose absence would ever be felt amid the socialities of life. Every fine feeling of their natures was alive and peculiarly sensitive, and they were ready to hear, and felt they ought to hear, only words of comfort—such words as the sympathizing heart would utter to the sorrow stricken mother. They waited in stillness for the pastor to speak; and O when he did arise, it was with so much sternness in his countenance, that they hid their eyes in terror. He spoke of death being ever near to remind us of the duty of closing with the overtures of mercy, and speedily making our peace with God; and that many were too apt to defer this serious business till the time when sickness and death approached, and they then found that the insulted and repulsed Spirit would no longer plead with them, but leave them to the fate of which he had warned them so many times through his ministers. He alluded to her who lay in death near them, as one who had been highly favored with the means of grace—who had been anxiously desired to enter the door of the church, while many were going in; but she had kept away; 'and now,' said the pastor, 'she would give worlds if she had them to give, could she but plead with her young friends to be wise while the Spirit waits, and thus keep from the torments to which she is now doomed.'

The groans of the mother were agonizing to hear, the sobbing on every side was tumultuous, and much that was afterwards said was lost in consequence. The heart of the pastor was touched, and his prayer was in strange contrast with the remarks he had offered. When the service was over, the great crowd was silent—it was the silence of calm deliberation, for each heart felt that humanity had been outraged, and even the warmest friends of the pastor hesitated as they sought to apologize for his course, and only said, 'He thought it was his duty to speak so.'

Strong and deep thoughts—earnest and solemn questionings were awakened in many minds that never before had known the like; and as the long procession passed through the streets, the observers were struck with the peculiar thoughtfulness of its members. Many companions felt a relief when they left the grave-yard, and were privileged to take their own paths and converse, and thus give utterance to their deep emotions. It was so with Mary and her friend, and I could hope that the conversations of many were like theirs.

The friends recovered from the overflow of grieved sensibility, and as they looked up, both of them caught sight of the widow with a few of her kindred, slowly pursuing their way to the cottage on the opposite shore of the lake.

'O Mary! how sad must be that home now Sarah is gone!' said Ellinor, with tearful eyes, gazing on the travelers and clasping the hand of her friend.

'Aye,' responded Mary, 'and how sad heaven must be, for Sarah cannot go there, as parson Norwin says.'

'Mary,' said Ellinor, very solemnly, 'that tone and manner tell me you think parson Norwin wrong.'

'I do,—I do!' quickly responded Mary. 'I do, as I believe God is good and just. I believe he preaches a doctrine that wars no less with every thing honorable to the Deity, than it does with human sympathies and affections—and O with them it wars with fierce power and desolating wrath! Have you not felt so many a time and oft as in yonder temple you have sat and trembled, and have gone home sick at heart? Have you not felt it keenly this day, and O does not that childless widow feel it but too deeply now?'

'But, Mary, we must school and discipline our feelings.'

'True—but not to be indifferent to the miseries of those we love, here or hereafter—not to become willing that they suffer, and seek resignation in the troublous time when we think of them, by calling it "a mystery." I cannot school my feelings so.'

'God requires nought but what we can do.'

'I believe it—I rejoice in it, but I do not believe he ever required mortal beings to murmur not at the prospects of the eternal misery of their friends—the near and dear. You say true, and I think, while the sentiment is remembered, of what we heard last Sabbath afternoon—how that we are required to seek sanctification, that of ourselves we can do nothing, and yet that the Sanctifier will not come till we pray and plead therefor;—You remember the figure the parson used to set forth the state of the unregenerated?

‘O yes! that of the entombed dead man.’

‘Yes; and you remember how he described the dead man lying beneath the sod, surrounded with corruption, not conscious of the worms crawling over him, the tramp of passers by over his head, or even the thunders rolling in the sky;—he saw not—he heard not—he moved not—nor could he do either. Such we were told is the case of the unregenerated; and if so, how can they be responsible beings, having no powers of true spiritual activity to be accountable for? how can a dead man pray? and how absurd it is to say that unless he prays devoutly, the Sanctifier will not come, and his endless destruction must be upon his own head.’

‘I did not think of that.’

‘And I suppose, dear Ellinor, that you did not think this afternoon, how amiable the parson was forced to make our friend in the place of torment, in order to carry out his figure?’

‘I know not what you mean.’

‘I guessed as much. Did he not say that she would give worlds, had she them to give, to keep her companions away from the place of torment, and that she plead of them to be wise in time? and did not all this speak most eloquently in behalf of her goodness and benevolence, and that she is the same kind creature she was on earth? Can there be more benevolence in hell towards friends on earth, than there is in heaven for those in hell?’

‘Why, Mary, you alarm me! I never heard you talk so wild before!’

‘Wild, ay, as Paul was wild before Festus; as Jesus was when he saw, “Satan, as lightning, fall from heaven!” O Ellinor, I am not wild! I have often burned to tell you the thoughts of my solitude, but, I know not why, I have been reluctant to introduce them, for I know how unquestioning you have taken the theology of your good father,—good in spite of his creed, and I feared an estrangement of feeling when you should discover me a heretic.’

‘You need fear that no longer, for I have begun to think, to read with busy questionings, and we may be useful to each other.’

‘Thank God, I doubt it not. I should rejoice to converse freely and in earnest, as I know the beauty of truth, how it gains by contrast, and how fully adapted it is to the human heart—to purify and exalt its affections, and make the believer a devoted child of God. Yes, Ellinor, you will, I trust, soon know what a revolution takes place in the inward being by the mastery of truth, and what a change comes over the spirit of her life who was once governed by fear, but yields at last to love—the love of God’s service through gratitude for infinite favors. But we must now hasten home. Yet we will often retire to this secluded place and commune together on these things.’

‘We will, and look to God for direction.’

They arose, and pursued the winding road to the westerly part of the village, and as they left my sight, I could not but beseech Heaven to bless their investigations, and make them joyful in his holy truth. The sun was descending, and the tall trees lengthened their shadows on the waters soon to be without beauty. Thus, thought I, would it be with the mental world to my gaze, were my great hope in God’s universal love to set in darkness. All beauty would depart—all pleasantness be eclipsed! And a deep darkness would come upon my soul as I thought that unlike the sun, the setting hope was not vanishing from my gaze that it might rise to that of others! The sun of our religion never sets.

CHAPTER II.

OUR nature hath the stamp of God. He made
Our souls for virtue; if we list to hear
The voice within, ’twill plead for virtue’s claims.
Heed them, my soul, and be for God always,
And thou wilt happy live.

MARY HARTLEY was the youngest daughter of a highly respected and learned clergyman, who departed this life with a hope so enlarged that his friends attributed it to the great benevolence of his nature, rather than to the study for truth. Mary knew that he had not fashioned a God after his own heart, but sought to know the Deity as he revealed himself in his word and works; yet she marvelled how man’s benevolence of heart could make the Deity assume more loveliness than the reality permitted; and she often thought of the admission necessarily made by those who accounted for her father’s change of faith in the manner we have mentioned. She often thought how it could be, that the christian religion was designed to satisfy the most enlarged affections, and yet required the contraction of some of the holiest and most benevolent! But these were but a few and the faintest of the absurdities she had met with in her examinations of creeds and doctrines, and she marvelled not long that these should be received when she recalled the greater that were acquiesced in without a murmur of dissent. She had been her father’s secretary—had read much to him—and had become familiar with a range of literature not commonly attended to by females. She acknowledged the great benefits of this acquaintance in enabling her to converse and reason on intricate subjects, and do much for truth among those young females who are too easily made subjects of agonizing excitements. Yet she was diffident, and had kept to herself the new views she had received, till the occurrence detailed so operated as to make her resolve she would, come what might, be open and free among those with whom she had influence.

Her friend Ellinor, was a daughter of the venerable deacon of the village church—a worthy man who never pretended to ask the why or wherefore of a single article of the creed, glorying that he believed as the church believed, and aiming to do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly alway. He had never given any earnest self-directed thought to his theology, and therefore it never became a part of his mental being. He acted from the pure impulses of his nature, controlled by a firm determination to do right. His life had been irreproachable, and it would have been so were his a more liberal theology; aye, and with such a theology, it would have caused a more elastic cheerfulness of spirits, a livelier enjoyment of nature, a deeper enthusiasm of soul in the devotions of God's house, and a warmer fervency of love and adoration as he thought of the future.

His daughter was like him in quietness and goodness. As yet she had given but little study to the foundations of faith, and like thousands she imagined she was a christian believer, although she could not set forth any reasons for her belief sufficient to show that she had examined the matter for herself. Like an intelligent lady I once knew, she signed the Calvinistic creed and would deny any sympathy with some of the doctrines of its articles. There was no hypocrisy, or falsehood, in the acts so opposite; for what was in the creed she knew not when she signed it, and her benevolent nature revolted at its sentiments soon as they were mentioned to her. Ellinor had lately met with a treatise on 'Depravity,' in which the writer appealed to facts in every day life, to reason and conscience, and to the Scriptures, against the doctrine she heard advocated and in which she had confessed her belief. She took the treatise to her chamber and there read and re-read it carefully—examined all its Scripture references, and earnestly pondered on its reasonings. She felt she must acknowledge the straight forwardness of the writer in laying out his premises and building on them, fact by fact, as it seemed to her; and she found a power of thought awakened in her such as she had never known before. The records of her own consciousness were brought to her view. She questioned the past of her own life, and she knew—knew beyond the power of any reasonings to convey—that the heart is not all evil, nor ruled by sinful devices. She knew that from her earliest recollections she had always been pained by the slightest deviations from the right, and had wept hours over her faults, ere she had been capable of receiving from man religious instructions. She now remembered how invariably in the treatment of human nature, the advocates of native depravity had referred to the evil which children do—to their willfulness and quarrels, without taking an account of their good—their affection and trustfulness, and how they quarrel but for moments, and play in harmony for hours. She thought of the Savior's words in reference to children,* and asked herself what it was for men to become like little children? She was confident it could not mean that the Savior desired them to have aught of the evils of childhood in manhood—their ignorance, credulity, or inability to reason; as this would condemn his character in the minds of all rational beings. What did he mean when he spoke of the disciples being converted and becoming as little children? She saw it was the going back of the spirit to the purity of childhood—its trustfulness, its filial affection; to the same nearness to God as was enjoyed when the youthful prayer was breathed. She thought of those years, and their pleasant memories came over her like a subduing power—the odor of sweetest flowers. Her own consciousness gave strong evidence against the popular theory of depravity, and her soul revolted against it. She knew she had never hated God, or Jésus; she knew she had never been at war with good; she knew she had ever, from early childhood, loved and found her best pleasure in doing right, and the new thoughts thus awakened created a great mental struggle, causing her to weep bitterly and long. When calmness again returned, the Scripture—'Sin is the transgression of the law!' sounded in her ear as from an angel voice, and she felt that declaration was enough to settle the controversy—that was plain and must govern the meaning of all that appeared mysterious. How can a child be born a transgressor of any law? was a query that was sufficient to keep her from asking more. In her soul she confessed it false to assert that man is born 'wholly depraved, in all the faculties and parts of soul and body;' 'utterly indisposed, disabled, and made opposite to all good, and wholly inclined to all evil.†' No one can believe this. And what would society be, were it true? every new born child an embryo fiend—every unregenerated man and woman wholly inclined to evil! Our whole being revolts at the idea. The universal uneasiness of guilt is directly opposed to it, and the experience of every man testifies that his natural and happiest element is not iniquity.

It was in reference to this mental controversy that Ellinor said to Mary, 'I have begun to think.' From this time every thing she read appeared differently to her—even the most familiar volumes of the deacon's little library seemed now new, for she read with different sensibilities and sympathies than were before alive. She had begun to doubt—to doubt as every one has who has come out from mystifying and clouding errors into the enjoyment of bright truth. She could not rest in her doubts, and was glad indeed when Mary proposed a series of conversations on the subject that now engrossed her attention; for she knew what privileges her friend had enjoyed, and how well fitted she was to discuss the questions at issue. She regretted that she had not ere this made mention of her anxieties to Mary, but resolved by diligence to recover lost time and opportunities. As it was with those friends, so is it with many most familiar in the intercourse of life. There is not freedom enough in the interchange of thoughts and feelings on religious matters, even with wedded companions,—not enough revealing of each others' experience which would highly benefit them; as the subjects of serious and heartfelt conversation would engage their best feelings and enlist their holiest affections, and they would be prepared to treat, as rational beings, whatever doctrines might be presented to them by their elders. How much time is wasted in idle and profitless chat, that might thus be usefully and happily employed; and believe not, reader, O believe not, that serious communion will rob nature of its pleasantness, or dim one single ray of warning and enlivening gladness. Think and conclude correctly, and it will be with thee as it was with Haydn. A poet and a friend, once asked him how it was that his church music was almost always of an animating and cheerful character? To this the eminent composer replied,—‘I cannot make it otherwise; I write according to the thoughts which I feel;—when I think upon God, my heart is so full of joy, that the notes dance and leap as it were from my pen; and since God has given me a cheerful heart, it will easily be forgiven me, that I serve him with a cheerful spirit.’ I repeat,—it will in time be with thee as it was with him, save that thou wilt not speak of being forgiven for serving God with a cheerful spirit, as though that were faulty. No: the impulses of a cheerful spirit are notes of praise most acceptable to God, and we are invited to ‘serve the Lord with gladness.’ His commandments ‘are not grievous;’ all the laws of duty are rules for happiness—for the truest enjoyment of life. They are adapted to our nature, to the cultivation and best developements of our powers; they can the best guide us to usefulness, to repay to others in real good the benefits we receive; and they will enable us so to live that our memories shall be embalmed in the affections of those who knew us. The want of religious affections,—of true devotion to the commandments of God, produces a want in every part of our essential being. Our Master felt this when he said ‘My meat is to do the will of Him who sent me, and to finish his work.’

Let us pause and consider this. We take meat—(or food, as that term signifies,)—not only because it yields sustenance to our animal system, strengthens, invigorates, and continues its life; but also because it gratifies our appetites, is agreeable, and yields pleasure. The pleasure afforded by partaking of meat or suitable provision of food, is as much thought of as the other end it promotes by assimilation in contributing to the essentials of animal life. Together they afford a strong reason for gratitude to God, that the very means he has ordained for the sustenance of our life should contribute to our pleasure; and while nature requires frequent supplies of nourishment, there is delight experienced in yielding her the needed support. Were it not for this wise ordination of our Heavenly Benefactor, how much enjoyment should we lose, how much would our daily pleasures be lessened. But throughout the moral and spiritual world the analogy holds good. It is a truth that obedience to the laws of God is connected with happiness—delight is the effect of devotedness.

There is no law written clearer on our whole being than that the right use of a power or faculty, mental or physical, increases its capacity. ‘Knowledge is power,’ is a proverbial assertion. And why true? Because knowledge opens to view the best way and means to apply power possessed. To illustrate: Here is a bark upon the ocean; the waters are sleeping and the commander is in repose. A storm arises; terror seizes the crew who know not where they are or what should first be done. The power of the vessel to ride out the storm in safety is feeble under the direction of such; but when the commander comes forth, his knowledge of the whole processes of means enables him to have confidence and inspire the hearts of others with the same, and then knowledge proves the power of safety. He has gained this, not in the retreats of home, amid pleasure and quietness. There he may have learned the elements of this knowledge—the theory—but the application, the practice, he has learned amid storms and peril upon the mighty deep. Those times of trial proved to him how different it was to sit in the study and look upon the open sea and calculate how a barque should be managed to contend against a storm, from being amidst the contending armies of waves and attempting there the fearful task he deemed an easy matter when on shore. Experience however imparted confidence, and strength of purpose and execution, so that the energy of a true sailor was degree after degree given to him, or rather bought by him. So it is with the christian. He can theorise and feel confident in his knowledge of the right; but devotedness to active duty can alone prove what strength, or spiritual skill and tact he has. The resistance he makes to evil, the vigor with which he goes forward unflinchingly to do God’s will, develops the more his spiritual strength, and he becomes strong in the Lord and in the power of his might. The food that is adapted to our physical system gives out new life to every part of our animal being; so do the effects of well doing operate on the spiritual man. When we have performed one difficult work, we are strengthened by the satisfaction to do another; and thus by continual devotedness, we may continuously partake of the strengthening meat of which the inactive world knows not. The word thus becomes 'spirit and life.'

The poet has sung respecting religion

'According as her labors rise
So her rewards increase!'

which is literally true, and of the highest importance as a truth. The sentiment may be well set forth by one of the oriental fables of Herder. 'A king was about to plant a garden and summoned laborers to the work, without stipulation; he left each one free in his toil, and at evening only enquired on what he had labored. Each one showed him what he had performed; this one had planted a fig tree, that one an olive, the third a cypress, and the fourth a palm tree. The householder gave to every one according to his labor, and thus was his garden planted with various trees. Had the laborers known what tree among them would have received the highest reward, the design of the householder would not have been attained; a variety of trees would not have been planted in his garden.'

This fable is of easy application to our every day duties, or virtues. They are all important and must be attended to. Some require the expenditure of more effort than others, as in the case of the planting of the various trees; to the performance or the cultivation of each, there is attached an appropriate reward, but the experience which follows the performance can alone decide which has the richest blessings. Of this much, however, we may be certain, that our reward will be enhanced according to the effort put forth in the garden of God.

And is not the reward one of the purest and most satisfactory character? It is; for it has all the elements of true mental satisfaction. He who conquers passion, overcomes evil desire, subjugates the sensual to the spiritual, is conscious of the approbation of God, the applause of all the good were they to know it, and has within him that undefinable lofty feeling of gladness which follows an increase of spiritual strength and moral courage. And truly and wisely hath it been said—'that a sacrifice was never offered to a principle, that was not made up to us by self approval and the consideration of what our degradation would have been had we done otherwise. Certainly it is a pleasant and a wise thing, then to follow what is right, when we only go along with our affections, and take the easy way of the virtuous propensities of our nature.' And here we may also quote with strict propriety the affirmation of an old man, who declared he never did a bad action without afterwards regretting it, and never performed a good deed without afterward receiving pleasure thereby. 'The external circumstances of actions,' added he, 'furnish no standard by which to measure their influence on the happiness of him by whom they are committed.'

Doing the right is the healthy and happy element of the soul. The uneasiness of guilt, no less than the rejoicing of obedience, testifies the truth of this doctrine, and the infinite wisdom of Unerring Benevolence will be manifested by the ultimate union of all souls to the Right, and by the joy of a holy universe.

SONNET—HOME VALE.

A GLOOM hangs o'er thee now, Home Vale!

The friends I loved have all departed;

Thy flowers around have all grown pale,

E'en they have missed the pure true-hearted.

But how my soul doth cling to thee!

O, what a magic spell is on me!

Here do I love to bend my knee,

While midnight stars look down upon me.

Ay, fall, hot tears! like summer rain

Around this home of 'christian graces';—

I cannot bring them back again—

Those joyous scenes, those happy faces,

But 'tis a blessed boon to keep

A vigil here—to sigh—to weep.

AFFECTING STORY OF MATERNAL LOVE.

IN the village of Careggi, whether it was that due precaution had not been taken, or that the disease was of a particularly malignant nature, one after another, first the young and the old, of a whole family dropped off. A woman who lived on the opposite side of the way, the wife of a laborer and mother of two little boys, felt herself attacked by fever in the night; in the morning it greatly increased, and in the evening the fatal tumor appeared. This was during the absence of her husband who went to work at a distance, and only returned on Saturday night bringing home the scanty means of subsistence for the family for the week. Terrified by the example of the neighbor's family, moved by the fondest love for her children, and determined not to communicate the disease to them, she formed the heroic resolution of leaving her home, and going elsewhere to die. Locking them into a room, and sacrificing to their safety even the last and sole comfort of a parting embrace, off she ran, down stairs, carrying with her the sheets, &c., that she might leave no means of contagion. She then shut the door with a sigh, and went away; but the largest, hearing the door shut, went to the window, and seeing her run in that manner, cried out, 'Good by, mother,' in a voice so tender, that she involuntarily stopped. 'Good by, mother,' repeated the youngest child, stretching his little hand out of the window; and thus was the poor afflicted mother compelled for a time to endure the dreadful conflict between the yearnings which called her back, and the pity and solicitude which urged her on. At length the latter conquered, and amid a flood of tears, and the farewells of her children, who knew not the fatal cause and import of those tears, she reached the house of those who were to bury her. She recommended her husband and children to them, and in two days she was no more.

EDITOR'S BOOK TABLE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., OCTOBER, 1842.

The Rose of Sharon, for 1843.

In our notice of the Rose, as printed in our last No., no mention was made of several articles contained in that beautiful volume. How the omission occurred, we cannot tell. But here we make the 'amende honorable.' No mention was made of one of the best poems which ever came from the writer's pen—'The Last Lay,' S. C. Edgarton. This is an eloquent out speaking of a rapt soul full of lofty and thrilling thought. It is strong—O how strong! It lifts the whole being up and leaves it to adore at the Eternal Throne. What agony should we know did we think this was in very deed the last lay of our sweetest harp! The next is a poem by Miss H. Jane Woodman, (Ione) written in the style in which she excels—and is entitled, 'The Unforgotten.' The next is a prose article of peculiar and great worth, 'The Comet,' by Mrs. L. J. B. Case. This is written in that rich, musical style which always gives an exquisite grace to the writer's contributions to our literature, and will enchain the attention of every mind in which dwells a love of the excellent and the beautiful. It is all gold.

Reader, add these to the outline given in our last, and then say if a rich treat is not promised you in the possession of the Rose! You must acknowledge the richness of the promise—be sure to make it yours.

The editor of the 'New York Tribune' has very favorably noticed the 'Rose.' He says, 'We rejoice to see that the number of its contributors and the value of their articles increase with each succeeding year, and to hear that it every year finds a wider and wider circle of readers.' 'There is a decided improvement in the literary contents of this number, as compared with those of any former issue.'

We hope that the friends of Religious Intellectuality will show their friendship by extending the sale and circulation of this work.

Practical and Experimental Religion; or the Teachings and Tendencies of Universalism. By Henry Bacon. Providence: Z. Baker. 12 mo. 212 pages.

This is a new work just issued from the press. A previous notice has been prevented by a disappointment in respect to the publication of the work, in consequence of which we did not expect it would be sent forth till next spring. A proposition for its publication was unexpectedly made, and was accepted, by which it was hurried through the press the week previous to the Convention.

It is not a controversial work any farther than was necessary to set forth the teachings of our faith in their connection with the practice and experience of true religion. We hope it will meet a want, and be useful in bringing home to the heart the benign influence of heavenly truth. We put our trust more in its spirit, than in the letter. It will treat of 'A Practical Aim in Controversy'—'Theoretical Knowledge'—'The Love of Truth'—'The Moral Authority of Truth'—'Truth a Prophetic Spirit'—'Truth and the Feelings'—'Truth and Sensibility'—'Truth and the Love of Pleasure'—'Truth inclining to Domestic Worship'—'Truth deepened by the Communion'—'Truth rendering life a Festival,' and, if space admits, of other subjects. The importance of blending christian truth with the whole life, is the great theme, and how it is discussed, will be seen by the reader.

It is designed to be a companion to the 'Christian Comforter,' and if it meets with the favor extended to that work, we shall be satisfied. The spirit is the same in both works. It is published in similar style to the 'Comforter,' only larger type, and is afforded at the same price—50 cents single. We hope to greet it in the homes of many of our friends—not only here, but abroad. Br. Baker publishes it on his own responsibility, and therefore we desire attention to it—in hope that the sale may answer his expectations. It may be used as a series of brief discourses, where such are needed; and we hope it will not be found unworthy of a place in the family, social, Institute, or Sabbath School library.

Three Inquiries: 1. Into the Scriptural Doctrine concerning the Devil and Satan; 2. The extent of duration expressed by the terms Olim, Aion, and Aionios, rendered Everlasting, &c. &c. in the Bible, and especially when applied to punishment; 3. The New Testament doctrine concerning the possession of Devils. By Walter Balfour. Third Edition. Providence: Z. Baker. 1842. pp. 420.

This is a very handsome edition of a very useful work—a work that treats plainly, fully, and with direct reference to the Scriptures, of important subjects. These subjects the title page describes, and the discussion of them is for the common mind, as well as for those who are adepts in Hebrew and Greek. The author will never be charged with presumption, for he labors every point, and strengthens every position with the most abundant proof. This is an excellence not always met with in theological works, for it is a too common practice to state a proposition, and then, quoting several scripture passages, leave the point as fixed, as though the author never dreamed that to quote scripture is one thing, but to show that it has any reference to the matter in support of which it is cited, quite another.

The Third Part of the present work is an addition in this Edition, rendering the work more complete and valuable. We commend it to public notice.

Life of Murray. Miniature edition. Providence: Z. Baker. 16mo. pp. 360.

There has been quite a variety of editions of the 'Life of Murray' issued from the press, but this is certainly the neatest and prettiest. A large amount of matter is compressed in a small compass, and though the type is small, smaller, smallest, three kinds, yet the print is fair, and easily read. It is published at an exceedingly low price—33 cents, and will make a fine present book. We know not of a book that has issued from the Universalist press, that has inclined stubborn hearts to think good of Universalism, as this has. There is in it to many an indescribable charm, that is perfectly entrancing—so rich is it in that enthusiasm which always finds its way to the heart. The present issue comprises the Life, Notes, and Index.

A Kiss for a Blow. By Henry C. Wright. 16mo. Pp. 200.

This is a very neatly printed work for children, young or old. 'Its object is,' as the Liberator well remarks, 'to show how evil may be overcome by kindness—that a kiss for a blow will in all cases be better than blow for blow—and that retaliation and revenge are contrary to the spirit of christianity. These lessons are inculcated in the shape of stories—the simple facts of which, Mr. Wright states, with few exceptions, have occurred under his own observation. They are, in short, sketches drawn from life. During the last fifteen years, the author says he has been an inmate of over one thousand families, and has addressed more than fifty thousand children, and recorded hundreds of incidents, that serve to illustrate the gentle, loving spirit of Peace, and the malignant, blood-thirsty spirit of Revenge. If every parent in the land would supply his children with copies of this admirable work, we believe the peace of the nation would thereby be better secured than by all the military and naval forces now in existence. All those who are seeking to find an acceptable gift to present to some darling child, will do well to buy "A Kiss for a Blow."'

FACTS, NOT WORDS.

BY HENRY BACON.

AMONG the important instructions given by the Apostle Paul to his spiritual son Timothy, we find the following: 'Of these things put them in remembrance, charging them before the Lord that they strive not about words to no profit, but to the subverting of the hearers.' The things of which Timothy was to remind the disciples, referred to faithfulness to their profession, by which alone they could be partakers of the glory of Christ, who was faithful in all things. Frequently does the Apostle direct attention to this important matter, always ascribing unto Jesus the beauty and honor of a life devoted to the best aims and ends, and deducing therefrom a persuasion that he will ever be the best friend, under God, of man—the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, through the eternal Spirit. It was this spirit of devotion to the highest claims, that caused our Lord to refuse to meddle with every trivial question of his day—to deny, as he sometimes did, the gratification of a too far reaching or a too limited curiosity, and caused him in great wisdom to free himself from the snares which were cunningly laid for him. He knew that if he stooped to meddle with these matters, he should disturb and divert that concentration of mental attention to the principles he advocated, which was necessary in order that the people might comprehend the objects of his mission. In this he was wise; for often in the discussion of important questions, there are so many matters introduced not necessarily connected therewith, that the attention is distracted, and whereas the mind should be studying one star and its relations, it is wandering over the whole heavens. To excite to this wandering is one great object with every sophist—with every one who fears what calm and concentrated thought may do. Hence, when the Sadducees conversed with Jesus with respect to the Resurrection, they came with idle questions, instead of rational and serious inquiries or arguments, doubtless wishing to load with difficulties what they dare not resolutely and honestly meet. Therefore they wished to know whose wife a woman should be in the future world, as in this she had had seven husbands! Jesus did not answer it direct, but as many were in attendance from all classes of the Jews, it was necessary that he should make some reply; he did make a reply in the memorable words by which he asserted the spirituality of the future state, and appealed to the sacred books the Sadducees received, as containing intimations at least of his doctrine. They did not believe in any future life—'angel or spirit,' that is, neither in a higher order of intelligences than man, or in an immaterial spirit in man. The question then, which should have received all attention, was touching these matters which they denied—the existence of angel and spirit. It was all idle to treat of others which had no meaning while they clung to these essential errors; and Jesus would have passed by their inquiry, had he not seen a good opportunity for him to refer to an important record in the books of Moses, and contrast it with the doctrines of the Sadducees, in presence of the people. His wisdom is therefore seen in this attention to an idle question, as clearly as in the passing of others in silence; and consequently we read, that when the multitude heard the Savior's quotation from Exodus, iii. 6. 15. and his remark upon it, 'they were astonished at his doctrine'—they saw the truth of his remark that the Sadducees erred, not knowing, or not rightly understanding and receiving the Scriptures. They went home to discuss a new thought which had put the boasting materialist philosophers to silence; and in the small communities where opinions and reflections were interchanged, some good may have been done—the foundation perhaps laid for a true and beautiful faith in the Messiah.

But it is an indiscreet course to leave the discussion of great matters, to meddle with small ones. The reply of Nehemiah should often be recalled—'I am doing a great work, so that I cannot come down; why should the work cease, whilst I leave it, and come down to you.' Four times did the enemy send, and four times was the same answer returned. The fifth attempt only obtained a kindred answer: 'Then I sent, saying, There are no such things done as thou sayest, but thou feignest them out of thine own heart.' It is so now. There are many who would take us from the great work of repairing the broken walls of the spiritual Jerusalem, to talk with them of the most foolish questions, to the wasting of words and breath ; for if you attempt to engage in work—in fair and resolute reasoning and argument, they soon fly off—they remember some engagement which their trifling made them forget.

Here comes one to call us down who professes to believe in 'endless punishment' as a Scripture doctrine. What does he wish to talk of? One would presume that it would be touching this sentiment. But no. He has got an idea in his head that certain forms of Restorationism look very much like the Roman Catholic doctrine of Purgatory. He imagines that it gives him a capital chance of shooting with great prospect of game, and he has prepared himself for a good time. He has come to talk of future limited punishment, and can hardly keep the word Purgatory for its proper place. He seems as if he had all day to spend. He proposes his query, and it is all idle so long as he clings to eternal punishment as a Scripture doctrine. That swallows up all the other questions, and while he advocates it, what to him is the doctrine of limited punishment in the future state, in contrast with the limiting of all punishment to this life? There is a greater work to be attended to, and till it is done, there is no time for minor debates. That work is in reference to the eternity of punishment, and if he be willing to discuss that, then all is well. There is an infinite difference between eternal and limited punishment. The whole of the Divine economy is colored by both, yet vastly differently. The purposes of God are governed by principles infinitely less lovely and adorable under the one, than under the other, directing us to a consummation without harmony or glory. All Universalists can unite in sympathy with the spirit of Restorationism, but not a single soul can with the spirit of unlimited suffering. With Universalists the difference of opinion in respect to the period of punishment for guilt, when that opinion transcends the common ideas of punishment being certain, yet limited, is more a question of philosophy, than of Scripture. But between us and the believer in eternal wo, the matter is entirely a scriptural one. Here, friend, say we—here is the Bible. You believe in the endless misery of the sinner, and we in the final salvation of all ; therefore the question between you and us, is, Does that book give us any or no hope that all will be saved? 'To the law, and to the testimony,' is our appeal. It shall decide between thee and us. While this question is pending, it is idle to come down to the other. Let us open the Book and reason together.

How many there are who find they have other business to attend to, when the matter turns thus! And how often is it necessary that we do thus turn it, that the opponent may be made to understand the tremendous and awful difference between limited and endless punishment. The believers in the latter should be thrown back upon what they profess to believe, as were the Sadducees ; and by this course it may be that they will see in their faith one feature they are not apt to recognize, which distinguishes it in horror from each and every form of Restorationism. The question of limited or no future punishment, is between those who believe the respective doctrines, and should be so confined.

But the Apostle speaks of 'strife about words to no profit,' subverting the minds* of the hearers from important and essential matters. Words are the communicators of ideas, thoughts and feelings. They form an invisible bridge on which minds meet and converse, but the conversation must decide whether they will embrace or not. Often they meet and do not recognize each others features, so dark or misty is the atmosphere ; and under these circumstances there are frequent battles, strange encounters, and ridiculous mistakes. All this should make us cautious, so that we remember the necessary preparations for the meeting or encounter, to embrace or battle in the right spirit.

Many words are used especially in religious controversy, and in common religious discourse, to which no definite ideas are attached ; many more which are vague and contradictory ; and many more which are mere technicalities in theology. And this variety produces strife—often honorable and useful strife, against which Paul would say nothing. He exhorted the same pupil Timothy to 'give attention to reading ;' and what is this but the strife of thought with words, called as he was to deal with Scripture and all that would educate his intellectual powers as a preacher? To read, is to have to do with words ; to give attendance to reading, is to do more than look on words, or to pronounce them. It is to seek to understand them, to take hold of the ideas they convey, to associate and compare them, and to test them by just standards. As he who must pass the review of a long line of guards ere he can enter a tent to greet a personage, so is the studious reader. He must challenge and be challenged, and be ready to do his duty when the whole is passed, being careful that he mistake not a foe for a friend. How peculiarly necessary is this rule in the reading of the Scriptures ! So much of the reading that now craves attention through newspapers and periodicals, requires but very little mental labor, that the habit of thoughtless reading is too firmly fixed on many, and they soon weary of what requires them to think. And hence the little improvement which they make in real knowledge, and hence the slight impressions made by what they read. Memory is as much an art, as gift—it is the art of thoughtful attention, which alone secures the pearls of knowledge, bestowing the ability to test the worth of all that claims to be the gold of truth. If this art is not cultivated, not only will the precious things of truth be lost, but the neglectors will be apt to express their own thoughts very incorrectly, and be frequently at a loss for any words to give utterance to their feelings.

The sacred writers speak of a great variety of words, and this variety, as we consider it, should impress us with the necessity of giving proper attention to this matter. Our Savior's preaching is styled—'gracious words,' i. e. words of grace, or words spoken in a gracious manner; which immediately introduce the understanding reader to a beautiful fact in our Lord's history. And this remark brings the subject of our reflections to a right turn, which is—That facts, not mere words, are to be our study. We read of 'sound words,' 'wholesome words,' 'vain words,' 'words that eat like canker.' These different phrases are used as facts warrant; and if we will look upon the subjects to which these phrases relate, we shall see the direct evidence of this. To one only can we now allude, the peculiar expression in our theme—'words to no profit.' The strife about such words, must be a strife where important facts are disregarded—facts which govern the meaning and limit the extent of the words. In respect to scriptural truth, there are certain facts which no criticisms on words can possibly affect. It is, for instance, a fact that the earth revolves around the sun; and whatever records of Scripture are worded against this, must be interpreted accordingly. And if the sceptic thinks that this is an argument against the Bible, we tell him he has a strife about words to no profit, as the Almanac for the enlightened year of 1842 uses or contains the same phraseology. In both, the language is used in a popular sense, conforming rather to what appears to be, than what really is; and so we commonly talk of the sun's rising and setting. The fact, however, must govern our words, or we must give them up. So with all doctrinal parts of Scripture. That God is Love, and that God is Unchangeable, are facts, which no criticisms can alter or affect. The words Salvation, Heaven, Hell, Sin, Punishment, Eternal, Everlasting, Forever, must all be governed by these facts. They must be made to convey no idea that will not harmonize with the Divine Perfection—the central fact. And here is the stand for the unlearned in the mysteries of words—they must fix in their mind the great facts concerning the Supreme, and refuse any interpretation of a word or passage which contradicts them. Let them take this illustration;—Suppose a venerable father had left your home for a distant land. From a thousand tokens of love you have drawn evidence of his affection for you. In the past you made trial of his faithfulness by a varying course, and found that even in sinfulness he loved you—commissioned one dear to him to go to you and speak of his affection, of your duty, of the evils of your course, and to give you the highest proof of his mercy and grace; and suppose this messenger, full of your father's spirit, had suffered death in striving to perform his mission, and died blessing the worst of the vile in true compassion. Suppose that to you were given a communication from that father, containing a record of what the messenger said while pursuing his way, and of his self-sacrificing death. You take that communication to read—to read it carefully. It is very long—some parts are difficult to be understood—it has been harmed by copyists, and some things seem to contradict others. There are some phrases and words which at first startle you, and you pause and think. As you think, the memories of your father's love steal over your heart, as a breeze laden with sweets. You dwell on his long tried affection, on his kindness during your ingratitude, on his benevolence when you were in want, on the goodness that beamed in his eye while he chastised you for disobedience, and as you recall these proofs of his compassion and fidelity, your heart is convinced that he is love itself, and that he will ever be so. You turn again to the communication and read; and as you read, can you be made to receive any interpretation of any part of the whole, that would shake your confidence in his love, especially if in the communication you read that your father is 'without variableness or even shadow of turning?' A person looks over your shoulder and reads for you and tells you that such a passage gives a beautiful testimony of your father's love to all the family; you readily believe it, for it accords with facts—facts that make a part of your own consciousness, and a most blessed part. The person turns over some leaves, and you notice that his face changes—he has a terribly gloomy expression, and his voice sounds awful as he tells you that your father threatens you with eternal misery—with the utmost wretchedness it is in his power to inflict, if you disobey him after a certain time; that then the day of grace or favor will be past, and if you are not then confirmed in obedience, all is lost—there is no more hope of his compassion and will be no more exercise of his love. Would you not deny the correctness of the reader's inference? Would you not declare it impossible that he can be right? And as earnestly as you cling to the belief in the unchangeability of your father, would you not also cling to the positiveness of the assertion that no interpretation should be put on any word or phrase that shall make the future contradict the past? You know you would. You know the fact of your father's love, inwoven in your very consciousness, would bid defiance to all learned or unlearned criticisms on words—to you it would be a strife about words to no profit, and it would not subvert your belief. Men might tell you that in the communication there is a variety of languages, and that they knew them and therefore must be right. But in vain—you would tell them that your father has but one language, however he may permit his scribes to use several tongues, and that one language is Love—Love which has no words, ay, not even a letter, whereby it can threaten evil without a prospect of good. Love worketh no ill to its neighbor, and you believe it can write none. You trust that if your father could speak direct and unequivocally, he would say so; ay, more than this, you believe he has said so, and that which is plain keeps you from putting the worst possible interpretation on what is mysterious and difficult to understand.

Such is my position in reference to the Bible, and I bless God for it! And you, my readers, will bless God, if such be yours. May it be—it should be.

And such should be our position in reference to the providences of God. The events of his providence are as words of a divine communication, and hence we often say, God speaks to us, through such and such an event. Some of these words we can interpret, and the employment is the exercise of a divine philosophy. Others are equivocal—appear contradictory—and sometimes we are terribly startled. There are seasons when we feel as if all the foundations of stability were shaken, and every prop were broken, and it may be that we cry, 'My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?' But our sensitive nature recovers by degrees and the intellect again exercises its powers. We return to facts—to that which is plain, and interpret all else by the spirit thereof. It was thus with David at a certain time, when his heart was overwhelmed; he says his 'spirit made diligent search. Will the Lord cast off forever? and will he be favorable no more? Is his mercy clean gone forever? doth his promise fail forevermore? And I said, This is my infirmity!' And well might he call it an infirmity; for it is only through the wanderings caused by some disease, that we are led to question the everlasting continuance of Jehovah's mercy. Alas! for those to whom this infirmity clings! Let us apply to the Great Physician as oft as this trouble assails us, that if like him our burdened heart cries out, 'My God, why hast thou forsaken me!' we may also, like him, speedily recover and say, 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit!'

O let us so keep in remembrance the things of everlasting truth, as that no device of man's, and no mystery of the word or of providence, shall subvert our faith, or prevent it from resting in the full assurance of hope. Then will ours be kindred thoughts and feelings to the poet's, when at sunset hour he sung:

'God of the sunlight hours! how sad
Would evening shadows be,
Or night in deeper shadows clad,
If aught were dark to Thee!

How mournfully that golden gleam
Would touch the thoughtful heart,
If, with its soft retiring beam,
We saw thy light depart!

But no; the sunset hours may hide
These gentle rays awhile,
And deep through ocean's wave may glide
The slumber of their smile.

Enough, while these dull heavens may lower,
If here thy presence be!
Then midnight shall be morning hour,
And darkness light to me.

Through the deep gloom of mortal things,
Thy light of love can throw
That ray which gilds an angel's wing,
To soothe a pilgrim's woe.

PRAYER OF THE PENITENT.

BY MISS M. A. DODD.

LORD, before thee lowly kneeling,
Penitent my vows I pay;
Long on broken idols leaning,
I have found no rest or stay:
I have wandered,
Wandered from thy fold away.

Like the dove with pinions weary,
O'er the troubled waves I flee,
Round me roll the waters dreary;
May thy love my refuge be.
I am weary,
Let me find repose in thee.

I have all too fondly treasured,
Sinful hopes and wishes vain,
Let thy grace and love unmeasured,
Cleanse my soul from every stain:
O receive me!
Take me in thine arms again!

If by thee, O God, forsaken,
All my hope is lost indeed,
Let my tears compassion waken,
Hear me while for help I plead:
O be near me!
Save me in mine hour of need!

O'er the grave of buried blessings,
Standing like a blighted tree,
Those who shared my fond caressings,
Near me now no more I see.
I am wretched;
Father, thus I come to thee.

Lord, for mercy I implore thee!
Thou canst dry my bitter tears:
Trembling I appear before thee,
Bowed with penitence and years:
Look upon me!
Take away my doubts and fears.

Life-long sins are all appearing,
Round me surging like a sea;
But thy word my spirit cheering,
Offers peace and pardon free.
I have suffered,
Send 'the Comforter' to me.

'SONGS IN THE NIGHT.'

A FRAGMENT.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

THE veil of night had shrouded the earth in its gloomy shadows. The carols of the forest minstrels were hushed in silence, the buzzing insects had folded their tiny wings, and the chimings of the silvery streamlet fell on the ear more softly than they were wont, as if the hallowing influence of the hour were shed alike on animate and inanimate nature. The wing of peace seemed brooding over the sleeping world. But alas! no peace had cheered the mourner's heart, since death had curtained up forever his soul's beloved idol. Beautiful as an angel of paradise, was the vision that entranced his spirit; tender and meek as the murmuring ringdove was that heart which he had wooed to dwell with him in the bowers of love; but the spoiler came, and the rose-tint of health faded from the beautiful cheek. Death passed his icy fingers over the heart-strings, and the love glances faded from the speaking eye. And now beneath the starry canopy of night he mourned the utter desolation of his fate. The loveliest of earth was garnered in the tomb, over whose dreary mansions brooded the fearful gloom of eternal silence. But a lyre-note thrilled upon the dreamy air—again, again its silvery cadences swell on the ear, and all its breathings are harmony and peace. How soothing are its accents to the darkened spirit for whom the future sheds no ray of light. A radiant seraph is singing of bowers that never fade, of fountains that flash forever in the sunlight of truth and love, and the floating echos take the tone of the lost one's voice.

And as the glorious anthem swells on and on, the universal harmonies of nature join the chorus; and the mourner's heart breaks the thrall of unbelief, and rejoices in the sublime record of Immortality. The grave is no longer gloomy, for the splendors of the resurrection hath dawned upon its borders, and glories inexpressible are beaming in the unclouded realms of eternity.

IMMORTALITY.

A PRESUMPTIVE ARGUMENT.

BY T. J. TENNEY.

THAT we can prove immortality a truth, separate from the use of the Bible, may admit of a doubt. May there not be some evidence of its truth, however, in the fact that we are perpetually 'hurrying over the ports of life, to arrive at certain little settlements, or imaginary points of rest, which are dispersed up and down upon it?'

And when we get at those points of rest as we have imagined them, 'do we stop our motion, and sit down satisfied in the settlement we have gained? or are we not removing the boundary, and marking out new points of rest, to which we press forward with the like eagerness, and which cease to be such as fast as we attain them? Our case is like that of a traveler upon the Alps, who would fancy that the top of the next hill must end his journey, because it terminates his prospect; but he no sooner arrives at it, than he sees new ground and other hills beyond it; and continues to travel on as before.

'This is so plainly every man's condition in life, that there is no one who has observed anything, but may observe, that as fast as time wears away, his appetite to something further remains. The use, therefore, I would make of it is this, that since nature, as some love to express it, does nothing in vain, or, to speak properly, since the Author of our being has planted no wandering passion in it, no desire which has not its object, futurity is the proper object of the passion so constantly exercised about it; and this restlessness in the present, this assigning ourselves over to further stages of duration, this successive grasping at somewhat still to come, appears to me, whatever it may to others, as a kind of instinct, or natural symptom, which the mind of man has of its own immortality.' We are indebted for this argument to the Spectator, and though it is not the positive evidence of the Scripture, it corroborates the doctrine as it came from the Son of God. Be it weakness or anything else you please, I must confess myself attached to the desire of living in the future, and of doing something in the present that will impress my name upon the past, so that I shall be remembered as one who lived for the good of others. To die to be forgotten—to be swallowed up in the unconsciousness of a sleep that knows no waking, is so abhorrent to my mind that I turn even from the thought of it, and tenaciously cling to the hope which is as an anchor to the soul both sure and steadfast, as the only thing that can stay me from sinking in despair.'

But second. Is there not further evidence of the truth of immortality in the nature of mind? I think it is very properly asked by Addison, 'How can it enter into the thoughts of man, that the soul, which is capable of such immense perfections, and of receiving new improvements to all eternity, shall fall away into nothing almost as soon as it is created? Are such abilities made for no purpose? A brute arrives at a point of perfection that he can never pass; in a few years he has all the endowments he is capable of; and were he to live ten thousand more, would be the same thing he is at present. Were a human soul thus at a stand in her accomplishments, were her faculties to be full blown, and incapable of further enlargements, I could imagine it might fall away insensibly, and drop at once into a state of annihilation.

But can we believe a thinking being, that is in a perpetual progress of improvement, and travelling on from perfection to perfection, after having just looked abroad into the works of its Creator, and made a few discoveries of his infinite goodness, wisdom and power, must perish at her first setting out, and in the very beginning of her inquiries? I know not what others may think, but to me there is plainness in the supposition that the mind of man is yet in its infancy when the body itself has made its pilgrimage of three score years and ten; and need I press the question, Is it probable that God will put a period to its further developement in the dark silence of the grave? While it is a settled point in philosophy that our bodies receive the support of, and go to support, other bodies—that they may in this way, have undergone entire changes, as far as their composition or matter is involved, the mind is invariably the same as is proved from its retaining the same impressions to the very close of life. It does not, then, live on animal and vegetable food; nor like the body, go to the support of the animal and vegetable kingdoms; and this reminds me,

Third. That an additional proof of our position may be gathered from the term, spirit. There are those who contend against the immortality of the soul or spirit as an inconsistent doctrine with the language of the Bible. They assure us it is never said that 'the soul or spirit is immortal'—that we read not of a 'never dying soul,' and though we admit it, we by no means believe that it does away the truth of the doctrine. Spirit of itself is immortal, and needs the qualifying word no more than endless needs to be qualified with an additional endless. God is a spirit, and it would hardly be expected that we should add the term immortal in order to show that he can never die. The immortality of the spirit of man proclaims it of a higher origin, and that it is destined to a nobler end than the body. Dr. Alcott calls the soul, mind or spirit, (I wish to be understood that I use these terms as meaning one and the same thing,) the tenant of that house which God 'formed' (as we are told in Genesis) 'of the dust of the ground,' and though that dust must mingle with its native dust—though disease accumulates and dismembers its joints so that it crumbles to pieces, it is a mingling and a crumbling that set at liberty the tenant in the shape with which it enters that 'house not made with hands eternal in the heavens.' Like the aurelia or chrysalis, the spirit expands its wings and joins the God who gave it, while its temporary covering drops into the inactive state of common earth. And however it may cross our pride, a few months or years at most, will make such a change in our bodies that the most ingenious connoisseur of beauty cannot distinguish her who might have been a pattern for the heroine of a Scott from the common dust of one who lived unloved and died forgotten.

'How full, how bright are the evidences' of the grand truth I have labored to establish. 'How weak are the common arguments, which scepticism arrays against it. To me,' says Dr. Channing, 'there is but one objection against immortality, if objection it may be called, and this arises from the very greatness of the truth.—My mind sometimes sinks under its weight, is lost in its immensity; I scarcely dare believe that such a good is placed within my reach.—When I think of myself, as existing through all future ages, * * * as exempted from every imperfection and error of my present being, as clothed with an angel's glory, as comprehending with my intellect and embracing in my affections an extent of creation compared with which the earth is a point; when I think of myself, as looking on the outward universe with an organ of vision that will reveal to me a beauty and harmony and order not now imagined, and as having an access to the minds of the wise and good, which will make them in a sense my own; when I think of myself as forming friendships with innumerable beings of rich and various intellect and of the noblest virtue, as introduced to the society of heaven, as meeting there the great and excellent of whom I have read in history, as joined with the just made perfect in an ever enlarging ministry of benevolence, as conversing with Jesus Christ with the familiarity of friendship, and especially as having an intermediate intercourse with God, such as the closest intimacies of earth dimly shadow forth; when this thought of my future being comes to me, whilst I hope, I also fear; the blessedness seems too great; the consciousness of present weakness and unworthiness is almost too strong for hope. But when, in this frame of mind, I look round on creation, and see there the marks of Omnipotent goodness, to which nothing is impossible, and from which everything may be hoped; when I see around me the proofs of an infinite Father, who must desire the perpetual progress of his intellectual offspring; when I look next at the human mind, and see what powers a few years have unfolded, and discover in it the capacity of everlasting improvement; and especially when I look at Jesus, the conqueror of death, the heir of immortality, who has gone as the forerunner of mankind into the mansions of light and purity, I can and do admit the almost overpowering thought of the everlasting life, growth and felicity of the human soul.'

Brethren, how greatly are we indebted to God for his blessings. He has invariably been kind to us in giving such things as are essential to support the growth of this body—to give it form, strength and agility to do with ease the labors of the day. And he has not been less so in giving us blessings for the mind. The world itself is full of instruction. 'He who will—

'Finds tongues in trees, books in the running brooks,
Sermons in stones, and good in every thing.'

Even where we are laboring to secure the vegetable productions of the season, we need not let the time pass without gathering an additional grain of knowledge. We live in no pent up Utica—our vision is not limited by the works of art—our rivers are not the puny lines impressed upon a piece of paper—our mountains are not the smooth things the school-boy looks at, so that he may tell his master in what latitude they are, and make his grandma smile at the precocity of his intellect—our forests and hills and valleys and plains and silver streams are the real things of life. Do we pass our time without improvement where there are so many teachers, and so much to be learned; and is it a fact that the language, 'There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory,' is to be applied to the resurrection state, we shall miss of what would have administered to an increase of our glory in that world where the pains, sicknesses and sorrows of life shall be done away.

We will conclude this article in the words of Paul, 'Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord.'

THE RETURN TO VERMONT.

BY MRS. J. R. SPOONER.

HAIL! once more, ye verdant hills,
Ye smiling glades, and murmuring rills,
That gently wind below.

For I have learned to love thee well,
From mountain steep to shady dell,
In hours of joy or woe.

Thou hast a voice of welcome now,
In the cool breeze that fans my brow—
Fain would I think it so.

May we not read in fancy's page,
Some thoughts to cheer our pilgrimage,
As wearily we go?

Though not thy child, may I not own
A love for thee so strongly grown,
That thou dost call me thine?

When grief disperses all my joys,
And sadness all my thoughts employs,
And deep distress is mine,—

Thou dost exert a magic power,
To calm and soothe a stormy hour,
But how I cannot tell.

A holy influence seems to lie,
In the green earth and cloudless sky,
And in the flow'et's cell.

All nature speaks! her words are peace,
She seems to bid our sorrows cease,
And tells us to rejoice

That though the loved are laying low,
They are called hence from pain and woe,
By God's own voice.

EXCLUSIVENESS.

BY HENRY BACON.

THE editors of three religious periodicals—organs of the Orthodox, Baptist and Methodist denominations—have spoken out boldly against Universalists being allowed the name of christians; and could they effect their purpose, our ministry would be deprived of all legal rights. We are glad to meet with such a clear utterance of this exclusive opinion, for the spirit generated by the partialist doctrines is thereby made plainly manifest, and intelligent minds cannot but be awakened to discuss the matter at issue. Look then at the arrogant position assumed. 'We have all the truth,' say they, 'and you have nothing but essential error. We care nothing for your sincerity, for your professed reverence for the Scriptures and Christ, for your efforts to awaken love towards Jesus as the Savior of souls; but we deny you all right of claim to the name of christians, because you discard the doctrines we receive as essential.' A pretty specimen of dogmatism, surely! and how miserably lean and haggard does it look in the presence of Jesus as he rebukes his disciples for exercising an exclusive spirit! 'Master!' say they, 'we saw a man casting out devils in thy name, and we forbade him, because he followeth not with us. And Jesus said, Forbid him not!' These disciples possessed then the same spirit now possessed by the exclusionists we have noticed. 'He followeth not with us,' is a sufficient reason for the severest judgments and harshest denunciations—for denying the name of disciple to even the most devoted, and marking them as heretics. A summary decision surely; and a very easy method indeed is this to set aside the duty of investigating the why and wherefore.

It would seem that the forbidding disciples had never queried the character of their conduct; or else that they would rather the poor demoniacs should continue in their wretchedness—writhing under the complicated evils of a distempered brain, than that they should be healed by any one who would not follow with them! Is the latter the case with any of our antagonists at the present day? Are there not some who cannot bear the idea of any one being healed through the instrumentality of Universalists, and who would rather that the sinner should sin on than be turned from his sinfulness by such agency? Serious facts impel us to give affirmative answers; and no one who has given attention at all to the warfare against Universalists during a year past, can have failed to notice the actual exultation with which stories have been related of professed Universalists acknowledging that our faith had no power to exorcise evil from their hearts, and they were only acting the hypocrite while they appeared to be morally benefited by Universalism. There may be christianity in this, but we are not of those who believe there is, and very frankly we opine that it has no fellowship with the spirit of Jesus Christ—it is the christianity of an exclusive church, not the christianity of the Gospels.

Bigotry is one of the most ingenious spirits known. When works of purity are so manifest that they cannot be denied—when the fruits of Universalism are presented in positive vividness, bigotry does not falter for a mode of condemnation. It did indeed deny that any good could proceed from the power of the despised doctrine, and when good is brought forth in undisputable prominence, it would seem that the denunciator would pause and perhaps retract the severe judgment; but no—to retract is no part of a dogmatist's creed, and so they are forced to press on. A good illustration is given, in a certain volume of memoirs, where we are told that a Calvinistic lady, whose brother had turned Unitarian, was reminded that notwithstanding his opinions, he was a good man.

‘That very circumstance,’ said the sister, ‘proves that he is a doomed man.’

‘How so?’

‘Why, the devil is so sure of him for his want of faith, that he does not take the trouble to corrupt his morals!’

The coolness with which a human being and a relative is handed over to the supposed king of evil, because of a difference in faith, is perfectly characteristic of a large class who deny us the christian name. From their folly, let us learn wisdom; and while in thus doing they are true to the spirit of their creed, let us be true to the spirit of ours—remembering the words of the prophet Isaiah;—‘The liberal deviseth liberal things; and by liberal things shall he stand.’ The advancement of every liberal project in all departments of mental and moral activity, strengthens the foundation on which we stand, and gives greater prominence to the genius of that faith which shall in due time liberalize the world.

WOMAN. Society, which requires of man, each according to what he has received, the various gifts nature distributes, seems to require of woman similar duties. It is hers to be the comfort and ornament of home, to render herself beloved and useful, scattering here and there the flowers of life under the feet of those around her; to cheer, to bless, and to console; to brighten the hours of joy, and alleviate those of pain. She can establish an empire of affection and confidence, of which she may be the centre; and enthroned in the hearts of those to whom her virtues endear her, she can dispense inestimable gifts, which increase the happiness and diminish the pains of life.

MORNING THOUGHTS.

BY MRS. S. R. MORRIS.

THIS is a glorious morning. It beams anew with light and loveliness. Its brilliancy and beauty elevate the thoughts, its freshness and calm soothe and subdue the feelings. Would that nobler powers were mine that I might paint its transcendent beauties. Would that it might live in holier thoughts, and thus inspire to purer sentiments, for it is worthy. Yea angel harps might sing its glories, nor yet profane their consecrated strings with an unholy theme. Is there a pen, save wielded by the divine hand, that with its utmost skill can fix the shade even of a single blade of grass, as it blends beneath the weight of the pearly dew-drop that glitters in the early sunbeam, fragrant with instinctive gratitude. No earthly power can do it justice. No human thought can compass its loveliness, nor transcribe its glowing, breathing beauty. It is a task which nobler minds than mine might justly shrink from; yet in my inmost heart is indelibly stamped the pleasing lesson, and from that unread book I venture to draw an imperfect copy.

Every herb which springs up in our pathway, every flower that sends forth its fragrance, every tree that shades or ornaments, wave in grace or majesty, as if the breeze which moves them were filled with tones of fairy music. Nature in all her charms is exhaling health and beauty, and the whole earth rejoices in her freshness. That emblem of purity—the lovely bridal rose, has opened her blossoms to the morning sun, and joyous and fearlessly casts her sweet tribute to the passing winds. She sends forth her dewy fragrance with all the confidence of youthful love, with all the ardor of a guileless heart, fraught with nothing but happiness. Though the young flower may early wither, though blight and mildew may destroy its loveliness, and though the young heart may faint and die, yet will they never cease to rejoice in that they made so pure a sacrifice.

All nature is arrayed in living beauty; the fields are white with flowers, the daisies raise their thousand snowy heads, and as they wave in the light and cheering breeze, they seem to whisper to each other, ‘God is love.’ The birds are chanting melodious strains, mingling their glad voices in the joyous carol, as if earth were indeed a paradise, and their whole life an uninterrupted tale of pure affection. Before me is a field of ripening grain, bending beneath its weight, as if in adoration it were bowing before the throne in humble worship to Him whose bow of promise gives the blest and perpetual assurance that seed time and harvest shall ever return while the earth remains.

Over all this thrilling scene the sun has thrown his gorgeous mantle, and sheds his golden beams with the same brilliant lustre that shone on infant Eden, at that blissful era when 'the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy.' Every hill and vale, every plant and flower, and even the little shrubs rejoice as they tell their glad story to this lovely morning. The hum of the insects and the sparkling waters as they leap up in all their power, speak in eloquent, though silent language, of sacred joy and gratitude for their existence. So let my harp be tuned to melody. Harp of the immortal mind, strike in loud anthems to thy Maker's praise! God of this lovely morning! I kneel in holy reverence at thy Almighty shrine; I bow with sacred trust to thy divine requirements, I rejoice with joy unspeakable at thy unerring will, I contemplate with gladness thy inimitable perfections, I worship thee with fullness of heart as Lord of all!

WESTBROOK.

(INSCRIBED TO MY FRIENDS L. J. B. C. AND J. L. B. S.)

'Tis a quiet spot—there the tall green trees
Murmur and sigh in the summer breeze;
There the low sweet flowers, and the velvet moss,
And the scarlet berries the earth emboss;
And vines spring up by the hidden streams,
And hang their boughs where the sunshine gleams,
And thousands of beautiful things and rare,
Scatter their 'wilderer perfume there.

'Tis a quiet spot. Not a voice is heard
Save the low soft hymn of the grateful bird,
Or the insect's hum by the nodding flower,
Or the musical fall of the noontide shower.
The green leaves thrill with a silent bliss,
As the zephyr stoops with its gentle kiss,
And all the air of the wood is rife
With beautiful colors and balmy life.

'Tis a quiet spot. Thro' the trees at night
The moon pours softly her golden light;
Long gleaming paths thro' the wood lie spread,
Trodden, may be, by the sainted dead;
And the stars, like glittering wreaths of gold,
The crested heads of the pines enfold;
Or soft thro' the boughs of the greenwood shine,
Like a fruitage of gems from an Indian mine.

'Tis a quiet spot. And the mind and heart
There weave those links that can never part;
There the gifted in intellect dwell in love,
Guided by rays from the Light above;
And books, and blossoms, and converse sweet,
Diffuse their spells thro' this loved retreat,
Till nothing seems wanting of bright or fair,
To make all life a Paradise there!

NOT ASHAMED OF THE GOSPEL.

BY REV. J. B. DODS,

ROMANS i. 15, 16: 'So, then as much as in me is, I am ready to preach the gospel to you that are at Rome also. For I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ.'

JESUS CHRIST, the great teacher from heaven and the distinguished reformer of our race, was of obscure parentage. From his birth to the age of thirty years, he moved in the private circles of life and manifested no peculiar trait of character to distinguish him among the nations of the day whom he was destined to rouse from the grovelling thoughts of earth to the sublime contemplation of the doctrines of life and immortality. He mingled with the busy throng unnoticed. He read, as was his custom, every Sabbath day in the synagogue, and perhaps without producing any extraordinary emotions. He lived in the domestic circle, and engaged with them in the toils, labors and fatigues of the day, without performing any deeds of greatness to call him forth from his sequestered retreat into the busy scenes of public life.

His energies of mental vigor were peculiar to himself, and unrivalled by all that the world had ever beheld. He possessed the clearest head, and the most pure and perfect heart that were ever combined in any man under the vast canopy of heaven. We have no evidence that he ever attended the schools of the prophets, or any seminaries of learning. His knowledge was intuitive. By one single glance of mental perception, he surveyed all the philosophical schemes, dogmas, doctrines and traditions that were swarming throughout the Roman empire. His keen and searching eye penetrated their mysteries—he unwound them of their intricacies—and scrutinized human nature. Devoid of all national peculiarities, he stood alone in the world musing for himself on the weakness and fallibility of all doctrines in existence—on their unsatisfying nature, and on the excellencies of that gospel which should point the dying man beyond the confines of the tomb, and pour, on a hitherto beamless eternity, the light of life and immortality.

All the plans and improvements of a religious character, from the famed Egyptians down to his day, lay unraveled before him. The greatest philosophers and poets both Grecian and Roman, who had spent their lives in studying some system of faith and conduct for men to embrace and pursue, and mused and sung its joys, had gone down at last to their graves with the pangs of disappointed hope of ever finding any permanent system of happiness beneath the sun.

This immense field of human speculation Jesus Christ surveyed with precision and care as it lay in deplorable perspective before him. He saw the nations tenaciously adhering to, and pursuing these bubbles of an hour. From the unsatisfying and almost sickening thought, he turned with pity, and gazed on those oceans of glory and delight sublimely rolling in that gospel he was about to reveal to the world. There he saw man's countless wants supplied, his dearest interest secured, and his fondest hopes realized.

For thirty years he hid himself in obscurity. The philosophers were prosecuting their schemes of religious speculation, and the Jews anxiously expecting their promised Messiah, unconscious that he was already at the door. Little did they think that the Reformer of the world was walking among them, and that their cobweb systems of philosophy had already passed the ordeal of his scrutinizing mind and received his merited disapprobation.

Having gathered in private all his strength, and wound himself up in all the splendor of his powers, he suddenly emerged from his obscure retreat, and burst forth in all his glory on the world! Every eye was turned upon him! He stood in collected majesty the Son of God! Every heart throbbed amazement! But his low birth, poverty, and humiliation, were soon regarded with contempt by the learned and the great. But he stepped forth boldly among them. He penetrated the mysteries of the Jewish faith—ransacked the archives of their boasted theology—he laid his hand on heathen traditions—unwound the web of Gentile philosophy—ranged the universe—gathered in his grasp the beams of all ages—condensed them to a sun, and made the whole bear upon the doctrine of life and immortality. This and this alone was the grand theme of the doctrine of the gospel. It embraced no favorites as the subjects of its beatitude. It was impartially revealed to the high and the low, rich and poor, wise and ignorant, Jew and Gentile. The great joy resulting from its glad tidings was to be unto all people. It confined not its blessings to the shores of time. The eye of its divine author penetrated the shades of the tomb! With a bold, firm, and untrembling hand, he drew aside the dark curtains of the tomb that had hitherto concealed eternity from time, and bid the pure unsullied light of heaven, and of heaven's eternal love, shine on the confines of earth, and bid a grovelling world turn their eye upon the unfading prospect.

He ranged in mental vision its pathless scenes. He comprehended the character and perfections of God! He openly manifested them to men in his example of divine philanthropy, and in the cheering doctrines he taught, so that in seeing him we see his Father also. Nor did he stop here. He turned his attention to death the king of terrors. With scrutinizing research he entered his dark, ghastly dominions! With pensive thought he surveyed his universal ruins over the human family—contemplated the monster's boasted powers, and finally sang the requiem of everlasting triumph over him.

Death vanquished, and life and immortality brought to light through a resurrection from the dead, for every son and daughter of Adam, is the grand theme of the gospel of Christ.

This was the gospel of which Paul was not ashamed. This was the gospel of eternal life which Jesus Christ proclaimed to the world. It was this system of impartial benevolence, that the bigoted scribes and pharisees abhorred. It was the obscurity of Christ—his simplicity—impartiality—his humiliation and birth, that deterred the philosophers, and the great and the noble from giving heed to his doctrine. They were ashamed of the gospel of Christ on account of the low birth and humble condition of its author. They were ashamed of it on account of its simplicity; because the wayfaring man could understand it as well as the boasted theologian, and thus it would bring them all down on a level with the common people. It was so plain and rational a system, that it proved 'to the Greeks foolishness, and to the Jews a stumbling block.' It was so unpopular, that even those who believed Christ to be a teacher from heaven, would like Nicodemus pay him a visit beneath the shelter of night.

The Jewish priests and Greek philosophers delighted in mysteries—in the words of those reputed wise, and in their dark sayings. His gospel was accordingly rejected.

It is natural to man, not only to court the favor of the great, but pride himself in being noticed by them. This has, as it were, been the besetting sin of most men in all ages; and even down to the present day it is nothing uncommon to hear individuals state what conversation they had at some time with a President of the United States—some distinguished member of Congress, or some great warrior or statesman. Or to hear them tell over with much precision what visits have been made them by the rich and respected among their neighbors, what invitations they have received, and what visits they have made them in return. All this betrays a strong desire on the part of the narrator to impress upon the minds of others, the idea of his own consequence, and in what respect he is distinguished more than they.

This thirst for pre-eminence has been too successfully carried into religious systems. The pharisees wished themselves to be looked upon by the multitude, and considered as the peculiar favorites of the God of heaven, while publicans and sinners were the objects of his vengeance, for whom he had little or no regard. They could with the utmost self-righteous confidence stand and pray—God I thank thee that I am not as other men, or even as this publican. To humble them in this exalted notion, Jesus Christ spoke many parables. His gospel enjoined humility. It placed all human beings—all nations on a level, and recognized God as the Father, Benefactor, and Friend of all. That they were alike the subjects of his mercy and care, and would eventually obtain eternal life by a resurrection in Him who is the life of the world. This was too mortifying to their spiritual pride. They could not endure the idea that God should love others as well as themselves. Or that those sinners who had not borne the burden and heat of the day, or perhaps had wrought only one hour, should be made equal with them—should also receive a penny—or an equal heaven! They were ashamed of such a gospel! and with disgust and astonishment exclaimed . . . 'this man receiveth publicans and sinners and eateth and drinketh with them!'

The apostle Paul was once a noted pharisee brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, an eminent and distinguished doctor of the law. He inherited all the pharisaical notions of exclusive greatness among men, and of the exclusive homage to which his own sect was entitled. Bloated with pride, he strutted forth in the strength of his own importance—wrapt up in the robe of external religion and self-righteousness, and breathed out slaughter and vengeance against all those who presumed to teach that God was no respecter of persons. He despised a gospel that considered all mankind on a level, and that proclaimed God to be the lover of the creatures he had made.

Impressed with an honest conviction of the enormity and licentiousness of such a gospel, and sustained in his opinion by the nation to which he belonged, he declared a war of extermination against all who embraced it, and commenced the work of destruction and blood. Having aided in the butchery of Stephen, who fell asleep in the triumphant hope of a blessed immortality revealed through the gospel; and being clothed with authority from the chief priests and elders, he hastens to Damascus to bring all the wretches who should be guilty of calling on the name of the Lord, through Christ as Mediator, bound to Jerusalem.

But as he was journeying, at mid-day he saw a light above the brightness of the sun, and at its peerless majesty he and his companions fell to the earth. He heard a voice, and though soft as love, yet it touched a note that struck the vibrations of terror through the dark chambers of his soul, and roused into the most intense action, every mental energy. 'Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?' He arose from the earth, and lost to every thing else, and all the powers of his soul absorbed in the interest of the scene, he exclaims, 'Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?' His race of self-righteousness was run! He listened to the mandate of heaven. That gospel of which he and his nation were ashamed, he now found to be the theme of heaven, the joy of angels, claimed for its author, God, and embraced in its sublime consummation a universe of intelligent beings as the subjects of a blessed immortality.

Here a new era commenced in the life of Paul. He saw opened before him a new world of the most charming prospects—a world beyond the changing vicissitudes of earth. His eye gazed with ineffable satisfaction and delight on its enrapturing scenes! His whole soul was ecstasy! By an eye of faith he surveyed its fields of glory! On them rested a brightness that obscured the sun's noontide blaze! Rivers of life, clear as crystal, were sweeping through them their silvery flood! Bright forms of human beauty were walking the flowery banks unwearied with songs of everlasting praise! They sang their troubles o'er and death vanquished forever! Their brows were no more distorted with pain, nor their cheeks suffused with tears, nor did sighs of parting friendship rise from bleeding hearts! Their every countenance beamed immortality, satisfaction and joy! The parent's fondest wish was realized, and love and friendship reigned unbroken and perpetual! Paul gazed with emotions till then unfelt! His penetrating eye of faith gently rolled over the beauteous scene! Not a cloud of darkness rested upon it! All was calm as the peaceful lake in some sequestered wood, unruffled by the gentlest breeze, and serene as the loveliest summer's morn! With slow but collected firmness, Paul turns from the sublime prospect, and in face of Rome, the most powerful and proud city in the world, exclaims, 'I am ready to preach the gospel at Rome also, for I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ.'

His partiality and self-righteousness vanished forever! His soul was imbued in the spirit of heaven, and with meekness and humility breathed out—I am debtor to both the Greeks and Barbarians, to the wise and to the unwise, so as much a sin me is, I am ready to preach the gospel at Rome also.

The current of his life was now changed. From a powerful and unrelenting persecutor, he became one of the most meek and bold defenders of the cause of Christ. He counted all things but dross, compared with the excellency of that gospel of which he was once ashamed. He discarded all human greatness, and threw down all worldly honors and titles at the cross of Christ. He commenced a career which shed unfading glory on his name! He attacked the Jewish traditions, penetrated into the vast fields of the Mosaic dispensation—swept through the labyrinths of 2000 years—ransacked all the types and shadows—stript them of their mysteries—showed their fulfillment in Christ, and left them as a useless mass of rubbish lying in broken fragments before the peerless majesty and glory of the gospel! He grasped the vain philosophy of heathen nations;—exposed its fallacy, and with giant powers rent it to atoms in their presence! He passed like an irresistible torrent through both Jew and Gentile nations, and bore down all opposition before him! Arrayed in all the powers of truth, he met with firmness and decision every obstacle in his march. He threw aside every weight, and run with patience the race set before him—soaring in the affections of his heart to heavenly objects, he exerted every nerve in combatting the enemies who opposed his passage. Before him Roman and Grecian eloquence was paralyzed—the heathen gods tottered on their bases, and the scintillations of philosophy vanished like the vapor of the morning! At his approach the Jewish Sanhedrim recoiled with dismay—and doctors, scribes and pharisees were struck with consternation and alarm. They bound him with a chain, and placed him for trial at the footstool of Felix's judgment-seat. His reasoning powers shook that haughty monarch on his throne! His eloquence found unwilling conviction on the mind of king Agrippa, and made Festus in amazement cry out in a loud voice: 'Paul thou art beside thyself, much learning hath made thee mad!' Before him thrones shook, kings and governors trembled, and nations were convulsed by his effective energies.

In all this he determined to know nothing save Jesus Christ and him crucified. He was subjected to scoffs and sneers, cold, thirst and hunger, stripes and imprisonments. None of these things moved him. Finding all their efforts against him unavailing, they at length led him to the place of execution. He looked backward and reviewed his past life, and with satisfaction, and exclaimed, 'I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course—I have kept the faith!' Then looked forward into eternity, and with heavenly composure exclaimed—'Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of life!' He died as he lived, not ashamed of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

Here, then, readers, is an example for us to follow. Those with whom we are most sincerely and affectionately united in the social intercourse of life, believe in a limited salvation. Our dear neighbors, friends, yea and even relatives, who here live together in harmony and love, honestly believe that we shall be separated at some future tremendous day—that all the endearing affections we now reciprocally feel towards each other, shall be chilled in death, and their warm current forever cease to flow; and a part of those noble beings, you now see around you, with whom you have so often shaken the hand of friendship, together with millions of others dispersed over our earth, and equally unfortunate, shall lie down together in the most unspeakable torments that the imagination can portray—torments that shall endure unchanged when countless millions of ages are gone and forgotten! O what a wretched consideration is this to the feeling heart which throbs with affection to dear children, friends and all! If this be so, why not petition heaven for the small mercy to die and be no more?

Why burst the barriers of my peaceful grave?
Ah cruel death that would no longer save,
But grudged me e'en that narrow, dark abode,
And cast me out into the wrath of God,
Where shrieks, the rolling flame, the rattling chain,
And all the dreadful eloquence of pain,
Our only song: black fires malignant light
The sole refreshment of the blasted sight.
Must all those powers heaven gave me to supply
My soul with pleasure and bring in my joy,
Rise up in arms against me, join the foe?

Sense, reason, memory, increase my wo?
And must my tongue, ordained on hymns to dwell,
Corrupt to groans, and blow the fires of hell?
O! must I look with terror on my gain,
And with existence only measure pain?
What! no reprieve, no least indulgence given?
No beam of hope from any point of heaven?
Ah! mercy, mercy, art thou dead above?
Is love extinguished in the source of love?

O! would a just and merciful God have given us existence, if he knew such would be our inevitable and wretched doom?

'Father of mercies! why from silent earth,
Didst thou awake and curse me into birth?
Tear me from quiet, ravish me from night,
And make a thankless present of thy light?
Push into being a reverse of thee,
And animate a clod with misery?
The beasts are happy. They come forth and keep Short watch on earth, and then lie down to sleep.
Pain is for man, and O how vast the pain
For crimes which made the Savior bleed in vain!
Annulled his groans as far as in them lay,
And flung his agonies and death away.
As our dire punishment forever strong,
Our constitution too forever young,
Curst with returns of vigor still the same,
Powerful to bear and satisfy the flame.
Still to be caught, and still to be pursued,
To perish still and still to be renewed!
And this my help, my God, at thy decree
Nature is changed, and hell should succor me!
And canst thou, then, look down from perfect bliss,
And see me plunging in the dark abyss?
Calling the Father in a sea of fire,
Or pouring blasphemies at thy desire?
With mortal's anguish wilt thou raise thy name,
And by my pangs omnipotence proclaim?'

This is a wretched thought of deep despair. Yet wretched and awful as it is, thousands of our fellow creatures believe it, and go through life with their souls wrapt up in the very gloom of night, and constantly tortured with fearful apprehensions that perhaps some darling child, some affectionate friend, or kind neighbor, may be the subject of its awful doom.

Yes, heart-rending as it may seem, yet this is the prevailing and popular doctrine of the day. They honestly despise the soul cheering sentiment of universal reconciliation, and brand it with infamy, by saying as they did in the days of Christ, that it is a doctrine calculated for publicans and sinners! and I thank and adore my God that it is—'for I am not ashamed of the gospel of Jesus Christ,' neither would I blush to defend it against a universe in arms! I esteem it the highest honor that heaven can confer, to vindicate the lovely character and impartial goodness of my God.

It is the common practice of the present day to resort to such means as are most effectually calculated to keep the gospel of God that bringeth salvation to all men, unpopular. In this they have been but too successful. Sensible that no argument from scripture, reason, or from the works of nature, can stand the test of scrutiny, but instantly crumbles at the touch of reality, there is of course no other ground left to oppose the doctrine of universal philanthropy and benevolence than to heap upon it undeserved odium. Impressions are given to the public that the doctrine is dangerous to the souls of men—that it is of a licentious tendency—that none but wicked people believe it—and none but low characters attend to its preaching. Whisperings are often circulated that the traders by their attending such meetings, will lose their custom—that the physician will lose his practice, and the politician his popularity, and with it his seat in the State Legislature or in Congress. On this account many are deterred from attending meetings to hear their own sentiments, and like slaves are led in chains to a strange altar, and forced to sit down, and hear what they from their souls believe to be untrue. Though such men are born in this free country, yet their boasted liberty is but a name.

Is that man free who dare not speak the sentiments of his heart on that most sublime and exalted of all subjects, the universal emancipation of all rational beings from the slavery and bondage of sin to the liberty of sons of God in heaven? Is that man free who dare not go himself, nor lead his companion and children to what he solemnly believes to be the altar of truth? Is that man free who is led in strings in matters of religion, and by secret but modest threats is made to support a certain sentiment, lest he should incur the displeasure of some minister? No, he is not only a slave to the will of others, but he is a coward to fear a fragile threat.

Far be it from me to use means to bring any to a church that are not furnished me in Revelation. And if others, who believe our sentiment, out of shame or fear forsake our seats, still I am determined to stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made me free, for I am not ashamed of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

That the sentiment we believe is only embraced by the worthless, is an aspersion of the most ungenerous cast. The great body of Universalists throughout the United States is composed of persons who for rectitude of conduct would do honor to any religious society on earth, and whose talents would rival any in the council chamber, at the bar, or in the pulpit. There are some worthless persons among all orders, and our denomination will suffer in comparison with none.

As to its being unpopular it is not wholly true. There are towns and places, where it is in its infancy unpopular. This has been the case with all doctrines in existence. Each one in its turn has had to fight its own battle against the older doctrines of the day. But our sentiment is more popular than any other where it has been constantly preached for any number of years. It stands high in the city of Boston. It stands high in all our Legislatures—yes, and in the Congress of the United States. It is spreading with the most astonishing rapidity, and the day is not distant when its impartial banners shall wave triumphant on the walls of Zion. It is founded on reason—on revelation—on impartial goodness. It is written in nature! It is written in the beams of the sun! It is written in the stars on the ethereal vault of heaven! It is written in the descending rains and in the power and majesty of the storm! It is written in lightning on the cloud! It is written in the field and the grove! It is written in sympathy on the soul! It ranges the universe, collects all its evidences—condenses them all to a focus on Calvary, and there with a steady, untrembling hand writes its truth in the very eloquence of pain in letters of blood! It is written on the buckler of Jehovah!

What then is there in the gospel of eternal life of which you are ashamed? Is it possible that you are ashamed to respond to the universal voice of nature? Are you ashamed of the songs of angels—those sons of the morning, who shouted aloud for joy when creation was born from the dark womb of chaotic night, esteemed it an honor to proclaim the birth of Christ, and shouted in prospect of the redemption of a world: 'I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be unto all people. For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Savior which is Christ the Lord! And straightway there was seen with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host blessing and praising God, and saying, Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good will toward men!' And are you ashamed to be a companion with them? Are you ashamed of God Almighty? The majestic Being who made you claims to be the author of the gospel! The gospel inculcates the most sacred duties to parents, friends, and children, and awakens in the soul the most tender and endearing affections. And are you ashamed of all this? The gospel has brought life and immortality to light, and poured ten thousand streams of unmingled joy through the channels of the soul! And are you ashamed of this? The gospel has thrown its bright, unfading rays on the dark couch of death, and roused up, cheered and sustained the languid hope of the dying! And are you ashamed of this? It is the gospel that kindles up, in the bleeding bosom of surviving friends at the bed of death, the joyous contemplation of meeting again, even though they have shaken the mortal hand of everlasting separation in this world of wo. And are you ashamed of this? When death tears from our embrace the dear children, companions and friends we love, and leaves us solitary and pensive on earth, it is the gospel that breathes consolation as we lean upon their mouldering tombstone, and secretly whispers, 'Be of good cheer, you shall meet them in heaven.' And are you, my brother or sister, ashamed of this? On every hand we see weeds of mourning. We see the fatherless, the motherless, and the lonely orphan, pour forth their lamentations in all the agonies of wo. We see the sick and the dying racked with pain, and the world rendered a vale of tears. It is the gospel of Jesus Christ, that declares death shall be swallowed up in victory—tears shall be wiped from off all faces, and there shall be no more sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain. And are you ashamed of this? If so, then you ought to be ashamed to bear the name of an affectionate and compassionate man. You ought to be ashamed of all that heaven calls good. But if you are not ashamed of this, then you are not ashamed of the gospel of Jesus Christ. You are worthy to live, and when you die, your bones are worthy to repose with the great men of the universe.

What is there in the gospel of universal salvation of which we ought to be ashamed? It teaches the perfections and attributes of Jehovah. It considers him the Creator and Father of his creatures. It teaches that he will reward and punish them in mercy as a kind parent does his children—that he will reclaim them from error by washing them in the blood of the Lamb—that he will take away the sin of the world—reconcile all things in heaven and in earth to himself, and that finally every creature that is in heaven, and in earth, and under the earth, shall be heard saying, blessing and honor, and power and glory be unto him that sitteth on the throne and to the Lamb forever and ever. It teaches that God is unchangeable in all his attributes, and that his justice, truth and mercy are not at war, but all agree. It holds him up to men in a character of the most consummate loveliness, so that the greatest sinner would be filled with love, and burn with adoration the moment he saw him. Therefore 'we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is.'

What is there in all this of which to be ashamed? Nothing. We ought rather to be ashamed that we live up no better to the requirements of our doctrine. Paul says the grace of God that bringeth salvation to all men hath appeared, teaching, us that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world.

This is what our sentiment teaches—this is what benevolence teaches—this is what all the better affections of the heart teach. For if ye love me, says Jesus, ye will keep my commandments. Yes, this is the teaching of the gospel of Christ. Do this, my readers, and let others sneer, you have nothing then of which to be ashamed. I envy not the condition of him who bows to God for fear of hell, or who is forced and kept in the paths of virtue and religion by the fear of some infernal monster.

I then affectionately exhort you to be of one heart and mind in the great work of reform. Be entreated by the bowels of mercy to live soberly, righteously, and godly among men. Curse not the venerable name of that Benefactor whose goodness you advocate. Let it never be pronounced by your mortal lips but with the deepest veneration. When you recline your weary head on the pillow of repose, reflect upon your words, actions and dealings with your fellow men during the past day. What conscience approves, continue to practise. What she condemns, resolve to forsake. Think also upon the countless mercies of your heavenly Father—upon the friends and friendships, house and home he has provided you, and upon the companion and dear children he has made to smile around you. Think upon the silken affections by which he has bound your hearts; and finally think upon death when all those earthly ties must be dissolved, only to raise you to sublimer joys. Then, with a heart overflowing with gratitude and devotion, breathe forth the evening prayer of faith for all his mercies, and most devoutly thank him for that gospel hope which is full of immortality, and which gives you the pleasing assurance of meeting them all in the unfading joys of heaven.

THE NAME.

BY CHARLOTTE.

A NAME is ringing through my brain,
It brings alternate joy and pain;
Now sounds it like a funeral knell—
And now sweet tales of love doth tell.

When through the blossoming flowers I stray,
That name arrests me on my way;
It haunteth e'en my very sleep,
And then I wake to muse and weep.

Surely I heard that well known-sound,—
It made my sickened heart rebound;
Alas 'twas but my fancy gave
The name of him, whose home's the grave!

Surely I saw that rich black eye,
Fixed with an earnest scrutiny
Upon my face;—'twas but a dream,
Those orbs no more on me shall gleam.

Sure o'er my couch that proud form bent,
With life and beauty redolent;
That voice—it made my bosom swell,
It breathed the name I loved so well.

Be still, my heart! that voice no more
Shall breathe the tones I loved of yore.
I sunk his tokens in the wave;
I sent him to his early grave.

That name—that ne'er-forgotten name—
Again athwart my brain it came;
Ah once 'twas music to my ear,
But now I dread its sound to hear.

'Twas through my folly that he died,
And I am now another's bride;
'Tis this that dyes my cheek with shame—
For this I dread to hear that name.

BR. BACON: In the preface to the 'Rose of Sharon,' allusion is made to the following article, which had been prepared for insertion in that volume, but was unavoidably excluded. At the request of many friends, I now place it in your hands for publication in the 'Repository;' believing that most of your readers have already perused the story of poor Kate, and that those who have not, will ere long have it in their power to do so.

KATE SCRANTON AND HER ORIGINAL.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

THOUGH the narrative is fictitious, Mrs. Scott has embodied in the character of Kate Scranton more of her own peculiar feelings and modes of thought and of life, than in any other production of her pen. Like Kate, she was in early life a 'Dweller Apart'—a communicant with the green fields and the blue sky; a loiterer upon the lone mountain tops, and by the shady springs 'overhung with goosebrier and witch-hazel.' Those little islands in the river, where Kate often went in search of the anemones and blue-bells, were also the haunts of her girlish days; and beautiful islands they are, skirted with drooping willows, and slant old sycamores, and musical all day long with the lapse of the sunny waves that murmur beneath the drooping grass upon their brinks, or wind in and out among the little pools where the trout hide themselves away from the sights and sounds of human life.

That she was a devotee at woodland shrines, needs no proof aside from the multiplied evidences of her own pen. Who that had not been an actual dweller in sylvan solitudes, could describe, as she has described, their strong, mysterious, silent influences? Who that had not seen the sunshine flicker through wavy boughs upon beds of greenest moss, and listened with breathless emotion to the soft trickle of fountains underground, and looked into the blue depths of nodding bell-flowers, and heard the gush of the blackbird's song upon the boughs of the witch-hazel and 'tag-alder'—who that had not seen, and heard, and felt all these, could portray as she has portrayed, those wild, sweet scenes in nature, which make so much of the charm of country life?

Indeed, she drew her chief poetical inspiration from what she had seen and felt. The impress of home, of her native mountains and river and valley is upon almost every thing she has ever written. The Alleghanies and the Susquehanna have lent their freshest beauties to her pen; and as almost her whole life was passed in that quiet cradle of the hills, it is not strange that she should have woven into her graceful verse the hues and shapes and sounds on which her spirit had been nurtured from its earliest existence.

Poor Kate was wont to steal away to the wood, and with a green bough spread across the pages of 'Hervey's Meditations,' or one of the bewitching romances of Scott or Cooper, sit whole afternoons reading to the music of her knitting needles; and perhaps it was from olden habit like this, that our friend Julia used to sit at her own fireside, knitting work in hand, and follow with a pitying heart, the foot-sore wanderings of dear little Nell. Even the figures done in 'pokeberry and pig-weed,' which used so much to offend our heroine's taste, may have been the ghosts of her own juvenile performances; for well can we remember the day when papa's old cast-away Day-Book was embellished with pictures splendidly colored with vegetable juices,—the fruits of our own most dainty handicraft.

But beyond these resemblances, let no one trace out history in poor Kate's life. Mrs. Scott was fortunately an exempt from the social miseries that fell so darkly upon the lot of the 'Dweller Apart.' Her early home was one of neatness, kindness and comfort—her later one brightened by the most devoted and unwearying love, the gentlest and most affectionate sympathy. She was a Dweller Apart, not because the kindly feelings of her nature were unappreciated, but because to a spirit toned like hers this world has little answering music save in the murmur of wind and wave, little corresponding beauty except in the far bright stars, and in the small, dewy, fragrant flowers. Yet in later life she became, also, like Kate, a dweller in crowds—a ministering angel to the sick, the suffering, and such as were in need. She lived for the purpose of doing good; and stifled the wants of her soul in the active duties of christian benevolence.

The sources of her song were in her heart. Religion—nature—human love and human grief—these were her inspiration, these her themes. Early death—the decay of the beautiful—grass-covered graves—young hearts breathing out their last fervent farewells—pre-figurings of her own approaching fate—these and kindred subjects were woven into all her later melodies, were, indeed, the burthen of her song. Yet even through all this twilight melancholy, the triumph of her faith shone out; it kindled in her song the noblest aspirations and the loftiest hopes; it cast a flush of beauty upon the cheek of Death; it gave sunshine, and flowers, and singing birds to the cold bosom of the grave; and said unto the sleeping dust of the beautiful, 'Daughter, I say unto thee, ARISE!'

At last with a wild and thrilling gush, the lyre gave out and broke. That sweet, wild-toned, plaintive lyre, which ever sounded more like the rich throat-music of a woodland thrush, than like the artistical melody of an instrument of cunning device, broke in the midst of its loftiest strains—quivered a moment—and was forever stilled. Many waited and listened, hoping that some skilful hand might replace the broken strings; but the only Hand which could touch and not mar its delicate chords, had renewed the lyre for the music of his heavenly courts.

'She is no longer a Dweller Apart!' Her spirit has found companionship in the land of eternal beauty and repose, God forbid that we should repine. If earth grow more desolate with the loss of the loved, Heaven becomes to our hearts brighter and more beautiful, Death loses his terrors, and Life Immortal beams down into the dark places of our souls, to be dimmed or obscured no more forever.

LINES,

WRITTEN ON THE HOOSACK MOUNTAINS, IN OCTOBER.

BY D. B. HARRIS.

THE cold, bright frost lies silvering hill and vale,
Freely the wind sweeps up the mountain height;
The forest leaves are dancing in the gale,
And flashing back the golden morning light.

How rich the drap'ry of the forest trees!
No longer do they wear their garbs of green;
But, like a sea of rainbows, in the breeze
They wave their robes of gold and crimson sheen.

The mingled sounds of running waters come
Softened by distance to the ravished ear;
Up from yon valley deep there breaks a hum
Of human voices on the atmosphere.

Oaks crown the hills which in the distance rise;
Their tops are nodding in the sun's first blaze;
There too, repose the blue and bending skies,
As if to listen to our morning praise.

And who feels not his soul ascend in prayer?
Who does not feel this world is one of bliss,
When, free from anxious toil and earthly care,
He gazes out on such a scene as this?

DEATHS OF LITTLE CHILDREN.

[THERE is a continual closing of beautiful eyes and a perpetual stilling of sweetly musical lips. Human flowers are daily nipped in their budding, and tears fall like rain on withering beauty. And, therefore, it is never amiss to speak a christian word in reference to the deaths of little children; to some heart it will come home with a balmy power and wear away the sharpness of grief by introducing to the mind right thought and lifting the whole being to communion with imperishable things. The gift of Jesus as a little child has thrown around infancy an infinite preciousness, and attached a sacred importance to their being. This was owned by the Master when he took 'little ones' in his arms and blessed them. He looked upon them as human angels—as immortal beings; and till we look upon them with the eye of Jesus, we shall worship idols of the dust, and agony alone will break the spell of the idolatry.

I would here present to the reader a beautiful article which I extract from an English work little circulated amongst us; for the gentleness of its tone is grateful to the bereaved heart, and the tendency of the thoughts expressed is of the happiest nature.]

'A Grecian philosopher being asked why he wept for the death of his son, since the sorrow was in vain, replied, "I weep on that account." And his answer became his wisdom. It is only for sophists to contend, that we, whose eyes contain the fountains of tears, need never give way to them. It would be unwise not to do so on some occasions. Sorrow unlocks them in her balmy moods. The first bursts may be bitter and overwhelming; but the soil on which they pour, would be worse without them. They refresh the fever of the soul—the dry misery which parches the countenance into furrows, and renders us liable to our most terrible "flesh-quakes."

There are sorrows, it is true, so great, that to give them some of the ordinary vents is to run a hazard of being overthrown. These we must rather strengthen ourselves to resist, or bow quietly and drily down, in order to let them pass over us, as the traveler does the wind of the desert. But where we feel that tears would relieve us, it is false philosophy to deny ourselves at least that first refreshment; and it is always false consolation to tell people that because they cannot help a thing, they are not to mind it. The true way is, to let them grapple with the unavoidable sorrow, and try to win it into gentleness by a reasonable yielding. There are griefs so gentle in their very nature, that it would be worse than false heroism to refuse them a tear. Of this kind are the deaths of infants. Particular circumstances may render it more or less advisable to indulge in grief for the loss of a little child; but, in general, parents should be no more advised to repress their first tears on such an occasion, than to repress their smiles towards a child surviving, or to indulge in any other sympathy. It is an appeal to the same gentle tenderness; and such appeals are never made in vain. The end of them is an acquittal from the harsher bonds of affliction—from the tying down of the spirit to one melancholy idea.

It is the nature of tears of this kind, however strongly they may gush forth, to run into quiet waters at last. We cannot easily, for the whole course of our lives, think with pain of any good and kind person whom we have lost. It is the divine nature of their qualities to conquer pain and death itself; to turn the memory of them into pleasure; to survive with a placid aspect in our imaginations. We are writing at this moment just opposite a spot which contains the grave of one inexpressibly dear to us. We see from our window the trees about it, and the church spire. The green fields lie around. The clouds are travelling over-head, alternately taking away the sunshine and restoring it. The vernal winds, piping of the flowery summer-time, are nevertheless calling to mind the far-distant and dangerous ocean, which the heart that lies in that grave had many reasons to think of. And yet the sight of this spot does not give us pain. So far from it, it is the existence of that grave which doubles every charm of the spot; which links the pleasures of our childhood and manhood together; which puts a hushing tenderness in the winds, and a patient joy upon the landscape; which seems to unite heaven and earth, mortality and immortality, the grass of the tomb and the grass of the green field; and gives a more maternal aspect to the whole kindness of nature. It does not hinder gaiety itself. Happiness was what its tenant, through all her troubles, would have diffused. To diffuse happiness and to enjoy it, is not only carrying on her wishes, but realising her hopes; and gaiety, free from its only pollutions, malignity and want of sympathy, is but a child playing about the knees of its mother.

The remembered innocence and endearments of a child stand us instead of virtues that have died older. Children have not exercised the voluntary offices of friendship; they have not chosen to be kind and good to us; nor stood by us, from conscious will, in the hour of adversity. But they have shared their pleasures and pains with us as well as they could; the interchange of good offices between us has, of necessity, been less mingled with the troubles of the world; the sorrow arising from their death is the only one which we can associate with their memories. These are happy thoughts that cannot die. Our loss may always render them pensive; but they will not always be painful. It is a part of the benignity of nature that pain does not survive like pleasure, at any time, much less where the cause of it is an innocent one. The smile will remain reflected by memory, as the moon reflects the light upon us when the sun has gone into heaven.

When writers like ourselves quarrel with earthly pain (we mean writers of the same intentions, without implying, of course, anything about abilities or otherwise), they are misunderstood if they are supposed to quarrel with pains of every sort. This would be idle and effeminate. They do not pretend, indeed, that humanity might not wish, if it could, to be entirely free from pain; for it endeavors, at all times, to turn pain into pleasure: or at least to set off the one with the other, to make the former a zest and the latter a refreshment. The most unaffected dignity of suffering does this, and, if wise, acknowledges it. The greatest benevolence towards others, the most unselfish relish of their pleasures, even at its own expense, does but look to increasing the general stock of happiness, though content, if it could, to have its identity swallowed up in that splendid contemplation. We are far from meaning that this is to be called selfishness. We are far, indeed, from thinking so, or of so confounding words. But neither is it to be called pain when most unselfish, if disinterestedness be truly understood. The pain that is in it softens into pleasure, as the darker hue of the rainbow melts into the brighter. Yet even if a harsher line is to be drawn between the pain and pleasure of the most unselfish mind (and ill-health, for instance, may draw it,) we should not quarrel with it if it contributed to the general mass of comfort, and were of a nature which general kindness could not avoid. Made as we are, there are certain pains without which it would be difficult to conceive certain great and overbalancing pleasures. We may conceive it possible for beings to be made entirely happy; but in our composition something of pain seems to be a necessary ingredient, in order that the materials may turn to as fine account as possible, though our clay, in the course of ages and experience, may be refined more and more. We may get rid of the worst earth, though not of earth itself.

Now the liability to the loss of children—or rather what renders us sensible of it, the occasional loss itself—seems to be one of these necessary bitters thrown into the cup of humanity. We do not mean that every one must lose one of his children in order to enjoy the rest; or that every individual loss afflicts us in the same proportion. We allude to the deaths of infants in general. These might be as few as we could render them. But if none at all ever took place, we should regard every little child as a man or woman secured; and it will easily be conceived what a world of endearing cares and hopes this security would endanger. The very idea of infancy would lose its continuity with us. Girls and boys would be future men and women, not present children. They would have attained their full growth in our imaginations, and might as well have been men and women at once. On the other hand, those who have lost an infant, are never, as it were, without an infant child. They are the only persons who, in one sense, retain it always, and they furnish their neighbors with the same idea.* The other children grow up to manhood and womanhood, and suffer all the changes of mortality. This one alone is rendered an immortal child. Death has arrested it with his kindly harshness, and blessed it into an eternal image of youth and innocence.

Of such as these are the pleasantest shapes that visit our fancy and our hopes. They are the ever-smiling emblems of joy; the prettiest pages that wait upon imagination. Lastly, "Of these are the kingdom of heaven." Wherever there is a province of that benevolent and all-accessible empire, whether on earth or elsewhere, such are the gentle spirits that must inhabit it. To such simplicity, or the resemblance of it, must they come. Such must be the ready confidence of their hearts, and creativeness of their fancy. And so ignorant must they be of the "knowledge of good and evil," losing their discernment of that self-created trouble, by enjoying the garden before them, and not being ashamed of what is kindly and innocent.'

* "I sighed," says old Captain Dalton, "when I envied you the two bonnie children; but I sigh not now to call either the monk or the soldier mine own!"—Monastery, vol. iii., p. 341.

THE DEFORMED BOY.

Suggested by the following passage in Master Humphrey's Clock.

'A LITTLE knot of playmates—they must have been beautiful, for I see them now—were clustered one day round my mother's knee in eager admiration of some picture representing a group of infant angels, which she held in her hand. * * * I remember the fancy coming upon me to point out which of them represented each child there, and that when I had gone through all my companions, I stopped and hesitated, wondering which was most like me. I remember the children looking at each other, and my turning red and hot, and their crowding round to kiss me, saying that they loved me all the same; and then, and when the old sorrow came into my mother's mild and tender look, the truth broke upon me for the first time, and I knew, while watching my awkward and ungainly sports, how keenly she had felt for her poor crippled boy.'

His eye was on his mother's, and his arm
Rested in loving grace upon her knee;
And when she spoke, 'twas like a fairy charm
To hush the wildness of his young heart's glee—
For in her tones, so musically deep
There was a sound that tempted him to weep.

A group of fair young beings at his side
Like rose-bud garlands, bright with morning dew,
Hung round his mother's knee; while he, in pride
Gazed on their eyes of soft, bewitching blue,
And smiled most sweetly as he sought to trace
Among the angels, each dear playmate's face.

But see! a shade of sorrow dims his brow,
And o'er his temples sweeps the burning blood!
Alas, the bitter thought hath found him now,
That he alone, is an unseemly bud;
That 'mid that angel group his form, alone,
May not be numbered, nor its semblance shown.

He saw the sorrow in his mother's look,
He knew the depth of her unspoken grief;
Her heart lay spread before him like a book,
And he could read the tale on every leaf—
'Twas one continuous tale of sorrowing love
For her poor blighted child, her crippled dove.
Forever more within his gentle breast
This bitter thought remained; and when at night

He sank into his calm and peaceful rest,
He dreamed himself transformed—an angel bright
To glad his mother's eyes;—then from his sleep
Waked to bewail the change, to suffer and to weep.

Poor child! the glorious morn will come at last,
When in transfigured beauty thou shalt stand,
A veil of radiant glory o'er thee cast,
The first and fairest of the angel band;
And this shall be no dream—and that fond eye
Will gaze upon a form that ne'er can die. S. C. E.

PROGRESS TOWARDS TRUTH:

OR THE TWO FRIENDS.

BY HENRY BACON.

CHAPTER III.

'THEN said the Lord, thou hast had pity on the gourd, for the which thou hast not labored, neither madest it grow; which came up in a night, and perished in a night: And should not I spare Nineveh, that great city, wherein are more than sixscore thousand persons that cannot discern between their right hand and their left hand; and also much cattle?' JONAH iv. 10, 11.

Not long after the first introduction to our friends, Ellinor called upon Mary and found her in her garden, intently engaged in repairing, as far as possible, the disastrous effects of a late storm. It was truly interesting to watch the carefulness manifested in training the prostrate vines, propping up the bowed plants, and placing shields around the delicate sprigs. Mary's anxiety was plainly manifested in her countenance, and her friend could not but remark upon it, though she knew the passionate love Mary cherished for flowers.

'Yes, Ellinor, I should weep to see one of these die, I love them all, and what I can do shall be done to restore the drooping and prostrate. Every one has some precious association which makes it more dear than its own beauty, for with the poet I say—

'A flower I love,
Not for itself, but that its name is linked
With names I love. A talisman of hope
And memory.'

'Let me assist you in your work, and you shall pay me by the converse you promised,' said Ellinor.

'Well we can work and talk too, and will there not be sympathy between the employments of the mind and hands? I think there will, for how many a human flower is now drooping in sadness, unable to smile or drink in the grateful dew or sunshine, because of the storm of religious excitement that has passed over them, leaving them prostrate! Rachel Howard's garden is now like her own mind and heart—all in confusion, beauty in every part desolated and in weeds.'

'I met her as I was coming here. Poor girl! she looked awfully—the picture of despondency.'

'We have no such pictures of the early christian converts in the evangelical records; but far from this, the Apostles declared themselves to the disciples to be "helpers of your joy"—not merely prospective, but present joy.'

'I have been reading of late of the joy that is said in the Scriptures to be consequent on belief, and I cannot see how one can be full of joy by believing in the popular doctrine of the church.'

'And never, Ellinor, can any rational soul be able to discern this; there is no joy in them—past, present, or future. They make this world a vale of tears, and tell of an infinitely worse one as the next. They make the soul tremble whenever it thinks of God, and bring in dark thoughts when the mind meditates on eternity. "The more I think, the more unhappy I become," said a believer in these doctrines not a long while since; and that it is always so, can be easily proved by considering the difference between the aspect of professors in ordinary life, and when they are engaged in the interests of the Revival Meeting. Aye; the contrast of the every day and Sabbath appearance is sufficient. There is, and must be, an intimate connection between gloom and concentration of thought on the popular doctrines; and too often the people sit in our church as though they had come to the burial of all their glad and bright hopes.'

'I too have marked that, Mary, after I had read Saurin's Sermon on Hell, where he speaks of the effects of the thought of his probable exposure to future endless misery, that the very thought was a mortal poison, diffusing itself into every period of his life, rendering society tiresome, nourishment insipid, pleasure disgusting, and life itself a cruel bitter.'

'O, Ellinor,' exclaimed Mary, as she leaned her hand upon the sod and gazed up full in the face of her friend—'O Ellinor! is it not awful to imagine that any thought of what God will do should produce such effects?'

Tears filled her eyes and emotions choked her utterance, for then came up that instant before her mental vision the image of a female she had visited some years past with her father; a miserable maniac, with the eye of a wolf and the expression of utter despair. She was fastened to the floor of a room, because she would use the least liberty to tear every garment from off her body and lacerate herself in the most dreadful manner. All this was caused by listening too credulously to the preaching of the doctrine of endless woe, and believing that misery to be the just punishment of sin. She was once a gentle and amiable being; what is she now, if death has not given her relief? Jesus healed many of madness, but he never made a maniac. And yet did he not preach plainly and severely enough? And was there not in his audiences the same varieties of characters there is now in our public assemblies?

Mary recovered from her sudden grief, and with a smile of inexpressible sweetness said, 'Ellinor. If these flowers were sentient beings endowed with minds, could any of them think that I would leave them to utterly perish without dishonoring me—my love for them?'

'No Mary,' was the reply.

'Neither do I believe that any one can doubt the eternal love of God without dishonoring him.'

'What! do you believe in the salvation of all mankind, like old Mr. Richards?'

'Yes, Ellinor, I do—I do believe that God's purposes of wisdom and power are purposes of love, embracing the salvation, through sanctification, of every human being.'

'Is that the doctrine your father believed, and which caused the old people to talk so much about "new notions," and "second childhood?"'

'Yes, Ellinor, my honored father spent long seasons of study in considering the subject in all its relations; for it was an idea against all he had for many years believed and preached, and against which a great deal had been said. But he was forced to yield to the power of evidence, and acknowledged that the redemption of Christ will be commensurate with his power—his power over all things—that he shall see of the travail of his soul—the soul that labored for the world—"and be satisfied."'

'Did he tell many of his change?'

'Yes, but they would not listen to him. Some said he was childish, and others said he was a little crazy, and all thought it best to say as little as possible about it, lest it should awaken curiosity. And when the funeral came, as you well know, the preacher only made one allusion to it, and sufficiently as he thought accounted for it by saying, "it was owing to the great benevolence of his disposition." Aye, they then admitted much, for what else could be inferred than that the doctrines he had preached could not satisfy such benevolent dispositions as his? And they cannot, no more than a lark could be satisfied with the height of that bower.'

'But come,' she added, rising from her stooping posture, 'come let us go into the house and talk of these things more freely.'

Ellinor gladly availed herself of the invitation as she was deeply interested, and felt very much inclined to converse with her friend. They plucked a few flowers and fragrant leaves, and after taking several views of their work in the garden, they entered the house, Mary leading the way to her snug pleasant study-chamber. It was a beautiful retreat. From the windows on the west the observer had a view of the towering hills in the distance, their peaks rising up like giant sentinels on the lofty towers of strength. Nearer lay the rich orchards, with here and there the waving fields of grain, and the highly cultivated tracts of land; while just at the base of the dwelling ran a sweetly musical and merry brook, full of images of gladness and purity, as the sunlight danced upon the leaping waters. At the right, the neat dwelling houses of the village stood, with tall and noble trees intermingled, while the eye could catch frequent views of open spaces where were garden beauties in rich luxuriance. And it was pleasant to see beside such spots the shops of the village industrials, their windows wide open, taking in the fresh and healthy air, while the inmates had before them images of loveliness and freshness. On the left, the dwellings were more scattered and were those of the wealthiest class, with extensive garden grounds in view, more grateful to Mary's eye than would be the sight of the rich architecture of the fronts of the mansions. The old church was also within reach of the eye, and with its lofty tower rising up majestically, like one who is proud to maintain old fashions amid the rapid changes of the new age. From the window at this end a view was had of one of the principal streets of the town, the moving life therein giving an animation to the whole scene, needful to complete its beauty.

But the outward attractions were not so highly valued as the associations of the room itself. Each article therein was precious, for it had precious memories connected with it. There was the old arm-chair in which the venerable pastor had sat, with its moveable leaf on which so often the Bible had rested, and by which Mary had so frequently read to her beloved parent. There was the desk at which he had written, just as it was when he penned the last lines he wrote; and there too were his books, rich in comments from his pen, and marked with illustrative or refutive passages of scripture, or reference to other works,—a valuable treasure to the son just about entering the ministry and soon to be at home. And there too was the bed on which he had died—where he gave such proofs of possessing a truly patient spirit, and where he lay with the smile of the last and happy thought of heaven resting on his countenance. There also were the few pictures of sacred scenes and characters of which he was so fond, and of which he had said so much; and there hung the mirror in which he had marked the changes of time on his brow and face, as it changed the raven curl to snowy whiteness, and stole away the rose and smoothness from the cheek. O what would Mary not give if that mirror could have but retained as it once reflected the image of her own dear father, when he caught her own shadow therein and smiled at the contrast of youth and age. But her soul kept his likeness more faithful than the mirror.

Here was the right place for her to converse as Ellinor would have her. Here were all the human aids needed, and here association was more powerful to recall the instructions of her honored parent. Here she had sympathised with his inquiries, and here she witnessed the devout thanksgiving of his soul when he discovered the full grandeur and glory of the gospel and had the vision of the redeemed universe! Here she had wept in rejoicing over the satisfying hopes of her faith, and prayed for wisdom to appreciate the favors granted her. Here, Sabbath after Sabbath she had retired, devoutly thankful that her mind was proof against the terrors she so often heard declared, and which to her were no less dishonorable to God than injurious to the happiness of humanity. Here she now clasped the hand of her friend, and felt that she should be able to guide her to that faith in Jesus which would make him present in all his spiritual loveliness, and enable her to rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory.

'O Ellinor, Ellinor, I never felt happier than now. My soul rejoices like a new comer to the heavenly city of the blest. I feel that a newness of life is granted unto me, and that I could float on the air, or walk upon the water.'

'I joy in your gladness, Mary, and feel a presentiment that this hour is to be to me a memorable one. Here we will talk freely as winds mingle, or flowers unite their fragrance.'

'Yes dear Ellinor, it shall be so, and I shall often feel the spirit of my sainted father with us. O that his wisdom were mine, and his virtues too!'

As she said this, her eye fell upon the open book case, and she rose to take down a volume over which she had pondered much. It was an interleaved Bible. As she took it, she said, 'Ellinor, our inquiry is now to be "What is Truth?"'

'Yes, to seek an answer such as Jesus would have given to Pilate, had he asked in sincerity and tarried patiently for it.'

'Father has written a short answer, as here I read,—Jesus might have replied—"God—I."'

'That is more brief, than plain.'

'Yes, but I find also abundantly definite comments and remarks, which will give us a full insight into his meaning.'

'Read on, and I will listen as I would be glad to listen to your revered father himself.'

'Hallowed be his memory!' said Mary, as she fixed her eyes on the manuscript to read. She read as follows: 'An Indian philosopher at Athens, once asked Socrates, how he should begin to philosophize? Socrates replied—By reflecting on human life. The oriental philosopher smiled and said,—So long as we have not clear notions of the Divine, we shall get no insight into the Human. Here is a valuable reflection; it is light from the East, and if we obey its guiding rays it will lead us to the babe of Bethlehem—to "the Savior of the world." Men have groped in darkness because they hid themselves from this light, and in the caverns of mysticism, or the cells of the dark monasteries, have built their systems of theology on their conceptions of human nature, reasoning from this basis concerning the character and purposes of God. They have thus reversed the order of thought. Take Calvinism, as an illustration. What is the first, or foundation principle of that system? Is it a direct scriptural assertion, fairly considered in all its relations, and logically carried out? O no. It does not presume to assert this. It begins with a deduction or inference, behind which there is a supposed fact, and this deduction or inference is the basis of the system. All reasonings on man, all history of actions, and all interpretations of Scripture, are made to bend to support this; and hence the harmony of the system, and the consistency which has preserved it. What is its foundation doctrine? It is the doctrine of man's innate and entire depravity. Touch this, and you touch a spring which affects and gives character and movement to the whole. Infer this from Scripture, and all the rest is easily deduced. The "Old School" of Calvinists acknowledge that it is so, and hence their anxiety to defend the full confession of the doctrine of innate and entire depravity. They hold fast to this; and in every departure from it, they see signs of the abandonment of the whole. And should there not be an abandonment of the whole—the whole of a system that founds itself not on God, but on man's supposed nature—that takes its position amid the vague and contradictory views of human nature, and adopting the worst possible one, proceeds to reason in accordance therewith—going from man to the Deity. Hence all its teachings of God, Christ, Human Ability and Destiny, partake of the narrow and miserable character ascribed to man, and all is shadowy, repulsive and unsatisfying. Now, of a truth, every advance that is made in the philosophy of man—in just acquaintance with his nature, capacities and powers, will afford irresistible reasonings against the depraved theory, or the theory of depravity. Let the assertion be pondered,—“Lo, this only have I found, that God hath made man” (not a man, but man, in the generic sense) “upright: but they have sought out many inventions.” And with this connect the declaration that Christ “took not on him the nature of angels, but the seed—that is, the nature—of Abraham.” Now, if we harmonize the two, by asserting the opposite to the doctrine of “original sin”—of innate and entire depravity, there is no difficulty in the way of our receiving what is said of Christ's purity—that he was without sin, or knew not sin. But if we assume the other ground, we must maintain the revolting idea that Jesus partook of hereditary depravity—was born innately and entirely depraved, and “liable to the wrath of God and the pains of hell forever”—for he did not take on him “the nature of angels,” but common humanity, and thus he was “tempted in ALL points as we are.” This is sufficient to convince any mind of the folly of building a theological theory on man's nature, or supposed nature, while we have an infinitely better foundation, even the nature and perfections of God.

‘Yes, yes,’ exclaimed Ellinor, “for there we have all the acknowledged facts to deal with, and all our danger is in reasoning incorrectly. But continue the reading.”

Mary continued:—‘This was the idea inculcated by our Lord. The divine character was the central truth, giving light and glory to all other truths. Acquaintance with that was knowledge of the truth—of the highest facts, having infinite relations. Ignorance of it was the source of all error—of all mental confusion, clouding the glory of mind and veiling the beauty of the universe. As we know God, we shall judge all things—nature, man, time and eternity; and correct knowledge can alone save us

“ . . . . . from the toil
Of dropping buckets into empty wells,
And growing old in drawing nothing up.”

‘I say amen! most heartily to that, Mary, for there is surely a fountain of living waters, and from that I would drink. I would I knew the path to it.’

‘Well, here is a guide in what is farther written. We must receive the everlastingly glorious truth—“God is Love!” and carefully gathering fact after fact, reason deliberately and thoroughly, and soon we shall see evidence of the justness of the ancient declaration, “His work is perfect.” Then every part of the system formed, as well as the whole, will mirror God—the truth that he is love; as a thousand dew drops mirror each the sunbeam, and reflect the same when they flow together in a mass. Here is the perfection of Universalism. Every principle is instinct with God; and the whole, embodied, makes the Christ-like image of the Invisible. Hence it is that stripling Davids, refusing Saul's armor, go forth in full faith and return victoriously from meeting the boasting Goliaths—without the enemy's head indeed, as they would spare that to be made better. All sects allow that God's attributes are perfect, and an inspired Apostle assures us He is love. Here then is the position to be taken. Firmly we must hold to it. It is our life. And holding this fast, we must interpret Scripture, and every proposition of theology presented to us—receiving all that harmonizes therewith, and rejecting all that does not. If this, the true philosophical course, were pursued by all, all would have in their souls a divine impulse to say, “God hath not given unto us the spirit of fear; but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind.”’

‘I thank you very kindly, Mary, for the hints to study given in the remarks of your venerated parent, and I shall certainly follow their reasonable requirements. I regret that I must leave—but I must.’

‘I could wish that we might longer linger upon this subject, but we can think when separated, and mingle our thoughts and reflections when we meet again.’

Ellinor returned home as happy as a student when he has penetrated to a principle that will lead him on to sure and desirable discoveries. She felt that as great delight can be communicated by revelations of biblical truth, as by the opening of any door in the arcana of Art or Science. The repulsiveness too often connected with this study, she now owned, results from the erroneous nature of the leading teachings commonly imparted and received, which being inconsistent in themselves, involve the mind in mystery the more and more it thinks as they dictate. Yea, some have owned, that their only means of peace was, by far different subjects, to keep the mind from this range of thought.

CHAPTER IV.

'O WOULD you be assured you love your God,
Make him a God that must be loved of need,
A God you cannot otherwise than love.
Doubt is not love, suspicion is not love.'

THE friends had to regret on the morrow that stormy clouds were again gathering densely in the heavens, and that so soon another long continued rain should prevent their meeting. But now the heavens were clear, and the golden sun gave forth its streams of light, that bathed the world in beauty. The vegetable creation on every side wore an aspect of youthful freshness, and the traveler drew in the very air of vivacity and strength as the breeze came laden with the sweets of the new mown hay and the fragrance of flowers, while the birds charmed the ear with their most ambitious song. Ellinor went forth with a friend—a cousin from the city, designing to take a ramble and then to visit Mary—as she could not longer delay. They visited many a retreat of loveliness, where the heart could not but be happy if it did not secrete guilt within its folds. The stillness and calm beauty of the country favor not the dark designs of iniquity, and the heart that could forget amid the noise and bustle of the city the crime it concealed, has found the quiet and repose of the country unendurable.

The cousins pursued the winding paths round many a musical stream, where the gay cardinals nodded like saluting friends in holiday dresses, at a little remove from the clematis bowers; while all along smiled the violets, cinquefoils, and houstonias, like little children enjoying the same festival. Through wood, field, orchard, and pasturage, they roamed, and found everywhere a new variety of pleasant scenes and images; till at last Ellinor had managed to be in sight of Mary's home just as her cousin expressed a wish to halt somewhere to rest awhile. Ellinor pointed out the beloved mansion, and as they approached it, she gave her cousin such a description of Mary as made her feel a love for her immediately.

Mary had seen them from the window, and hastened to greet her friend. She flew down the path, her ringlets streaming in the wind, jewelled with some fresh rose buds and blooming lily-of-the valley's, and her countenance radiant with heart-winning good nature. Cordially she greeted the stranger as soon as introduced, and every attention was bestowed that she might feel 'at home.'

Soon the couple were introduced to 'the study,' for its shady coolness and the beauty of the prospect in view, made it the most desirable place. Clara,—for such was the city cousin's name—confessed the charms of the retreat so dear to Mary, and felt, as she afterward said, more devotional than she usually did in the splendid church she frequented. And when Ellinor told her of the conversations she and her friend had agreed to hold together, Clara desired earnestly that they would continue them and permit her to be a listener. The two friends consented, requesting her to offer any remark she pleased.

'Well, then,' commenced Mary, 'we were dwelling on the perfections of God as the central truths, with which all others harmonize.'

'Yes,' added Ellinor, 'and as I came out from home, my mind recalled—I know not why, save that it was the change in the weather since yesterday—I recalled the wise man's saying—"The light is sweet, and it is a pleasant thing for the eyes to behold the sun!" and with this came the Apostle's words: "God is light, and in him is no darkness at all." And though I have busily conversed, and richly enjoyed our ramble, yet I have thought much upon these truths.'

'And that,' said Clara, 'is the reason why you made so many observations on the colors of flowers and fruit, and continually extolled the agency of Light. I shall certainly take a greater interest than ever in what pertains to light and colors.'

'That subject has a wide range,' added Mary, 'and presents us as good an illustration as we could desire to have of the harmony of the Divine perfections.'

'I thought you would so use it,' responded Ellinor, 'and I shall be glad to listen, as much is said concerning the operations of the Deity that "with one excellence another wounds," and "set at odds heaven's jarring attributes."'

'And thus the essential unity of the Godhead is not recognized,' continued Mary; 'Justice has an office that crosses the desires of Mercy, and while the first cries, "Curse the sinner!" the other pleads that he may be forgiven.'

'And is it not so?' asked Clara, astonished at the turn the conversation was taking; for she had never given attention to think and judge for herself in matters of theology. To her, the whole of religion was a mystery, and she was contented with the perplexity with which she was troubled on the Sabbath by the preaching she had listened to. 'I am sure,' she continued, 'that Justice required the eternal death of the sinner, and that Mercy prevailed in obtaining his pardon by the blood of Jesus.'

'If Mercy prevailed against Justice,' said Mary, 'then the result must be injustice; and with whom did Mercy prevail to obtain pardon? There could be no pardoning power abiding with a Being whose justice required what excluded the idea of pardon; and if Mercy, with an opposite purpose to Justice, dwelt as a perfection in the same Being with this inflexible Justice, there must have been war in the very mind of God, and no harmony of the attributes of the Deity can be recognized.'

'This is a matter I wish to understand,' said Ellinor; for I have always heard that God is perfect in Wisdom, Power, and Goodness, and these perfections are infinite in their nature. How it is that the Deity should so often be described as a Being of stern and revolting justice, acting as a Sovereign or Judge, and no mention made of Mercy except in delineations of the compassion of Jesus, is something beyond my comprehension.'

'We shouldn't try to comprehend these matters,' said Clara, solemnly. 'They are mysteries, and the first requirement of religion is to yield reason and exercise faith.'

'Pardon me,' said Mary, 'if I remark here that there is a great difference between mystery and absurdity. "The secret things" which "are with the Lord our God," are mysteries; "but those which are revealed are for us and our children," said Moses to the people; but how could they know whether any thing was revealed or not but by the exercise of the reason? Only through reason could revelations be made unto them springs of action deep seated in the mind. It is Reason that makes us capable of receiving a Revelation from God; and it is Reason that enables us to perceive and feel the force of the evidences of a true Revelation, as well as to discern what the Revelation contains. It is Reason that teaches us the correspondence which exists between our most essential wants and affections, and the christian revelation, and makes the heart yield its love thereto.'

'Well, I have always been taught to discard Reason in matters of Religion and exercise faith,' added Clara.

'But you should remember that the systems which require of you faith, are very different. How do you know which to believe?'

'O, I shouldn't think of choosing for myself—I follow the church.'

'Excuse me, if I remark,' said Mary, 'that you should have said a church, instead of the church.'

'No, I think not, for ours is the true Apostolical Church, for does it not confess the Apostle's Creed, and is it not the most venerable?' said Clara with earnestness.

'Shall we reason the matter?' archly inquired Mary; 'for if we must not reason upon religion or theology, I know not how we shall settle the claim of antiquity, or the apostolic origin of the Creed. The Catholic will meet you with the same plea as you have used; and I think if he should, the very natural language of your mind would be, "What are your reasons?"'

'I shall not, I'm sure, meddle with all the differences of sects, for I should be soon puzzled. Truth is hardly to be found,' added Clara.

'I expected you would say, "except in our church," so common is it for people to imagine that they have all the truth in their own creed. But though you may well decline meddling with all the differences of the various sects, I think it would be well to examine some of them, by a plain guide, and perhaps you will be less puzzled than now in forming clear convictions of what christianity is.'

'We think we have discovered such a guide,' said Ellinor in behalf of herself and Mary, 'and I should be glad, cousin, if you would adopt it as yours.'

Here Clara inquired what was the nature or character of this guide, and the two friends gave her an epitome of their former conversations. This brought them all back to the opening of the discussion of the afternoon, and Mary remarked, 'Let me read a comment made on St. John's words, "God is light; and in him is no darkness at all."' She reached for the manuscript again, and turning to the passage she found the following extract from Warburton: 'The light of the sun is not in the orb itself, what we see it in the rainbow. There it is one candid, uniform, perfect blaze of glory; here we separate its perfection into the various attributes of red, yellow, blue, purple, and what else the subtle optician so nicely distinguishes. But still the solar light is no less real in the rainbow, where its rays become untwisted, and each differing thread distinctly seen in its effect, than while they remained united and incorporated with one another in the sun. Just so it is with the Divine nature; it is one single individual perfection in the Godhead himself; but when refracted and divaricated, in passing through the medium of the human mind, it becomes power, justice, mercy; which are all separately and adequately represented to the understanding.'

'That is certainly a beautiful illustration, and I shall always remember it,' said Ellinor. 'It will always prevent my arraying one attribute of the Deity against another.'

'Yes,' added Mary, 'and will it not teach every one who receives it to set aside as error every doctrine which represents the Deity as exercising one attribute to the destruction of another? Whatever is upheld by his power, his mercy can reach, and his wisdom can control to effect any result his justice may require. He has wisdom to plan the purpose goodness dictates, and power to use means to complete the end planned; and by the complete salvation of man alone, can the perfection of God be demonstrated.'

'Let us go,' said Clara, rather impatiently.

'At your service,' replied Ellinor. 'Good by, Mary—we'll meet to-morrow.'

WHAT ARE THY TREASURES?

BY IONE.

Hast thou culled from the depths of the rolling sea,
The gems thou art showing in pride to me?
Does their flashing bring to the wounded heart,
The balm of love when its hopes depart?
When they rival the tears from thy drooping lid,
Do they lighten the orbs in their sadness hid?
And these are thy treasures! oh! show them not Till their hues can brighten thy changing lot!

Hast thou birds from a far-off ocean isle,
Where their mates bright plumes in the sunlight smile?
Do their songs of beauty, their eyes of light,
Make the home of thy spirit more clear and bright?
Does their gilded cage with such splendor shine,
That the captive birds have forgot to pine?
And are these thy treasures? oh! trust as soon
For vital heat to the pale cold moon.

Hast thou broad, fair lands in a sunny clime,
Where decay is not in the path of time?
Is thy home so princely, thy hearth so dear,
Thy spirit hath all that it seeketh here?
Does it teem with the sculptor's works of pride,
And thrill with the rushing of music's tide?
And are these thy treasures? Dost hope to bear
To the narrow tomb such a weight of care?

Hast thou toiled for fame till the crown is won,
And now dost thou boast of an errand done?
Hast thou sighed for beauty, and is it thine,—
Is thy heart at rest on its fragile shrine?
Hast thou courted love till it wove a chain
Thou wouldst joyous break but thy strength is vain?
And are these thy treasures? alas, for thee!
Thy bark is wrecked on a shoreless sea!

Hast thou loved in the good man's path to tread,
And bent o'er the sufferer's lowly bed?
Hast thou sought, on the buoyant wings of prayer,
A peace which the faithless may not share?
Do thy hopes all tend to the spirit land,
And the love of a bright unspotted band?
And are these thy treasures? oh, bliss untold,
Thou hast wealth that mocketh all gems and gold!

'FORGIVENESS. Among the ancients, forgetfulness of injuries was considered a virtue; the heathen philosopher even said, that to forgive one's enemies was to be equal to the gods. Cato, whom all the world admired, said that he forgave everybody but himself.'

NOT FANCY SKETCHES. NO. II.

TY HYLER.

SHAKESPEARE has somewhere said, 'The world is still deceived by ornament.' And who that knows anything, will not endorse, without hesitation, the sentiment of the immortal bard? In the estimation of the world, he is the greatest and the best man who makes the greatest show of goodness and greatness. But it should be ever remembered, that a man may be truly great and truly good, and yet live unnoticed and die in obscurity. And so on the other hand, meanness and vice and imbecility, especially as society now is, can be gilded most beautifully by the gew-gaws and trappings of wealth, and thereby be made to appear just the opposite things from what they are. In a word, money will ornament a man's vices, and cheat the world into the belief that they are virtues; and it will also magnify a thousand fold the few real virtues which he may chance to possess, and thereby the man becomes to all superficial observers, almost without spot or blemish.

I never heard but three men speak evil of Ty Hyler. I have heard many, very many praise him—even highly extol him for his many virtues. Ty possesses the tact of putting the best side out. His tact is his chief talent. He is now living in affluence in the most fashionable and wealthy street in Boston. A retired merchant, he does little else but attend to his religious devotions—being an active member of the Episcopal church in T. street, and to the affairs of the — bank, of which he is a director.

Ty Hyler was and now is, although sixty winters have scattered their snows upon his head, a remarkably handsome man. Nobody ever did or ever could question this. His features, his complexion, his form, are just what they should be; and no man, unless he were a fastidious artist, or experienced sculptor, could detect a blemish or suggest an improvement in either. He is a Bostonian by birth, and one too by education, if we deduct four years of his early life which were spent in learning interest tables and studying Chesterfield at Harvard College. His father wished him to dedicate himself to the study of the dead languages and thereby become a learned man and a great scholar. But he was dead to ambition of this sort. He had heard of riches and had seen them too, and he longed to follow in the track of some wealthy lord. And heaven soon granted what his sire denied. At the expiration of his four years at Cambridge, Ty Hyler was placed in the counting of Dea. F. on India Street.

This Dea. F. loved two things pre-eminently—money and religion; and it was a definite object with him to make his clerks walk in his own footsteps. He found Ty Hyler one of the most tractable boys he had ever undertaken to make a man of. Ty was in fact, that is intellectually and morally, bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh. Or, to speak phrenologically, Dea. F.'s brain and Ty Hyler's brain, were similarly organized and arranged. And as it is a universally received principle in philosophy, that like causes produce like effects, it is not surprising that the general character of Ty Hyler should bear a very close resemblance to the character of Dea. F. his master.

At the age of twenty-one, Ty Hyler having invested five thousand dollars which he had received from his father, in the business concern of Dea. F., he became at once one of the Boston merchants. His business talents were ordinary—quite. But yet his fine person and polished manners, set off these mediocre talents to the best advantage. No merchant on 'Change was more highly praised than he. His shrewdness—his cunning—his enterprise, neither of which, by the way he possessed, were held up as virtues worthy of all imitation. Fortune did indeed favor every undertaking in which he embarked. His ships never made a bad voyage; and if one did happen to be wrecked, he always gained by the disaster, for the insurance generally covered more than the value of ship and cargo. Ty Hyler, like Lord Timothy Dexter, was continually making some lucky blunder. But then he had the tact, as has been before hinted, of making it appear that his prosperous voyages and profitable bargains, were the result of great calculation and foresight.

The religious portion, too, of Ty's mercantile friends, regarded him with much favor and deference. He was spoken of by them as a man of exemplary piety. And Ty was pious, that is as the world calls it; for he never was known to neglect his religious devotions. No man was more punctual in his attendance at church on the Sabbath than he. No man was so fervent in his responses to the church service as he. No countenance in the whole wealthy congregation which assembled in the magnificent church in S. street, wore so devout an aspect. No one bowed his head so low, or remained so long upon his knees. And besides, he contributed liberally to the support of his clergy, and his name stood conspicuous in the subscription lists of the Missionary and Bible Societies. Not only his right hand, but the whole community knew what his left hand did, whenever it performed anything in the way of charity, which, we are constrained to confess, was not seldom. Is it to be wondered at then, that Ty Hyler was spoken of as a man distinguished equally for his zeal in religion and his skill and success in business? Ty was considered, and perhaps he in reality was, a very happy man—for Pope has declared, 'the fool is happy that he knows no more.' He—that is Ty, not the fool, never looked sorrowful except on Sundays; and then his face did wear an aspect of gloom—thick, dense and chilly as a November fog. On business days, while thinking and talking of stocks, exchange and kindred subjects, in his counting room or in State street, a benignant, bewitching, pleasant smile like morning sunshine, played around his mouth and circled about his eyes. Had he possessed the force of character and the courage of a Gloster, he would have murdered while he smiled. But he was a man of feeble temper and excessive caution, and could not nerve up his soul to any crime not sanctioned by his views of religion, the laws of the Commonwealth, or the common usages of commercial life. He could shave notes, praise his damaged goods without qualification, lie about his prices and his profits, sympathize with the sufferings of the man from whom he was extorting the last dollar, and all this he would do in such a bland and loving manner, that none but the most sagacious, and even they were frequently deceived, could detect the hypocrisy. Ty's victims praised him as a man of the best heart, and I doubt not prayed for his prosperity.

Ty married of course, and of course he married advantageously. He chose the eldest and the homeliest, because the richest heiress in the richest religious society in the city of Boston. This disinterested and pious act of Ty's memorable life, took place simultaneously, that is, on the same day of the declaration of the last war with Great Britain. I would not, however, have the reader infer that there was the remotest relation between the two events. Such an inference would be very unphilosophical and exceedingly illogical. The most you can make of the fact, is a remarkable coincidence of remarkable circumstances, very profitable to Ty Hyler. He married a fortune, which, added to the one he possessed before, made two fortunes. A large portion of these he invested in piracy—I mean privateering—for piracy, he of course abhorred, and would not, being a church member and a man of piety too, engage in; unless, indeed, it could be made lawful by some legislative enactment. Privateering is quite a different thing from piracy, although in both cases people kill, take, burn and destroy. One, the law allows, the other it does not allow—a distinction broad enough for any common sense man to perceive. And Ty, being a common sense man (no one can accuse us of ever having denied it), saw this broad difference between piracy and privateering, at a single glance. He had, therefore, no conscientious scruples on this subject. Ty's investment in privateering, like every other investment of his, turned out fortunately. The wealth of his country's enemies flowed like a coming tide into the coffers of Ty Hyler. His piety increased with the increase of his riches. He built a chapel at his own expense in the vicinity of his church, and increased his donations to the Missionary and other benevolent societies, especially to such as contained a large proportion of evangelical christians within their organizations. In short, Ty, with his usual tact, made the people believe he was more faithful than ever in the service of God. A few only saw how devotedly he served Mammon.

When the war ceased, Ty ceased fitting out privateers; for privateering after that would have been piracy. His wealth was now enormous, and he had invested a large portion of it in bank stock and real estate. Though he had become one of the richest men in Boston, he was frequently heard to complain of being poor whenever a mechanic presented a bill to him for payment, and insisted generally upon some small discount. It was evident that his passion for wealth had not decreased by gratification. It was still the ruling feeling of his soul, although he disguised it from the world, and perhaps from his own heart.

About this time he subscribed largely to the stock in the new church in C. street, the building of which he strongly urged, as being a necessary means of promoting piety in that section of the city. As chairman of the building committee, he contracted with the builders at a price at which he said (most imprudently) he knew they must lose. And lose they did, all that they were worth. The few hundreds which they possessed were wrought into the substantial and ornamental work of the edifice in which Ty and his wealthy society served the Lord on Sabbath days. Ty felt for the two poor mechanics who had made so bad a contract with him, and willingly headed a subscription paper with fifty dollars to relieve the distressed family of one of these same men. What is worthy of remark about this little incident is, that Ty would neither put down his name, or pay the money on Sunday, because in his view, the doing of either would violate the sanctity of the holy Sabbath, as he invariably termed the first day of the week. Other members of the society were not quite so religiously given, and did that, which he affirmed at the time, could be as effectually and conveniently done on any other day of the week.

On one occasion a small tenement of his in Dock Square, was about to be vacated. The tenant, therefore, a very worthy grocer, who had occupied the place for many years, had failed in business, and was obliged to sell out. After he had notified Ty of his intention to leave the premises, the grocer's friends proposed to him to recommence business in the same place, promising their assistance. The grocer, Mr. S., went immediately to his landlord to re-engage the store. I should be happy, said Ty, when Mr. S. had made his business known, 'I should be very happy to rent you the store again, but I must add fifty dollars to the rent. I have already been offered two hundred and fifty by Mr. Hunting, but I positively declined giving him a definite answer till I should hear from you. I knew your friends would help you, and I am willing to help you too, and will therefore give you the preference over Mr. Hunting. Pay me what he offers, and I will give you a lease immediately.' The poor grocer declared he could not possibly pay a higher rent than formerly, and must look about for another store. Ty made him promise, however, to call and see him again before he engaged another place. 'I may,' he added, 'abate something from the two hundred and fifty.' Mr. S. agreed to come again, and wishing Ty good morning, retired.

As the grocer went down stairs, he was met by Mr. Hunting, who had been requested by Ty to call about that hour. 'Well, Mr. Hunting,' observed Ty, as the latter seated himself, 'I hope you have made up your mind to take the store at two hundred and fifty dollars. I want the matter settled without further delay. Mr. S., who has occupied the premises for the last six years, has just been here, and offered me, almost without hesitating or objecting the same which I ask you. He even insisted upon my closing the bargain with him. But the truth is, Mr. Hunting, I want a rather better tenant. I am not over pleased with the man's religion. I have heard of you as a man of respectability and piety; and I prefer you as a tenant to any man who has yet applied. Now if you say so, I will fill out a lease of the store for five or ten years at two hundred and fifty dollars.'

'I told you, sir,' replied Mr. Hunting, 'that I could not and should not pay but two hundred. If I can have the store for that, 'tis well; if not, I must seek elsewhere.' With this brief and business like answer, Mr. Hunting took his leave.

Three days after this interview, Hyler's old tenant, Mr. S., called on him to obtain a final answer. You shall have the store, said Ty, after a few preliminary remarks on the hardness of the times, you shall have the store for two hundred and twenty-five dollars, which is twenty-five dollars less per year, than Mr. Hunting offers me. But as I told you the other day, I have a choice to exercise in renting my buildings; and I rather you should occupy the store than Mr. Hunting, although he offers me the higher rent. The bargain was immediately closed. Reader, this is not fiction, it is fact; and it is now for the first time revealed to the public. Why this, and similar incidents, in the life of Ty Hyler never leaked out, was owing to two things, viz. his tact and his good fortune. If his tact did sometimes forsake him, his good luck never departed. This has always clung to him through sixty years of mortal existence, and has made his path through life like that of but few—smooth and easy, and flowery.

In 18— Hyler was chairman of a committee for building the Absolution Bank. He was desirous that a young mechanic, for whom he had long entertained an unaccountable partiality, should superintend the erection of the edifice. But it so happened, that this young man was of an opposite political party and an opposite religious faith from his wealthy patron. This fact had but recently come to the knowledge of Hyler, and it produced precisely the effect which such things generally do, on all narrow and bigoted minds.

'Mr. D.,' said Ty one morning, in his luxurious counting room, at a meeting which he had appointed for the purpose of looking over the plans and settling the preliminaries of a contract; 'Mr. D., I am both surprised and grieved to learn that you are a political agitator, and that your religious principles are of the most licentious character, and therefore dangerous to the welfare of society, and to the happiness of souls. In all my business transactions, I wish to act in the fear of God. I have always endeavored thus to act throughout my short life; and in consequence, I have been blessed with good fortune in all my pursuits, having laid up a little something against a rainy day, enough I trust, to support me comfortably when I get too old to attend to business. Now to be consistent with the high religious principles from which I have never deviated in the least particular, I must give the building of the Absolution Bank to some man whose influence is good and not evil on society. If I employ you, I shall be countenancing a religion which jeopardizes the souls of men, and I shall be encouraging political principles and measures which aim at the overthrow of all social order. And as the other members of the committee have empowered me to employ a superintendent for building the Absolution Bank, and, as I am desirous, as you know, of throwing the work into your hands, I will make the following reasonable proposal to you. If you will sign a paper renouncing your destructive agrarian principles, and hereafter attend meeting with me, or go to some evangelical church, you shall have my influence, not only for this job, but for many others of equal profit. I cannot favor you as I have done, while you retain your present religious and political opinions.'

All this was spoken in a mild, sweet, sympathizing tone, and when the flow of honeyed words had ceased, the young mechanic attempted to show the unfairness and unreasonableness of the whole proceeding. Ty replied somewhat pettishly, that he did not wish to have any discussion; but he would give Mr. D. three days to consider his proposition. Mr. D. rose from the rich crimson arm-chair in which he had sat during the conference, and standing firm and erect like one conscious of right, and while contempt curled his lip and indignation flashed from his eye, replied in a tone loud enough to startle Ty from his seat:—'Mr. Hyler, I reject your proposal with scorn. I want not three minutes to decide upon the insulting proposition which you have offered me. Had you been a man, you never would have thought of insulting me with it.' Thus ended Mr. D.'s connection with Ty Hyler. Mr. D. dismissed him, and would no longer consider him his employer and patron.

And is it not time, reader, for us to dismiss him from our notice. We must do it, or alter the title of this article. We promised a sketch and not a biography. Let me say one thing, however, in conclusion, one thing which I wish to have remembered. Fancy had nothing to do in penning this brief outline of Ty Hyler. It is all true, every word of it. Did he not deceive the world by ornament?

A TRIBUTE OF SYMPATHY.

Written one Year after the Death of Miss H. N. G.

INSCRIBED TO J. M. B.

'She thirsted for a spring
Of a serener element.'

I SAW at morn, upborne by fragile stem,
A pure white lily. A bright crystal gem—
A dew-drop—slept within its beauteous cell,
Reflecting the soft sunbeams as they fell
And kissed the cup.

Time sped away.

Beneath the scorplings of meridian day,
The flowret drooped—a withered, blighted thing.
A cherub fair had bent his golden wing,
Had dipped the liquid spirit from the flower,
And borne it upward to his heavenly bower:—
The petals fell, and withered 'neath the blast,
While heavenward, on bright wings, the dew-drop passed.

'Twas thus with her—the loved and spotless one!
Too frail for earth's rude storms and scorching sun,
Her spirit, like the dew, so pure and bright,
Swift to the land of spirits took its flight.
The flower exhaled its last sweet odorous breath,
Then meekly bowed and kissed the earth in death.
A little while permitted here to bloom
In youth's bright morning smile, the chilly tomb
Entwines its icy chaplet o'er her brow,
And binds her clay where droops the willow's bough:
But, like the sparkling dew which upward soared
To join the living Fountain, whence were poured Oceans of waters, blessings without scope—
Faith, love and beauty, truth and beaming hope.—
HER spirit winged its flight away from earth—
Away from chilly storms and pains and dearth,—
Seeking its element, where sin and death,
Can never taint its spotless, sinless breath.
Yes, heaven was hers, and how could she refrain
From going home to be with God again?
Yet, here were those—the truly loved, the kind;—
And 'Oh! how hard to part,' when kindred mind
Hath bound in silken cords communing souls—
E'en though bright angels lead to heavenly goals!
Said I the loved were here? and why so say
To thee, my friend, whose life was brightest day
Within her presence? Thou couldst not but know
Her soul's affections in their native glow!

Time, with his leaden wings, hath swept a year
Among the past; and Autumn leaves, all sere,
Have fell in mournful cadence round her head,
And wintry snows have shrouded oft her bed,
And Spring's reviving breath hath waved the fanes
Of stately trees, and touched the icy veins
Of algid streams, and set them bounding free,
Where bloom the loved sweet-brier and hawthorn tree;
And Summer, too, hath spread with deeper green,
The peaceful 'valley.' And the gorgeous sheen Thrown o'er her grave like an emblazoned shroud,
Again the blast of regal Autumn, proud
Of conquering, hath touched with russet hue,

Ere it had bid the foliant months adieu.
 And can the flight of time, or seasons' change,
 Thy thoughts from thy affianced one estrange?
 Thou seest her in faith and spirit still—
 In every flower, and fern, and shrub, and rill—
 In every orb in yon ethereal blue—
 In evening's shade, and morning's purple hue—
 In pearly dew-drops on the bending blade,
 And sighing winds that sweep the floral glade!
 Her soul, unbound and free like ether-spray,
 Is circling onward through one boundless day
 Of heavenly light and life, where it shall reign,
 Unknown to deathly chills or earthly pain.

The marble slab—'TO DIE IS TO GO HOME'—
 Reared o'er her head, is but the simple dome
 To tell where rest the sad remains—the dust—
 Which held her spirit in its earthly trust.
 That damp and frigid house beneath the sod,
 Holds not the mind—that, soaring far abroad,
 Will seek sweet converse with the loved and pure,
 While God, Eternity and Heaven endure. W. H. K.

BIOGRAPHY. NO. II.

FELICIA DOROTHEA HEMANS.

A WRITER in the 'Western Messenger,' in his zeal to commend to young ladies sober prose and works of palpable utility, says he had rather be the author of one of Miss Sedgwick's works, than all that Mrs. Hemans ever wrote. And to this he adds a sneer in reference to her productions. We venture to opine that he is some old fusty chap who thinks far more of a potatoe patch than he does of the most luxuriant flower-garden, and values 'arbs' more than all the varied forms of floral grace and beauty. He can see no utility in that which does not treat directly, and in solemn prose, of the best way of increasing wealth, and developing a sturdy, common sense character. We will not yield to him in love of true utility, and maintain that in his judgment of what is good, he overlooks the finer feelings and tenderest sensibilities of the human soul. We were made for poetry, as much as for the plain prose of life; and the poem that exalts the affections and reveals the holy beauties of human sympathies, has a ministry of usefulness as truly as the sermon on love. Oftentime, it will affect the soul as the sermon cannot; for the poet is permitted to deal with the most secret feelings, and sing thoughts which are too sacred to be breathed with uninspired lips, while the preacher keeps aloof from allusions to those affections and emotions which grow out of life's tenderest attachments. And thus the productions of Mrs. Hemans are to be valued as of the highest worth. They can have no tendency but to purify, exalt, and awaken humanity to a deep and strong-consciousness of the glory which love may reveal, when it has touched and embued with its own spirit every part of the mental being. 'She addressed herself,' says a eulogist, 'not to passion, or fashion, or the public, or any class of the community or country she lived in, but to human beings as such,—to their hearts, as well as their heads—with truth's transparent and glowing passport in her hand;—and it was an introduction that never yet failed to be effectual, nor ever will.' Where it does fail in some few cases, the failure must be from the want of 'the spirit of truth' within, by which alone the symbols of the highest truth are recognized and interpreted. 'She strove to be the worthy interpreter of worthy truth, deeply concerning the happiness of her race; and the vital spirit of virtue has inspired her to be equal to the task.' They who own it not, must be classed with those who have despised God's messengers because they knew them not! When her songs and hymns, and delineations of the heroic, are read with a voice that belongs to a beauty-discerning heart, in the home circle, or in the woody depth, or on the high hill, or by the leaping streams, or under the craggy rocks by the ocean side, a thrilling response within the breast answers to the high and beautiful, and religious thoughts which are uttered. She lifts our being to God through the path through which the affections only can bear the soul, and pours an unction upon the spirit that makes affection joyous for the strength it begets, and the increase of spiritual vision which it imparts. Hallowed be her memory! By the bed of the sick, and at the couch of the dying, her sweet and holy musings have been read, and as the soul has conversed with them, it has blessed God for the mission of the poet of the Affections—the poet of the Heart.

But to the sketch biography. Felicia Dorothea Browne was born in Liverpool in 1794, in a small quaint-looking house in St. Anne Street, which was lately, if not now standing, old fashioned and desolate, in the midst of the newer buildings by which it is surrounded. 'Her father was a native of Ireland, and her mother descended from a Venetian house, among the members of which several advanced to distinction. She was the second daughter and fourth child, of a family of three daughters and three sons.' 'When about five years of age, her father owing to mercantile embarrassments, removed to the North of Wales. This new residence was well calculated to encourage her poetic turn. It was near the sea, shut in by a chain of rocky hills.' It was here, doubtless, that she saw those exhibitions of the terrible power of the sea, which made it a name of terror, and prevented her from loving to contemplate its beauties and sublimities.

As a child, Felicia is described as very beautiful—of brilliant complexion, long, curling, and golden hair, which, in later years, deepened into brown, but remained silken, profuse, and wavy to the last. She was a creature of acute sensibilities, and early manifested a keen sense of the beautiful; these with an extraordinary memory which retained every thing, fitted her for the task of serving poesy. Her mother encouraged her earliest efforts, and at the age of seven years, she wrote pieces full of promise, the result of reading and observation, and these she confided to her sympathizing mother. In this respect, her early life was very different from that of many who are known to fame. And it was to her a happy difference, and reveals great amiability in the character of her mother.

'Shakspeare was one of her greatest and earliest favorite authors; and by way of securing shade and freedom from interruption, she used to climb an apple tree and there study his plays. She had not long made familiar acquaintance with his "beings of the mind," before she was possessed with the temporary desire, so often born, of an intense delight of personifying them. It is remarkable that the fancy led her to prefer the characters of Imogene and Beatrice. She loved the loneliness and freedom of the sea shore well; it was a favorite freak of hers, when quite a child to get up privately, after careful attendants had fancied her safe in bed, and making her way down to the water side, indulge herself with a stolen bath. The sound of the ocean, and the melancholy sights of wreck and ruin which follow a storm, made an indelible impression on her mind, and gave their coloring and imagery, and "a sound and a gleam of the moaning sea," to many of the lyrics which were written when she began to trust to her own impulses and to draw upon her own stores, instead of more timidly retiring under the shadow of mighty names. No extraordinary attention appears to have been bestowed upon the education of Miss Browne. She was never at school, and it is averred that the only things she was ever regularly taught were French, English Grammar, and the rudiments of Latin, communicated by a gentleman, who used to deplore "that she was not a man to have borne away the highest honors of college!"

'The first volume of poems published by Miss Browne, was in 1808. This contained some verses written when she was nine years old. This volume, inscribed to Lady Kirkwall, contains those little birthday compliment addresses to attached relatives, and expressions of affection, or regret, in which the young delight to exercise their newly discovered power.

'Miss Browne was married to Capt. Hemans, of the English army in 1812. There had been a protracted separation, and shortly before the birth of a fifth son, the union may be said to have closed. Capt. Hemans' health had been much impaired, by the hardships of a military life. A few years after his marriage he left his native land for the milder sky of Italy, but Mrs. Hemans pursued her literary labors in her native land.

'From this period to the time of her death it is well known that this gifted woman devoted herself almost entirely to poetry. It would be a work of supererogation to enumerate the brilliant productions of her pen; they are written upon the hearts and linger on the tongues of all lovers of poetry. She was ardently devoted to her children, and did every thing for them that maternal affection could devise. It was peculiarly gratifying to her feelings, amid the gloom of ill health that presaged her final dissolution, that her fourth son received an appointment in a government office. Whenever she spoke of this affair she described it as "sunshine without a cloud."

'The woman and the poet were in her too inseparably united to admit of their being considered apart from each other. In her private letters, as in her published works, she shows herself high-minded, affectionate, grateful—wayward in her self-neglect, delicate to fastidiousness in her tastes; in her religion, fervent without intolerance; eager to impart it to others—earnest, devoted to her art, to the service of all things beautiful, and noble, and holy. She may have fallen short of some of her predecessors in vigor of mind, of some of her contemporaries in variety of fancy: but she surpassed them all in the use of language, in the employment of a rich, chaste, and glowing imagery, and in the perfect music of her versification. It will be long before the chasm left in our female literature by her death will be worthily filled; she will be long remembered—long spoken of by those who knew her works, yet longer by those who knew herself;

"Kindly and gently, but as of one
For whom 'tis well to be fled and gone;
As of a bird from a chain unbound,
As of a wanderer whose home is found,
So let it be!"

THE TOLLING BELL.

BY MRS. J. R. SPOONER.

O SOLEMN sound! that ever and anon,
Is mingled with the city's busy hum.
Thou hast a meaning in thy dull, deep tone,
That thrills the inmost heart. Dost thou not speak,
And tell the world that one of us is gone
To that far country whence none e'er returns?
And though unknown his nation, name, or state,
Whether a child of fortune or of want,
He claimed a common brotherhood with us—
His maker God, and ours his Savior too.
But yesterday perchance, he walked the earth
In youth and health, anticipating life,
With joyful hopes of happy days to come.
Now weeping friends stand round the bed of death,
And mourn the contrast! Contrast O how sad!
The heart that late with warm affection glowed,
Now beats no more. The hand is cold and stiff,

And the pale lips have closed—the sight is gone
From the once beaming eye, now fixed in death.

O 'tis an hour

Fraught with such woe that poor humanity
Doth oft-times envy him who feels no more.
Hard is the tax our best affections pay,
When dearest friends are called upon to part.
Despair would cloud the soul, did not the hope,
The blessed hope of life immortal rise,
To calm the mourner with the soothing thought,
That severed streams again shall re-unite,
And in one tide shall blend to part no more.

What though the daily funeral knell be felt,
So common an occurrence, that the world
Scarce heeds the solemn warning voice that speaks
And tells the living that they too must die.
That youth and innocence, and health and joy,
No harriers prove against the hand that may
E'en now be raised to strike our dearest friends,
And crush our fondest hopes to rise no more.
How feeble is the tenure of man's life!
Uncertain all the happiness of earth,
Where all is changing, nothing sure but death.
O might we learn to fix our thoughts on high,
Where pain, and sorrow, death, are all unknown,
And wean our hearts from earth to rest on heaven,
Then might the tolling bell not preach in vain.

THE UNSYMPATHIZING HUSBAND.

BY MIMOSA.

'You intimated to Daniel that to-morrow would be a leisure day, Thomas; I should like to ride out to visit Mrs. Wilkins, if you can go with me. I might feel better for it, and I think, too, a ride would do little Johnny much good.'

'I know not how I may be employed to-morrow,' replied Mr. Moore, 'and a woman's place is at home. I presume you can find air and exercise about the house sufficient to satisfy the demands of health; and the children cannot lack either, so long as you allow them to romp out as much as they have lately done.'

'Very well,' meekly responded his wife, 'I will keep at home, if you choose I should.'

She resumed her employment with apparent cheerfulness; but her heart ached, and it was only by repeated efforts that she could check the hot tears which every instant started into her eyes. She loved her husband devotedly, studied his taste, and tried in all things to gratify it; her pleasure, often her necessity, was surrendered to his comfort, and sometimes she expected, at least, an affectionate acknowledgment of it from him whose approbation she valued more highly than aught else on earth. But even when asked for, it was reluctantly given; and only woman's undying love could have nerved her for her daily toils and sacrifices. Mr. Moore's heart was not cold; from the time he first saw his wife, when she was a gay, laughing girl of sixteen, he had loved her as deeply as man need to love. But he was of a reserved temperament; his heart often melted with tender emotions, but he thought it weakness to express such feelings. He knew not that the manifestation of sympathy, the breathing of kind words, the smiles of affectionate regard, were as necessary to his wife's happiness as the soft dew and radiance of summer are to the flowers. But so it was, and day after day she pondered his coldness and seeming indifference, and with a heavy heart administered to his necessities and comfort.

Years passed; four lovely boys were given them, and Mrs. Moore hoped they would render her husband less reserved and more amiable. So, occasionally, they did; for he loved them almost to idolatry. His general manners, however, continued unchanged. The little ones noticed how carefully their mother avoided doing anything which their father disapproved, and her unwearied efforts to anticipate his wishes and gratify them. Both by precept and example, she taught them not only to respect him, but to love him as a parent should be loved, and their innocent hearts bounded with joy whenever he approached them. They detailed to him their slight grievances, their plans for the future, and their blissful anticipations. Their glad prattle exhilarated his spirits, and he forgot, for a time, the weariness and vexation with which the outer world harassed his mind. Often his selfish taciturnity subdued his better nature, and then his wife and children were unnoticed, or answered by forced monosyllables.

'Father, father, see my sugar dog!' shouted Sammy as Mr. Moore entered his house one evening, in rather a pettish mood.

'And my sugar rooster!' continued Jemmy.

'And my whistle, father!' said John. 'Mother bought them for us.'

'What good will they do you?' demanded the father, seating himself by the fire.

A shrill blast from the hero of the clarion, replied; 'Do, father, see how sweet this whistles!' he continued, putting the moistened end of the crumbling instrument to his father's lips. 'Now blow!' 'Hear my dog bark,—wow! wow! he snaps, father; he is cross.' 'See my rooster crow, father! coo! doo! doo! there, now!'

'Stop your noise! go away;' sternly replied the father. There was no mistaking that decisive tone; the children retreated to the farther side of the room, and with looks of mortification sat down in silence.

'I shall eat my whistle now,' whispered Johnny.

'I shall give my bird to mother,' Jemmy replied.

Sammy sat awhile, thoughtful; then he said, 'I'll tell you what I shall do. I will keep my dog till to-morrow; father will be pleasant then, and I will give it to him.'

To-morrow came; at night the father returned from business and found not his wife at home. She went out after dinner, and had not yet returned. Such a circumstance never failed to render him sullen. When Sammy advanced to offer his dog, Sweet, he received a sterner repulse than was given him on the preceding evening. He hid himself and wept in bitterness of spirit. The children's sympathies were so often, in this manner, sent back wounded to their own warm hearts, that fear for their father gradually took the place of love; and they instinctively avoided him, except in moments of excitement when their buoyant spirits rose above the influence of habitual awe. Mrs. Moore perceived the effect her husband's temper was working on the hearts of their children, and spoke of it to him. He too, felt it, and had mourned for the cause; but to have his wife speak of it,—ah, that would not do! she might think she could influence him. His pride interposed.

'You are always brooding over some fancied evil; if I lose the children's love, see that you retain it.'

'I have no selfish motive in speaking of it; your good and the children's alone, induce me to do it. For myself, I would bear anything without complaining.'

'Wonderfully self-sacrificing! I want to hear no more about it.' His wife made no rejoinder.

When a lad, Mr. Moore frequently heard men curse 'petticoat government,' and he early learned to deprecate it. The prayer strengthened with his strength. It was against an imaginary evil he prayed, a chimaera which he kept shrouded in a dark recess of his brain, and which roared and hissed and flamed to the detriment of his domestic happiness. He feared the world would think him governed in some cases by woman; so he never consulted his wife on any occasion, never asked her opinion; when he bought her a new dress, he never even asked her how she liked it. I wish Miss 'M. A. D.' could give him one of her meaning looks, and whisper in his ear, 'How do you like it?' He is almost nervously predisposed to take a hint.

When looking on his meek wife, with her pale, sickly face, I have wondered how her husband could be so cowardly as to steel his heart against the sweet influences of her amiable disposition. I felt that she could not have given him his horror of 'petticoat government.' One of Mr. Moore's friends, with whom, in boyhood, he had talked much about man's dignity and importance as head of all things on earth, and from whom he received his strongest prejudices against female influence, had married a lady of an ambitious business-like turn, and in her he placed entire confidence. This friend was as loud and as obstinate in denouncing 'petticoat government,' as he ever had been; yet a one-eyed person could see how completely his wife managed him. Her influence over him in matters of business, dress, and religion, was boundless; yet he knew it not, and congratulated himself on having never, by word or act, acknowledged woman's influence. Mr. Moore saw this; and he kept his wife ignorant of the state of his affairs, at times when a knowledge of it would have been a relief to her burdened mind. He feared to let her know she had his confidence, lest she should take advantage of it to bend his will to her inclinations. This apparent want of sympathy cruelly lacerated Mrs. Moore's heart, and embittered lives which might have been made happy by well-timed kindness, and a sacrifice of selfish feeling on the part of the husband and father.

Mr. Moore had, also, an erroneous notion that conjugal sacrifices must all be on the wife's part; that the wishes of the husband, as head and lord, should be gratified at any expense of physical ease and mental delight; that the wife should toil unremittingly for his comfort, and strive by means of muscle and thought, to increase his happiness, because duty enjoins it, and not because she looks for his smile and waits with a patience which would have vexed the patriarch of yore, for his affectionate approbation to reward her exertions. Should he thank his wife for a pudding seasoned to his liking? for a pie fitted to his palate? for the sacrifice of a party to make him happier at home? On no! this would be throwing off the dignity with which the 'lords of creation' are vested, and might lead the wife to think she had done what exact duty did not demand. This would be a dangerous precedent. It is always better to be governed by a sense of duty, and not suffer the promptings of affection, or an amiable disposition to lead us astray; so we may suppose reasoned Mr. Moore.

If Mr. Moore's children, as they advance in years, become reserved and distant in their deportment towards him, if they reluctantly converse with him, and in preference communicate to others their plans, their feelings, their hopes and aspirations, will he not impute it to his misjudged training of them? Probably he will recollect that his selfishness checked the expansion of the love and confidence which sprung up for him in their hearts. Should they evince a propensity to seek enjoyment at other places rather than beneath the paternal roof; should they spend their evenings abroad instead of cheering with their presence and converse the home circle; should they, instead of beautifying their father's hearth-stone, adorn themselves for public show, and chase the shade of happiness through halls of dissipation, whence from gregarious vices the reality retires in disgust,—his heart will upbraid him with Solomon's simple and solemn injunction, 'Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it.'

Should his wife mourn in uncomplaining submission for these results, yet fear to speak of their cause, and at last sick of 'hope deferred,' pining for want of a cordial reciprocity of affection, seek sympathy among the cold clods of the earth, will not the latent fire of love re-act on its former lethargy, and sear the heart in which it so long slept unheeded? Poor man! God in mercy grant that he may not be a victim of his own unsubdued selfishness.

SCRIPTURE SKETCH. RIZPAH.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

[WE wish some power might rest upon the poet Willis that would keep him at word-painting of Scripture incidents, at which employment he was once eminently successful, and made many good hearts his debtor. He has written so much that is foolish, that he has lost the skill he once possessed, as is clearly seen by the poem 'Lazarus and Mary,' in the Christian Souvenir for 1843. The following, however, is of the same class of excellence as 'The Leper,' and 'The Raising of Jairus' Daughter.' We extracted it from the 'Brother Jonathan' something more than a year since.]

* * * * *

As he spoke, a step,
Light as an antelope's the threshold press'd,
And like a beam of light into the room
Enter'd Mephibosheth. What bird of Heaven,
Or creature of the wild—what flower of earth—
Was like this fairest of the sons of Saul!
The violet's cup was harsh to his blue eye.
Less agile was the wild barb's fiery step.
His voice drew hearts to him. His smile was like
The incarnation of some blessed dream,
Its joyousness so sunn'd the gazer's eye.
Fair were his locks. His snowy teeth divided
A bow of Love, drawn with a scarlet thread.
His cheek was like the moist heart of the rose;
And, but for nostrils of that breathing fire
That turns the lion back, and limbs as lithe
As is the velvet muscle of the pard,
Mephibosheth had been too fair for man.

As if he were a vision that would fade,
Rizpah gaz'd on him. Never, to her eye,
Grew his bright form familiar, but, like stars,
That seem each night new lit in a new Heaven,
He was each morn's sweet gift to her. She lov'd
Her first-born, as a mother loves her child,
Tenderly, fondly. But for him—the last—
What had she done for Heav'n to be his mother!
Her heart rose in her throat to hear his voice,
She look'd at him forever thro' her tears,
Her utterance, when she spoke to him, sank down
As if the lightest thought of him had lain
In an unfathom'd cavern of her soul.
The morning light was part of him, to her—
What broke the day for but to show his beauty?
The hours but measured time till he should come,
Too tardy sang the bird when he was gone.
She would have shut the flow'rs, and call'd the star
Back to the mountain-top, and bade the sun
Pause at Eve's golden door, to wait for him.

Was this a heart gone wild?—or is the love
Of mothers like a madness! Such as this Is many a poor one in the humble home,
Who silently and sweetly sits alone,
Pouring her life all out upon her child.
What cares she that he does not feel how close
Her heart beats after his—that all unseen
Are the fond thoughts that follow him by day,
And watch his sleep like angels—and, when mov'd
By some sore-needed Providence, he stops
In his wild path and lifts a thought to Heaven,
What cares the mother that he does not see
The link between the blessing and her prayer!
He who once wept with Mary—angels keeping
Their unthank'd watch—are a foreshadowing
Of what love is in Heaven. We may believe
That we shall know each other's forms hereafter,
And, in the bright fields of the better land,
Call the lost dead to us. Oh conscious heart!
That in the lone paths of this shadowy world
Has blest all light, however dimly shining,
That broke upon the darkness of thy way—
Number thy lamps of love, and tell me now
How many canst thou re-light at the stars
And blush not at their burning? One—one only—
Lit while your pulses by one heart kept time
And fed with faithful fondness to your grave—
(Tho' sometimes with a hand stretch'd back from Heav'n)
Steadfast thro' all things—near, when most forgot—
And with its finger of unerring truth
Pointing the lost way in thy darkest hour—
One lamp—thy Mother's love—amid the stars
Shall lift its pure flame changeless, and before
The throne of God burn thro' eternity—
Holy—as it was lit and lent thee here.

SKETCHES OF SCENERY. NO. I.

BY REV. N. C. FLETCHER.

ARE you for a walk Henry; or shall we harness 'Lightfoot' to the carriage and take an airing by the side of yonder mountain? I prefer the latter of course; but if I shall not be obliged to tax my locomotive powers to too great an extent, I will accompany you to its summit, after having been driven to its base by one who knows how to handle the 'ribbons.'

There is not a more romantic spot upon the foot-stool, than Dodge's mountain in Thomaston, Me. It is five hundred and sixty feet above the level of the sea, and overlooks two as thriving villages as the traveler ever gazed upon. Upon the summit of this imperishable fortress of nature I am now seated amid all the wild magnificence of mountain scenery. The prospect around me is indeed delightful. The sun is declining in the West, and his slanting beams fall gently upon the lightening scathed rocks, and luxuriant oaks with which I am surrounded. Before me stretches out in majestic grandeur the beautiful bay of Penobscot, whose pure waters lave our shores, rolling onward in deep and silent majesty by the unnumbered islands which the Almighty hath raised in its bosom, and clad with such robes of beauty that the very waves they have usurped, worship the loveliness of their intrusion. Here the beautiful and lady-like Steamer Express, is wending her way to the city of the East, cleaving the waters from her prow in fine undulations;—and there the numerous vessels, with their whitened canvass flapping against the masts which sustains it, are sluggishly moving upon the face of the great waters.

Among the number lying at anchor, I perceive a long black piratical looking craft, whose open ports and warlike appearance bespeak for her a passing notice. This is the 'U. S. Steam Ship Missouri.' She has been in our harbor for a few days and thousands have availed themselves of this opportunity to tread her decks and view her machinery and armament. On my right, 'Owls Head' is seen, against which the waves of the Atlantic when lashed into fury by the howling tempest, beat unmercifully and with tremendous roar, yet without effect; the hoarse murmuring seas may ever and anon renew their assaults on the huge 'head' that opposes them, and clothe it in the robes of awful sublimity, yet will it continue firm and unshaken, till the end of time. When the winds are sleeping in their caverns, the blue waters sweep gently along its base, sparkling onward and lighting up the faces of the humble fishermen with a smile, while they joyfully secure the prize for which they toil. At this place is a fine hotel where all the luxuries of the seasons are bountifully and elegantly served up. Here the invalid resorts to enjoy the gentle sea breeze of summer, that the flush of health may be reinstated upon his cheek, and here congregate the healthy to spend their leisure in all the varied pastimes which this romantic spot affords.

On my left is 'Jameson's Point,' which extends itself far into the bay. It is covered with rich grain and valuable pasturage, as well as stately forest trees that wave their 'abundant drapery against the deep blue sky.' In the 'East' is seen the 'Fox Islands,' whose foliage from the distance is softened into indistinctness, and they lay in the water with their 'well defined shadows hanging beneath them as distinctly as clouds in the sky, and apparently as moveable.' In sailing along by them in the night you seem to realize the mad girl's dream when she visited the stars, and found them

'Only green islands, sown thick in the sky.'

At the base of the mountain upon which I am seated, is one of the most picturesque meadows which my eyes ever gazed upon. Trees waving their palmy branches exultingly in the bright air; limpid streams blithely dancing along by their flower-lined banks, and flocks of herds here and there quietly grazing their tender food are among the objects to be seen beneath me. 'The eye is not satisfied with seeing,' and the landscape around me, recalls to mind that beautiful prodigality of faith which induced the ancients to behold a type of divinity in every thing around them. 'The woods and the grottoes, and even the fruits and flowers of earth, were to them fraught with celestial influences. They worshipped unconsciously in the stream and the sunbeam, that Power who created them, and nature was the beautiful shrine on which they offered up the indefinite emotions of the heart.' The village of East Thomaston in the distance one mile has been called 'the village of spires,' from the four tall spires of its churches. It contains about three thousand inhabitants, who are frugal and industrious, and who possess much of the true Yankee's love of gain. They possess no taste for grandeur and exterior show, and their white cottage-houses are good indexes of their characters. Hark! is that not thunder? Let us gather up our scattered senses and depart.

East Thomaston, Me., 1842.

MY MOTHER'S BIRTH PLACE.

Is THIS thy childhood's home,
My mother? Was it o'er these moss grown rocks,
That e'en seem fashioned for some fairy's walks,
Thy infant steps did roam?
'Tis a lone spot and wild!

The beautiful and stern are mingled here
So softly, that it seems some brighter sphere,
Serene and mild.

The zephyrs gently breathe,
Through these old trees, beneath whose sheltering arms
Thou oft hast played, secure from all alarms,
Twining some fragrant wreath
Of these wild flowers,
That lift their graceful heads around thy feet.
Oh! on this spot, the pure and good should meet
In summer hours.

Smoothly towards the shore
The ocean waves majestically roll;
E'en now, I feel the beauty on my soul,
Of its lone music roar.
Was't on this beach,
My mother! that thy steps did often stray,
Watching the waves in silent gladness play
Within thy reach?

Here didst thou sit, and gaze
Upon the snowy sail, that, far away
Shone in the light of eve, or glare of day,
Through the dim haze,

Coursing its silent way
Along the shore, to some far distant clime,
O'er ocean's blue, whose waves through boundless time,
Have thrown their spray?

Resting in silence, too,
Upon its glassy breast, all mirrored, lay
Islands which seem'd to watch its sparkling play,
And ever varying hue.
Mother! thy home is lovely;
The dark embowering shade of these old woods,
Their softening beauty, their deep solitudes,
Fall soothingly
Upon my own sad heart;
And, unto thine, how dear was every glade,
Where thou with thy young sisters oft hast played!
For then no dart
Of sorrow e'er had thrown
Its shadow on thy bright and sunny years,
Nor had thy young eyes e'er been dimmed with tears,
For peace was all thy own.

But shadows now do rest
Upon thy home; the charm to thee is gone;
Thy own loved parents sleep in their long home.
Still they are blest.
For them thou shouldst not mourn,
Tho', as thy gaze on each familiar spot
Is fixed, sad memories come with visions fraught,
Of days long past and gone.

Though other spots there are,
Endeared to thee like holy dreams of heaven;
Though other dear ones, to thy heart are given,
And in thy care,
So often as thy feet,
In after years are turned to this dear home,
Thoughts of the past, the loved and lost, may come,
In visions sweet.

I would that my short path
Through life, might be in some lone spot like this,
Disturbed by naught save the soft zephyrs' kiss—
Heeding no tempest's wrath.
And I would learn
To be like thee, my mother! good and true;
My thoughts should take from these lone shades their hue,
Nor vainly yearn
For aught more fair.
All earth's exciting scenes should be forgot,
And with dear friends to roam this lovely spot,
My only care.
Thomaston, Me.

AMIE.

VIRTUE AND WISDOM. As amber attracts a straw, so does beauty admiration, which only lasts while the warmth continues; but virtue, wisdom, goodness, and real worth, like the loadstone, never lose their powers. They are true graces, which are linked and tied hand in hand, because it is by their influence that human hearts are so firmly united to each other.
And they who are truly virtuous, are like the stars of magnitude in the constellation.

WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING.

BY HENRY BACON.

THANKS be to God for those endowments of mind and dictates of a pure religion, which enable us to disregard the boundaries of sects and parties, and discern the excellences of such a man as WILLIAM EL-LERY CHANNING. The brightness of the holy and beautiful eye has faded, the eloquent lip is stilled, and the heart which beat with boundless hope for man, stirs not its enclosure. The face of the dead has been looked upon, and man has spoken to man throughout our country—Channing is gone! In the high places of the nation, in every watch-tower of freedom, in every retreat where Truth trims and feeds her lights of progress and glory, in the halls of learning, in the homes of the lowly, in the heart of the slave, a loss is felt. He lived for humanity, and humanity will feel his death. He was a genuine lover of truth everywhere and always. He loved it as the bright revelation of God, and rejoiced in its power to light up the darkest depths of humanity with the ra-diance of hope. He was a true man; and well said a eulogist who happily executed his task, 'To be a man, was to him the greatest of gifts and the highest of responsibilities.' And in the pursuance of the aims involved in this lofty conception of manliness, he made his own words his motto: 'We belong first to God, and next to our race.' Whatever concerned man, concerned him; and liberty of mind and conscience, enlargement of thought and comprehension, generosity of feeling and judgment, nobleness of aim and purpose, high resolve, heroic action, boundless benevolence and philanthropy, found in him a worthy expounder and advocate. The beautiful light of his genius has shed on all the relations of life a new and attractive loveliness, winning the soul to duty by persuasion that appeals to all that is good within us.
His expansive benevolence has shamed selfishness, his disinterestedness has made boasters pale, and his calm, but fervently uttered truths, have entered souls with a virtue that breaks up the palsying disease, imparts energy to the active powers for good, and lifts up the whole being to a nobler and christian life.
His words shall never die, neither shall his memory perish. His name is the heritage of humanity, and it shall never be sold.

We had intended to have presented the reader with a tribute to Channing, pronounced the Sabbath morning after his death; but its publication in a pamphlet having been requested, we must content ourself with a briefer notice. We take great pleasure in acknowledging our gratification in listening to the Eulogy delivered by the Rev. E. B. Hall, of Providence. It was a noble performance, rich with thought. A mind that could so well appreciate the greatness and fullness of the theme, and so well bring out the ideal, must be endowed with no ordinary excellences. We have gathered a few incidents, recalled by memory, after hearing the Eulogy referred to. We give them with the thoughts they have suggested to our own mind. They have to us a deep interest, and we cannot but think that the reader will prize them.

STUDY OF THE SCRIPTURES.

AT the commencement of Channing's ministry in Boston, he established meetings to be held in private houses, for the exposition of the Scriptures. That these were meetings where freedom was exercised, where thought was kindled, where the desire was to gain truth, not opinions, where new interest was imparted to the sacred page, we may readily believe, not only from the testimony of those who attended them, but from the known character of the man—the teacher—the expounder. A lady once conversed with him upon the subject of reading the Scriptures, lamenting the small degree of interest which she took in the perusal of the sacred volume. In answer he said, 'You must not merely read, you must study, study deeply. You must not make it a rule to read just so much every day, as though the quantity perused answered the duty, but you must study a portion, search the letter for the spirit, and study a portion thus every day.' And this, we are told, was his custom. Did it not do something towards nourishing the spirit of God's revelation in his soul, which beams from all his writings, and makes them all instinct with love to reach, move and affect the heart and conscience? He loved the Bible. It revealed to him the only real Universe.

GRAVITY.

It was said of Channing, in the eulogy on his character noticed above, that an amusing topic was never introduced in his presence, and that his gravity sobered every light feeling. We can hardly believe this as fact; and did we believe it, it would not do anything to perfect our ideal of his amiability. Gravity we like—we like it especially in the minister, but perpetual gravity is against nature, happiness and virtue. A gravity that will not permit the introduction of those subjects which gratify wit and excite mirth, is a gravity that takes the richest smile from virtue, and the charm from moral excellence by which, especially, the young are won to the love of practical christianity. Channing, we know, vindicated a comic literature imbued with a religious spirit, and we cannot believe that he intended in his life to kill by gravity every thing comic in social intercourse. We often misjudge individuals who live lives of thought. We imagine that they love nothing but soberness, and fearing to indulge any comic feeling in their presence, the gravity in our mistaken souls is made an attribute of their character. When Channing was abroad in nature, amid the glories of mountain, lake and plain, there was deep enthusiasm not only in his soul, but in his language, and doubtless in his countenance and looks. If, in social intercourse, those who came near him felt that they were forbidden to indulge in comic or mirthful feeling, we believe the impression was an incorrect one. No writer has spoken more strongly against interdicting that which gratifies the comic vein, than Channing. 'The propensity to wit and laughter,' says he, 'does, indeed, through excessive indulgence, often issue in a character of heartless levity, low mimicry, or unfeeling ridicule. It often seeks gratification in regions of impurity, throws a gaiety around vice, and sometimes even pours contempt on virtue. But though often and mournfully perverted, it is still a gift of God, and may and ought to minister not only to innocent pleasure, but to the intellect and the heart.'

TRUE BASIS OF REFORMS.

ALL true social progress has been united with the christian spirit, and it is only by standing on the heights to which christianity lifts the faithful, that a view is given of man which is encouraging. To doubt man's capacities for improvement—to want faith in the utility of appeals to his best feelings—to regard social inequalities as they now exist as inevitable, is no part of the mental character of a true Reformer, nor is it countenanced by christianity. Christianity is the great Elevator. It gives the soul a sublime view of what man is capable of being and doing by opening the riches of human nature and the aids furnished by God's grace for the development of the grandeur of that nature, and it shows a rock on which we may stand where the waves that overwhelm so many cannot reach us. 'I have no faith,' said Channing in a certain conversation, 'I have no faith in any Reform that is not based on christianity.' His knowledge of man—of our nature, and the complete and perfect adaptability of christianity thereunto, caused him to pronounce this opinion. 'Love and reverence for human nature,' said he in his last public effort, 'a love for man stronger than death, is the very spirit of christianity. Undoubtedly this spirit is faintly comprehended by the best of us.' 'The triumphs of christianity, however deferred, are not the less surely announced by what it has already achieved.'

'To effect any real reform,' says another, 'the individual man must be improved.' 'What the reformer, then, wants, is the power to elevate the individual, to quicken in his soul the love of the highest excellence, and to urge him forward towards perfection with new and stronger impulses.' This power Infidelity cannot supply. It has no affinity with man's higher being. It is no oak on which the bleeding vine may lean, and around whose giant arms it may wind itself to gain support, and that it may better grow and become fruitful. It is the thought of what he is capable of being and the consequent glory of possessing the exaltation, which christianity infuses into the soul of man, that is the elevating power, and prompts to heroic action, as the consciousness of a noble alliance does a warrior. Lord Bacon has written that as a dog who finds himself supported by a man, has a generosity and courage unknown before, because he depends on a nature higher and better than his own, so man, conscious of his nearness to God, and leaning on a nature superior to his own, has a nobleness of bearing and a heroism of resolve and action, to which human nature could not otherwise attain. A dog that trembles in the night when alone, but who puts on the firmest courage when his master appears, so is man when he is without God, and when he feels the nearness of the Deity. The proposed Reform which does not recognize christianity—that does not give place to the religious sentiment, is radically deficient in the element of success and permanency. It gives no exercise to the noblest feeling of the soul. It does not strengthen the religious sentiment without which we cannot be true men. Religion enters as essentially into our conception of a perfect man—a reformed man, as the attribute of rectitude—in short, it is the soul and glory of Rectitude. Reforms must be based on christianity to succeed, for the creation groaneth 'for the manifestation of the sons of God!'

POPULARITY OF CHANNING'S WRITINGS.

THE writings of Channing abound with Thought. They have nothing of Fiction, but very little indeed of Poetry, and are devoted to the advocacy of what are deemed unpopular doctrines. Yet his works are popular—the world waited to hear his voice, and when he spoke, the news went far and wide—Channing has given us another word! And is not this a cheering sign of the progress of the mind of the age—that thought is becoming more its element—that men are more willing to engage in searching out the reason of things—to appeal to the eternal principles of Rectitude? We may pause and contemplate the popularity of Channing's works, in view of what are the signs of the times, as well as other labors or sportiveness in literature, whose popularity is used as an argument in favor of the degeneracy of the age. His writings belong to the permanent—they belong to our true national literature—they breathe, as all true American literature does, the spirit of liberty, purity, and progress. But that which is cited to prove the degeneracy of the times, belongs to the transient—it must pass away, for it has none of the element of everlasting life. It does not exalt, and therefore cannot improve man.

FAITH IN THE INVISIBLE.

It is written of Moses that 'he endured as seeing him who is Invisible.' To see the invisible—to have the sight of faith, is essential to the possession of a true spirit of endurance in a life like this. Happy are they who have so clear and firm a faith that they would not be startled did they see the new clothed spirit come forth, as 'the winged gem' from the body of the chrysalis. Such a faith Channing thought he possessed. A lady was once conversing with him in reference to the departed, and remarked that she could not but desire that some one of them might come back from the invisible world. With a smile, he answered her, 'I do not expect that any of my departed friends will come back, but my faith in the life of the invisible world is so strong and clear, that should any of the departed appear, I do not think it would astonish me.' A blessed faith was that! A faith it was like that of our Master when pronouncing the omnific words over the sick and the dead. He was never astonished at the return to life and health of the dead and sick. He alone remained unaffected by the deeds of power, and therefore, he possessed the presence of mind which bade the Jews unbind the body of the raised Lazarus, and said to the relatives of the restored maiden—'Give her to eat.'—'Blessed are they which have not seen, but yet have believed.'

PUBLIC WORSHIP.

SOME of the stern critics of the literature of Liberal Christianity, have imagined that they could discover a growing dislike for outward ordinances in the writings of Channing. They think they can discern this where others discern a loftier and more fervent plea for spirituality in religion, and that outward ordinances might be more true as aids, by the agency of thought and feeling. And this is the correct idea. 'Bodily exercise profiteth little' in matters of outward rites; it is the indwelling of godliness that is the all in all—the spirit moulds and uses forms as its necessities require. That Channing loved and prized public worship—a great ordinance—to the last, is manifested in an incident of his last day on earth. The bells rang for the morning service, and he advised his daughter to go to church. She went. The afternoon came; he told her to go again—'Go to church,' said he. 'Go in the morning, go in the afternoon. It will do you good, Mary!' She went; and when she returned, he was dying—dying to mortal vision, but to the sight of angels, enlarging into beatific life.—The good of public worship will keep pace, with the true progress of mind; for it is indeed true that with the increase of mental and moral power, the significance, beauty and blessedness of public worship may be increased. 'Strength and beauty are in the Sanctuary.'

THE LAST REQUEST.

THE last moments of eminent men have ever been clothed with unusual interest to the general mind, and a large catalogue of the names of those whose last words are recorded, might be given. There is indeed not only a religious, but a poetical interest, connected with the entering of an eminent mind into the mysteries of death. All that is solemn and good within us is awakened, and we pause to hear the least whisper, as eagerly as of old the heathen bowed before the Oracle. What Channing's last words were, we know not; but his last request was this;—'Read to me from the Scriptures.' On being asked what portion should be read, he answered—'The closing verses of the fifth chapter of Matthew,' and then he repeated the verse, 'If ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same?'

O ever to my soul will there be a new interest given to those holy words of the Prince of Peace. I shall think of the gentle and loving spirit that repeated them, as the parent turns back ere he departs to leave a wise admonition. There is a need of the living and dying uttering the heavenly words of the Master, that in the souls of christians may be breathed a purer and broader love, and on the precepts of Jesus may rest the sanctity of heaven.

THE WORD QUICKENED.

THE eulogist on Channing referred to, in speaking of that immortal man's last public effort—a voluntary labor for the slave—eloquently lauded the performance and its power to reach the minds and hearts of thousands, and added with touching pathos—"It is not quickened, except it die." Channing is dead and the word is quickened.' The poetry is better than the literal expression, for the poetry inclines us to compare the earthly body of Channing to the encasement of the germinating principle of the seed, and that as the throwing off this encasement imparts a quickening power to the germ, so the death of Channing has imparted a quickening power to his last words which they otherwise would not have had. The fact that it was a voluntary utterance—an effort when he was seeking health—and his last—will call attention to it, and cause it to be read with a more solemn and intense interest than would otherwise have been given to it. His death has quickened the germinating power of the word. In thousands of souls it will bring forth a new interest in the condition of the slave—a new zeal to labor for his emancipation—a truer estimate of the worth of Liberty. It gives to his last days a pure moral sublimity. He had visited the heights of Berkshire for vivification, and in the enjoyment of the glorious nature there, he gained new life—and used it immediately. A lofty use it was—and for it humanity will praise him, and his name shall be one with Liberty.

THE stars twinkle in their gorgeousness, and the silvery moon looks smiling on! PR.

OBITUARIES.

DIED in Haverhill, N. H., July 11, Mrs. PHEBE, widow of the late Hon. Moses Dow, aged 91 years and 4 months.

A good old age indeed—good because of the peaceful and happy faith in God and his Christ which she cherished, and which enabled her to lie down and die in hope. While we dwell on the departure of one so aged, we are reminded of a pilgrimage we once took to an ancient burying place. We went from grave to grave, removing the veiling moss from the gravestones, that we might read the inscriptions thereon. We knelt down to one, and after removing the moss, read the following words—'Why should we weep that a new child is added to the company of the immortals?' A question that is, thought we, which implies a beautiful sentiment to check tears. We thought it must be the grave of a child, at which we were standing; but on looking again upon the stone, we found that beneath slept a female aged ninety years! A beautiful trust, thought we, prepared that inscription. To the living remembering heart, death to the beloved aged one, was the entrance to a new life. The resurrection was a 'new birth.' She had thrown off all the habiliments of age—its infirmities and sorrows, and had become a child among the immortals! Why should the surviving weep?

The heavenly influences of our blessed faith incline the believing soul to cherish the same thought in respect to the departed. Death is a change; but it brings no inglorious change to the spirit; all that was dear, still survives—their affections are immortal, and the change which touches those affections, is that which changes from glory to glory—from strength to strength. It is so with her whose death, or rather whose putting off of mortality, we have recorded. She died in the faith of the Restitution, and all the aged who die thus, depart like the setting of the Autumn sun when it bids us adieu in glory. The contemplation of the setting sun of Autumn always exerts a calming and sweet influence upon the soul, and so may meditation upon the departure of this aged mother in Israel, be to those in whose hearts her memory is dear. May they live in the faith in which she so happily died; and thus, walking in the fear of the Lord, they shall have the comforts of the Holy Spirit. May they have 'everlasting consolation and good hope through grace'—hope that is full of comforting expectancy.

IN Providence, Sept. 28, Miss LONIRA CHEEVERS, daughter of Mr. Adnah Sackett, aged 16 years.

By this death we were called to weep over another victim of Consumption; and as often as we are called to this melancholy duty, we are reminded of Percival's plaintive poem, in which he almost makes us in love with the insidious disease because of its beauty. His words come involuntarily to our own lips—

'There is sweetness in woman's decay,
When the light of beauty is fading away,
When the bright enchantment of youth is gone,
And the tint that glow'd, and the eye that shone,
And darted around its glance of power,
And the lip that vied with the sweetest flower,
That ever in Pæstum's garden blew,
Or ever was steep'd in fragrant dew,
When all that was bright and fair has fled,
But the loveliness lingering round the dead.

O! there is sweetness in beauty's close,
Like the perfume scenting the wither'd rose,
For a nameless charm around her plays,
And her eyes are kindled with hallow'd rays,
And a veil of spotless purity
Has mantled her cheek with its heavenly dye,
Like a cloud whereon the queen of night
Has poured her softest tint of light;
And there is a blending of white and blue,
Where the purple blood is melting through
The snow of her pale and tender cheek;
And there are tones, that sweetly speak
Of a spirit, who longs for a purer day,
And is ready to wing her flight away.'

It was so with the maiden whose departure we have recorded. Life could not but be dear, surrounded as she was with all that the heart could wish—save health giving power; yet she could relinquish her hold upon earth in humble and sweet submission to the will of her heavenly Father. Her soul was at peace in the Redeemer, and in thoughts of heaven she found the elixir of a true spiritual life. Her conversations manifested the resignation to which she had disciplined herself, and she could look on death, as he slowly approached, without shuddering. The grave's gloom, was as the darkness of night to her—a wise ordination of a perfectly wise and good Deity, affording as clear evidences of his love as the brightness of noontide. Therefore, her death was peaceful—peaceful as the flower's close at evening; and dear to the hearts of her parents and friends, must be the sweet remembrances of her willingness to depart—of how she beheld the footsteps of Jesus as he returned from the tomb, and in deep love of his resurrection smile fell asleep.

We do not record this death as an addition to the thousands of illustrations of the sufficiency of our hope for the dying. We know not what were the thoughts of the departed on the extent and efficacy of Redeeming Grace. She saw enough of her Father's love and her Savior's tenderness to resign herself cheerfully and unreservedly to her destiny. Thanks be to God that she did—that we have seen another instance of how death can be won to do his work gently and kindly.—Another attraction is now added to heaven. Another link is joined to the golden chain which unites the heart to imperishable things. One more has joined the absent. May the God of all comfort continually abide with the bereaved parents, and prepare them for whatever must come to their surviving dear ones. May the 'consolations of Christ' in them abound.

IN Providence, Sept. 29, Miss MARIETTA T., daughter of Dr. Elias Smith, formerly of Boston, aged 25 years.

Many years of sickness and pain are ended. We cannot but be thankful that they are ended, though the end was death. We know the depth of tenderness that is moved in the parent's heart by the anxieties consequent upon a constant ministry towards one liable every hour to convulsions and to be as helpless as a child. But with faith in God and his dear Son, christian consolation will abound; the parents will realize the deep truth of her own words—'There is more to die for, than to live for.' She in her last days was—thank God!—rational, and conversed calmly and affectionately of what she recalled of the past and in reference to the future. She gave herself to God without reservation, for in Him she trustingly confided. Though a child of pain and weakness, she was ever amiable and affectionate; her tender soul was grieved for the rashness she thought she might have manifested in delirium; but against her, her parents can recall no act contrary to a filial spirit. Farewell thou gentle and suffering one! We will remember thy amiability, and bear our lighter sorrows more patiently as we remember thy submission! May the God of all comfort strengthen the hearts of the parents and relatives. To the Gospel we commend them.

PITY AND CHARITY.

THE very pirate that dyes the ocean wave with the blood of his fellow beings; that meets with his defenceless victim in some lonely sea where no cry for help can be heard, and plunges his dagger to the heart that is pleading for life—which is calling upon him by all the names of kindred, of children, and home, to spare; yes, the very pirate is such a man, as you or I might have been. Orphanage in childhood, an unfriended youth, an evil companion, a resort to sinful pleasure, familiarity with vice, a scorned and blighted name, seared and crushed affections, desperate fortunes—these are steps which might have led any one among us to unfurl upon the high seas the bloody flag of universal defiance, to have waged war with our kind, to have put on the terrific attributes, to have done the dreadful deeds, and to have died the awful death of the ocean robber. How many affecting relationships of humanity plead with us to pity him? That head, that is doomed to pay the price of blood, once rested upon a mother's bosom. The hand that did that accursed work, and shall soon be stretched, cold, nerveless, in the felon's grave, was once taken and cherished by a father's hand, and led in the ways of sportive childhood and innocent pleasure. The dreadful monster of crime has once been the object of sisterly love, and all domestic endearment. Pity him then, pity his blighted hope and his crushed heart. It is reasonable; it is meet for frail and sinning creatures like us to cherish. It foregoes no moral discrimination. It feels no crime; but feels it as a weak, tempted, and rescued creature should. It imitates the great Master, and looks with indignation upon the offender, and yet it is grieved for him.

EDITOR'S BOOK TABLE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., NOVEMBER, 1842.

Human Life ; or Practical Ethics. Translated from the German of De Wette. By Samuel Osgood. Boston: James Munroe & Co. 1842. 2 vols. pp. 409 & 368.

A valuable series of 'Specimens of Foreign Literature' has been issued from the press, under the editorial supervision of Rev. George Ripley. The present volumes are the twelfth and thirteenth numbers, and well merit a place in the series. The theme cannot but demand the attention of those who are engaged in the labor of unfolding correct morals, and who regard morality as having its foundations in our essential being, and as alone adapted to cause the growth of man's powers to be harmonious and beautiful. Were Ethics more studied and better understood, there would not be so many vague and contradictory notions concerning moral duty, and man would see cause to act from higher considerations than expediency or policy, and why he should become wedded to the Right. We thank Mr. Osgood for his labors. He has made available to English readers a work that ranks among the permanent literature of Germany, and gives them a better acquaintance with De Wette, than the reviews and sketches which so frequently come under our eye. Some of the chapters or lectures, are peculiarly valuable—though choice, in this respect, we well know is very much a matter of taste, and dictated by a person's habits of thought. We have read with much gratification the Introduction, and the Lectures on 'Clearness of Mind,' 'Strength of Will,' and the 'Alleged Conflicts of Duties,' in the first volume, and in the second we are hardly able to institute a choice. All the subjects are those of highest moment, and the discussion of them in this work will be found to be eminently suggestive.

The style of the translation is quiet and good, and of its fidelity we have no question. The publishers have done their part well; and we cannot but earnestly commend the work to public attention, especially to our readers. We have promised to tell them of good books, and we tell them of two when we present for their notice this translation of De Wette's 'Practical Ethics.'

Good Wives. By Mrs. D. L. Child. 'Yes, it's a heartsome thing to be a wife.' Boston: Carter, Hendee & Co. 1833. pp. 316.

'The Ladies Family Library' was the name of a series of volumes to be published from the pen of Mrs. D. L. Child, author or compiler. But three, we believe, were issued; those three, however, are among the most excellent for a Ladies Library. The present volume we are very desirous of commending to the notice of those who love the biographies of good women by one who 'defines' her 'position' thus: 'Even the most ordinary writer has some influence on mankind, and is responsible to God for the use he makes of that influence. I may sin against taste—I may be deficient in talent—but it shall ever be my earnest endeavor to write nothing, that can, even in its remotest tendency, check the progress of good feelings and correct principles.' She anticipates the question, why she has not inserted more biographies of American wives, and after alluding to the wives of Dr. Ramsay, the patriot Josiah Quincy, and John Adams, she remarks, 'But such cases as these furnish no details for the biographer, or any one strong point, on which to found a striking anecdote. I know that good wives and excellent husbands abound in every part of the Union; but it must be remembered that I could only give a sketch of those whose virtues were in print; and though there exists among us elements of female character, which, in time of need, would become sublime virtues, our national career has hitherto been too peaceful to call them into action in a manner likely to secure a place in history.' 'But since domestic love and virtue really have an abode with us, it matters little whether the world be informed of their full extent; it is our business to cherish, not to display them.' And most sincerely can we remark, that this is a book to incite to diligence in this 'business,' for by virtues is the cause of virtue here plead.

'The Economy of Health ; or the Stream of Human Life, from the Cradle to the Grave. With Reflections, moral, physical, and philosophical, on the Septennial Phases of Human Existence. By James Johnson, M. D., Physician Extraordinary to the King. N. York: Harper & Brothers. 1837. 12mo. pp. 283.

So great is the number of works on the laws of health, and so important are those on which we can rely, that it is really a favor to have such an one as the volume before us pointed out. It appeals to common sense, and leads us behind many curtains that are too frequently kept drawn between the mind and the real truth of things. We like this work much for one peculiarity—it recognizes the reciprocal influence of the moral and the physical laws, and shows how seldom they act independently in the economy of life. One theme he touches peculiarly well, and that is—more is revealed to the physician than to the priest, of the real feelings of individuals; and by the discussion of matters pertaining to this, he speaks plainly of the many punishments 'not visible to the world, though keenly felt by the individuals on whom they fall;' and why we should, and safely can, conclude that all breaches 'of the laws of God and Nature draw after them penal infliction, whether that infliction be patent to the world or not.' The work is divided into Septennials, and admirably lays open the economy of health.

Memoirs of John Frederic Oberlin, pastor of Waldbach in the Ban de la Roche. Compiled from authentic sources, chiefly French and German.

Faithful memoirs of such men as Oberlin are of the highest value, and the nurturing of a taste for them in the heart of a child is to favor the growth of everything good. Oberlin deserves to be ranked among the chief benefactors of his race, for who do a nobler work than those who demonstrate the practicability of the high requirements of christianity, its adaptedness to the debased, and its power to elevate and ennoble? We rise from the perusal of such works as this with a new trust in man, with a new love of the morally heroic, and a more fervent desire to do something for our race. We refer to this work, not only to commend it to renewed notice, but to speak of a feature which should be regarded by our Sabbath School Librarians. In the Pittsburgh edition, by Rev. L. Halsey, and in the Cambridge edition, by Rev. H. Ware, jr., pp. 180 and 200, we find a reference made to the peculiar faith of Oberlin in the Restitution. The remark of the author is, 'It is needless to say of these doctrines that they are fanciful and mistaken, and not to be defended by an accurate application of Scripture.' We of course are perfectly willing for the author to utter his whole mind, and all we want is, that a note may be made to answer the unevincenced assertion. The Cambridge edition is very handsomely printed, duodecimo size; the other is a 12mo. and poorly printed.

Oration before the Phi Beta Kappa Society of Brown University, Providence, R. I., on Commencement Day, Sept. 7, 1842. By Francis C. Gray. Providence: B. Cranston & Co. pp. 40.

This is not an oration to read and then throw aside. Its truths are to be pondered, and well would it be if every American could and would read and deeply reflect upon them in connection with the eloquent plea of Mr. Mann in his fourth of July oration. The oration by Mr. Gray is in the same lofty tone as his Eulogy on Washington, and will be found to be a finished production. The theme is—The Mission of America! This he develops with a masterly power, and earnestly advocates the means of fulfilling the mission.

Universalism Examined, Renounced, Exposed; in a Series of Lectures, embracing the Experience of the Author during a Ministry of twelve years, and the Testimony of Universalist Ministers to the dreadful moral tendency of their Faith. By Matthew Hale Smith. Boston: Tappan & Dennett. New-York: Dayton & Newman; Saxton & Miles. Philadelphia: Perkins & Purves. 1842. pp. 396.

We can speak of this work with no measured language, for our contempt for it is immeasurable. This is the first time we have written the name of its author for the public eye since his inglorious evolutions, and we write it now with feelings which we dislike exceedingly to be forced to entertain towards any human being. His book is stamped with falsehood, and circumstances are detailed with great solemnity, designedly to make an impression on the reader as opposite to what the author knows to be correct, as darkness is from light. We should not notice the work were it not for the countenance given to it by the names of four respectable firms of booksellers, and the use that will be made of it by some of those who are held in high esteem in community. It shows an imbecile intellect, and to receive it will be an act which will confer no honor on any intelligent mind.

Oration, delivered before the City of Boston, July 4, 1842. By Hon. Horace Mann.

This production we regard as more intrinsically valuable than any other Fourth of July oration we have ever perused. Every American citizen who has one spark of the love of country in him, will feel grateful to Mr. Mann for the essential service which he has rendered the public. We certainly never read a book of any kind, with more thrilling interest. The style of course is forcible indeed, it is grand.

But what gives the unusual interest to the production, is the startling facts which it embodies, and the clearness and conclusiveness of the reasonings from them. The grand conclusion which the able author aims to impress upon the minds of his fellow citizens is the importance—the absolute necessity of providing more ample means than are now employed, for common school education.

He shows that unless this be done, our cherished republican institutions will one day be at the disposal of voters so ignorant that they cannot even write their own names. He shows that not only the grossest ignorance, but the foulest crimes are spreading and increasing with fearful rapidity. All who love their country and their race, should read and ponder well upon this oration. Let the clergy, and all others who believe that intelligence and virtue are the only sure foundation for a republic to stand upon, labor in season and out of season to diffuse the one and promote the other. Whoever reads the oration will not, we venture to say, read in vain.

Morley Ernstein; or the Tenants of the Heart. By G. P. R. James, Esq., author of 'Richelieu,' &c.

The copy of the above work which we have read, is published in the New World, of June 8th.

We do not practise indiscriminate novel reading ourselves, neither do we recommend the practice to others. But there are many works of fiction issued from the press, which every man and woman, unless they are saturated with prejudice and bigotry, can read not only with pleasure, but with intellectual and spiritual profit. Morley Ernstein belongs to this class. The plot is ingenious, the characters are consistent throughout, many of the descriptions are scenes beautiful, the moral reflections are just, and the denouement is just what we expected, with the exception that Lieburg, the consummate and finished villain of the story, turns out to be but a tenant of every human heart. The moral influence of the story is good. It is an interesting illustration of the antagonism of the two laws spoken of by the Apostle—the law which he found in his members, warring against the law of his mind. Or, which is the same thing, it shows the danger and certain destruction, of allowing the animal propensities and passions to predominate over the moral feelings. Read it.

HONESTY IN MAINTAINING RELIGIOUS TRUTH.

BY HOSEA BALLOU 2D.

GAL. ii. 14: 'I saw that they walked not uprightly according to the truth of the gospel.'

THERE are many ways, in which we may be guilty of not walking uprightly; and whenever this is the case, be it in whatsoever way, we of course walk contrary to the gospel. But St. Paul here refers, as we shall soon see, to one particular kind of dishonesty: to dishonesty with respect to professing and maintaining the several truths of the gospel. That was the distinct fault he here had in view. The people, here spoken of, were guilty of dissembling their religious belief. They lent their countenance to doctrines they had no faith in; and, that they might keep in with a certain party, they openly discountenanced what they were persuaded was the truth.

There would, perhaps, be nothing very surprising in all this, considering how many have done the same thing, were it not for the distinguished character and standing of the actors in this scene. Who were these, that were guilty of this piece of dishonesty? They were some of the Jewish christians, together with Barnabas, the fellow-laborer with St. Paul; and at the head of them, alas, was St. Peter himself! St. Paul states the whole matter, here, very plainly, and without a thought of concealment or apology. He says, 'When Peter was come to Antioch, I withstood him to the face, because he was to be blamed.' Then he proceeds to describe Peter's dissimulation; after which, he finally adds, 'the other Jews dissembled likewise, with him; insomuch that Barnabas also was carried away with their dissimulation. But when I saw that they walked not uprightly according to the truth of the gospel, I said unto Peter, before them all, If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?' Such was the course of dissembling, which these otherwise excellent and devout men pursued, at least for a while.

But let us not mistake the case, and imagine it worse than it really was. Surely, it was bad enough, without exaggeration. It was not with respect to the gospel, taken as a whole, that St. Peter and Barnabas and their associates prevaricated. No, indeed; far from that. They did not go to that extreme enormity. But it was with respect to one particular doctrine of the gospel, one of considerable importance, however, viz. the doctrine that the law of Moses was abrogated, and that Jews and Gentiles now stood on one and the same ground before God. This was the truth they dissembled.

The circumstances were the following. When St. Peter came to Antioch, where was a large number of Gentile converts, he at first associated freely with them, eat with them, and appeared to be one with them, according to the requisitions of the gospel, which made no distinction between the circumcised and the uncircumcised. So far, he acted honestly. But after a while, circumstances changed; and it is mortifying to relate, that, with them, St. Peter himself also changed. Certain Jewish converts from Jerusalem came up to the same place, who had been familiarly acquainted with Peter. He knew their prejudices; he knew their bigotry. He knew that, although believers in Christ, they still retained the old law of Moses together with the gospel, and that they regarded it an abomination to hold intercourse with Gentile christians, who had never been circumcised. All eyes were on Peter, to see how he would manage in this delicate juncture. Which side his understanding and his heart were on, was well known from his previous conduct; but, would he dare to brave the sour looks, the sanctimonious indignation, of his Jewish brethren? Alas! he who would cheerfully have sacrificed his life for the gospel, as a whole, was so weak, in this case, that he virtually denied one of its important doctrines, and sided with the Jewish converts, in order to retain their favor. Peter eat no more with the Gentile believers, but, as we are here told, 'withdrew and separated himself, fearing them which were of the circumcision.' He went over to the side of the bigots, shut himself up in their narrow circle, and no doubt practised to look like them, to act like them, and to speak like them; for when a man dissembles in such cases, he seldom does it by halves. He felt that sharp and suspicious eyes were on him, to mark the least deviation from the course prescribed by his jealous brethren.

But there were, also, other eyes upon him, than those of the Jewish christians. St. Paul was there, standing by, and looking on, all the while. He saw what Peter, and Barnabas, and the rest, were doing. And his honest heart could not away with such duplicity. Whosoever might practise it, he would not be silent; the more elevated and influential the offender, the more need of a corrective. He withstood Peter to his face; he rebuked him before them all.

From the stern and unsparing reprimand which St. Paul gave the dissemblers on this occasion, high as was their station, and excellent as were their characters in a general view,—from this, I think, we may, very clearly perceive in what light he regarded all temporizing, all prevaricating, about the particular truths that are important to the gospel. This suggestion will furnish the general topic, to which I now ask your attention; praying that God will enable us to address the subject to the understanding and to the conscience of every one who hears.

My friends, we see it was not enough, in St. Paul's opinion, that his brethren were faithful to the gospel, indefinitely as a whole, in distinction from other schemes of religion, or from no religion at all. He felt it a duty also, a sacred duty, to maintain that gospel in its purity, especially in its liberal character. He allowed none to shrink from the explicit avowal and maintenance of the several important truths it involved, if those truths were but understood. Any delinquency, here, was a subject of righteous admonition. O that his uncompromising spirit of straightforward honesty, of determined faithfulness, might be revived among us, at the present day! For there is, perhaps, no respect, in which professors of religion are more lacking in sound, thoroughgoing christian integrity, than in this one particular,—walking honestly according to the truth of the gospel. There certainly is reason to fear that a laxness of principle, in this respect, prevails to a wide extent among those of our own faith, as we shall have occasion to specify more at large; and I think we may see it also among others. I appeal to your own observation: has it not come to such a pass, that a great many, even among religious people, feel no sacredness whatsoever in the obligation to maintain the distinctive truths of the gospel, as they really understand them? I may bring the inquiry home to yourselves: Are not we, my brethren, apt to suppose that if we are only decided in our attachment to christianity in some form,—to christianity as distinguished, say, from Mohammedanism, heathenism, infidelity, &c. we fulfill our duty well enough, in this respect? As for the several developments of christianity, we treat it as a matter of little or no moral import, whether we give our aid and countenance to those principles which we think the true ones, or to others which we believe to be perversions. They all go under the general name, christianity; and that name sanctifies the whole to our use! sanctifies it to our conscience even, or rather to our indifference! The Arminian will give his attendance and his influence to support Calvinism, of which he does not believe a word; and this, too, when there is a church of his own faith, which it is just as practicable for him to attend. But circumstances, or to speak truly, considerations of profit, of fashion, of popular approval, or of worldly policy, which he calls by the more euphonious name, circumstances,—these are the apology he pleads in his justification. I presume it may be said, without giving offence, that the believer in the simple unity of God, often attaches himself to the Trinitarian cause, through such circumstances, and adheres to it, his life long. Many Universalists give themselves away, in like manner, to every other creed than their own, and never so much as lend their countenance, except in private, to what they really believe to be the truth of the gospel. So far as I have had opportunity to observe, the current of this dissembling sets almost invariably in one direction: the more liberal and enlightened fall back into the body of the bigoted and exclusive. Strange to say—in many cases, the more exclusive, the greater seems the attraction. Never is the general tendency the other way. Seldom, if ever, do the bigoted, or those of narrow faith, come forward to return the compliment, by patronizing the more liberal and enlightened. My brethren, why do we offer this premium to bigotry? for premium it unquestionably is, a standing reward held out perpetually to whatsoever class of men will shut their charities up within the narrowest compass, and deal the loudest damnation on all without. Why should we sacrifice honesty, in order to encourage these practices! It surely is not very creditable to court servitude at the hand of those who lord it over God's heritage.

'O,' it is sometimes said, 'they are all christians; mistaken, indeed, in some things; but it does not so much matter whom we connect ourselves with, if they be but good people; and we find good people in all denominations.'—Unquestionably. And we are bound to treat them as good people, to extend our fellowship to them as christians, if their character and lives are worthy. But what has that to do with the matter now under consideration? I trust we are not obliged to condemn others, or to abuse them, even if we do not follow with them, nor encourage them in their errors. Is it necessary to stop here, and show that we need not violate, in the least, the christian charity we owe to all our brethren, while we still remain true to our own convictions? The most inflexible integrity has no affinity with that sour and pugnacious sectarianism which is eternally denouncing, or quarrelling, or battling. We would have the different sects live together, like so many families in a neighborhood, not only in peace, but in friendship, and in the mutual interchange of good offices. We would have them treat each other as christians, and freely allow each others' claims to the service of our common Master. But shall we, therefore, make it a matter of indifference whether we ourselves support truth or error? So thought not St. Paul. Why did not he apologize, and connive, and say, 'O, Peter is a christian; Barnabas is a christian,'—(as they unquestionably were;) 'there are many good people among these Jewish brethren who came up from Jerusalem; and, therefore, let us humor their prejudices, let us bow down to their bigotry, and join with these worthies in dissembling our own more liberal sentiments.'

Do not mistake us, my brethren. We plead, as St. Paul ever pleaded, for the fullest exercise of charity. We say, with him, this is greater than all other spiritual gifts, greater than faith itself. But by charity, we mean the reality, not the mere pretence. We mean that pure spirit of heaven, whose eye is all light, at the same time her heart is all tenderness; who sees things as they are, knows there are such evils in our world as sin and error, and calls them by their right names, while she speaks in tones of gentleness and overflowing compassion. People do wrong to screen their sheer indifference to truth under her sacred name. Whom do they take charity to be? an idiot, with great moony eyes, and a stolid countenance, who knows only to babble 'good, good,' at everything she meets? This is not charity. This is stupidity; or worse, hypocrisy.

If there is any concern under heaven, in which dissimulation is more out of place than in all others, it is the subject of religion, in which we deal directly with our God, who searches the heart and tries the reins. Beware of practising falsely here, if you do not wish to destroy all sense of sacred obligation in your soul. There is no half-way. You must be thoroughly honest in your religion, or at length have no religion. That is the only alternative. For what can be plainer, than that he who allows himself habitually to swerve right and left, at random, in any of his professed and immediate relations with his Maker, has already unfastened the hold which Heaven has on his conscience? and that the whole is becoming, with him, a matter of mere expediency or manoeuvre? God will not be mocked, nor suffer the double-dealer to play a part before him, with impunity. If any should think our tone too severe; if any should think that indifference to the particular truths of the gospel, ought not to be dignified with so grave an admonition, so long as we adhere steadfast to christianity in general,—I beg them to consider this: that indifference, if it begin with those particulars, will not stop with them. Its nature is to increase by indulgence. It grows into a habit, a fixed state of the mind, and becomes general; like a mortification that spreads wider and wider, unless cured, and finally carries death into the vital parts. The same apathy, which began with disregarding the important details, naturally grows into equal indifference towards the whole system itself of christianity, and ends in a readiness to receive anything, in its stead, which the wisdom or the fashion of the day may be inclined to substitute. At any rate, this is the history of the matter, as it has actually operated, in all ages; and it is its natural history. Did we need confirmation, we might have it, in what we see taking place around us, in our own day.

We have said, there is a lack of christian principle, in these respects, among those of our own faith, as well as among others. Be not surprised, my brethren, if we should say, there is more lack among them, than in some other quarters. What multitudes of believers in God as the Savior of all men, lend their public influence to support doctrines of partial salvation, and even of endless misery! How many of this description are known all over the land, in almost every city, village, and town! many, in places where there are societies of our faith, from which they nevertheless stand aloof; many, again, where they themselves are numerous enough to form societies, and able to provide the regular ministration of the truth they believe, but dishonor by their neglect. It is a melancholy consideration. I appeal to you, my hearers. You are from different parts of the country; and I would ask you, one by one, If all, in your respective cities or towns, who believe that God will eventually reconcile all to himself, were to come out and walk uprightly according to the truth of the gospel, how different an aspect would it put on the condition of religious affairs in your vicinity! I think it a well founded remark, (I know it is a common one,) that there are more believers in this truth, who are attached to other professions, than to their own. How is it, in the place of your residence? how is it, in the whole circle of your knowledge? Now, this is a very wrong state of things. It ought not to be palliated, nor passed over in silence. There is danger, there is ruin to the public, in such an extended practice of dealing on false capital, if we may use the phrase. It cannot continue without bringing on a crisis, a wide-spread bankruptcy of everything that pertains to religious integrity. And it ought to be distinctly understood, that, as disastrous as the consequences must prove, both to public principle and to public confidence, they can fall nowhere so heavily, as on those bodies, in the christian community, which have the misfortune to embrace the largest share of such hollow professors.

Let us look into the motives that usually lead to the dissimulation practised in this matter. As we have already intimated, the cause which lies at the bottom of the whole, is indifference to all religious truth; for did people regard the truth as they ought, no motives whatsoever could avail to bring about so extensive a defection. Here, perhaps, many, who are implicated, would be ready to protest, and say, What! are we not cordially attached to the christian religion? None more profoundly revere its institutions, than we; none are more prompt in attending, none more liberal in supporting them; none more faithful to enforce its requisitions. And are not these sufficient proofs of our earnestness? Yes, my friends; of your earnestness, perhaps. But have you ever considered how much of this earnestness springs from other sources than religious principle? Suppose a change in all the circumstances of life; suppose the standard of fashion, even in the soberer part of community, to which you belong, required you to renounce the very name and forms of christianity; suppose that, in order to stand well in society, and to bring up your families in a reputable way, it were necessary to discard all those institutions; how much of your earnestness would then remain? Be assured, if circumstances can induce you habitually to dissemble or compromise your faith in the grand results of the gospel, the same motives, did they only bear in another direction, would make you shun all connection with christianity itself. And your seeming attachment, with which you now so complacently flatter yourselves, would then appear in its real character, as the covert suggestion of selfish policy and worldly considerations.

To proceed, however, to the particular motives that operate on this indifference, to draw so many away from walking uprightly according to the truth of the gospel. The most common, perhaps, and influential motive, in the case, is an exorbitant love of what is sometimes called popularity, an ambition to rank in the more fashionable classes. With the aspiring, of all ages, this passion exerts a great force, but particularly with the young. And to the vain and inconsiderate, whether old or young, it seems so easy to creep into favor, by a little dexterous shifting of their relations, by sacrificing an obnoxious name, and by putting on a new badge, that they can hardly be dissuaded from making the experiment,—it is so cheap. There seems but a single step to honors and respect. It is only to enrol one's self with the envied ranks, to look as they look, to say as they say, and to profess as they profess,—what can be a shorter road to distinction, or a cheaper method of rising in the world! Ah, my friends, be not deceived by such shallow illusions as these. I shall not ask you, at present, to consider the aggravated guilt of tampering with your religious convictions in order to gain the favor of the world, even supposing it could be obtained in this way; I shall not say how insatiable, how greedy beyond the possibility of satisfying it, does the passion for popular applause become, when we once abandon ourselves to it. But if there be any here, who are tempted by this motive, whose name is legion, I would address myself only to what they can feel,—to their puerile ambition. I would say to them, in all frankness, You are taking the wrong course to the very objects you have in view. You are sacrificing that independence of soul, and that integrity of character, which alone can ensure you respect, or give you weight in community. If you wish others to respect you, respect yourselves. Do not, indeed, make an ostentatious show of independence,—do not be termagants; but neither be parasites, to cringe, or fawn, or court. Ask any man, who has lived long in the world, and watched the course of things, in this respect; he will tell you, that when he has seen people sacrifice their principles, or withdraw from their maintenance, in order to raise themselves in society, he has seldom, if ever, known them to succeed, in the end. For a while, perhaps, they might be encouraged with a show of favor, and even of promotion; because their service was wanted, or their flattery grateful. But it is out of the power of human nature not to despise a time-server, or to refrain from treating him as a menial. When he has done all the work, for which his baseness fitted him, then he is discarded at once; and even while he is retained, and paid in smiles as his wages, confidence and respect are out of the question. How can a double-dealer be trusted? or an obsequious slave be respected, though he be adorned with the entire livery of his masters? He began by fawning; and that is the business they will keep him at. It is thus God takes the foolish in their own craftiness. I appeal to all who hear me, Have you ever found that an open, independent, conscientious course, even though unpopular, lowered you eventually even in the public estimation? No, never. I beg you to look around, also, and see how the experiment results in the case of such as have tried the opposite methods. A little discernment, my friends, a little practical sense, would lay bare the fallacy which has duped its thousands, and strip this motive of all its power to mislead.

There is another class of motives which not unfrequently alienate individuals, and impel them to forsake the maintenance of the truth; I mean such as arise from personal resentments and dislikes, or from the prejudices awakened in public commotions. One man withdraws, out of spite to his neighbor, or in order to show his anger; another grows pettish because affairs are not managed according to his wisdom or caprice; another is offended, because the interests of some political party, or moral association, have been either too much regarded or disregarded. And in all these cases, the first step, with many, is to revenge the offence on their religious connection. This is the first thing to be given up; all other connections they value too highly to relinquish. I speak not of the multitudes who never pretend any decided attachments of a religious kind; we might, perhaps, expect them to take this course. But when professed christians set the example, they who have themselves stood forward as advocates of the truth, it is mortifying indeed. Is it possible that they do not know what they are saying to the world? Do they not know that they are exposing their shame before the eyes of all men? proclaiming, that the very least matter of their regard is their religion, which they are ready to sacrifice for any and every other object with which it may seem to interfere! We will not dwell, however, on these particulars.

My brethren, we profess to be followers of him who 'came into the world to bear witness to the truth.' Well did our Master adhere to this great object of his mission, through all his course. He knew, as well as we, what temptations were; but never did the frowns of the world, nor its enticements, make him swerve, for a moment. He chose destitution, he preferred to become 'a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief,' to be 'despised and rejected of men,' rather than to withhold the truth, or modify it in the least to popular prejudice, although he knew that his faithfulness would cost him his life. For the truth, he patiently endured 'the contradictions of sinners,' the treachery of his own apostle, and the groveling ignorance of all his disciples; for this he spent himself in toil and mortal danger, and finally suffered the cruel death of the cross. I need not say to you, that one of the most prominent traits in his character, was his inflexible devotion to the truth. And are we, indeed, his followers? for nothing can be plainer, than that we, too, must be governed by that spirit of our Master, or we are none of his. Shall we dissemble, and yet claim to be his disciples? It is scarcely a figure of speech to say, that his voice yet calls to us, from the scenes of his earthly sufferings, from the waters of Galilee, from the streets of Jerusalem, from Gethsemane, and from Calvary, 'Be ye faithful even unto death.' Amen.

SUNRISE.

BY MRS. C. W. HUNT.

HAIL, Aurora! thou art rising,
Gloriously from out the sea;
Flinging from thy shining tresses,
Sparkling drops o'er leaf and tree.

On before thee like an army
Are the fleecy cloudlets driven;
And the hoary folds of darkness,
As a gossamer are riven.

O'er the broad and waveless ocean,
Dazzling smiles of gladness rest;
And the mountain top is wearing
Sunlight like a golden crest.

Lofty spire and gilded turret,
Gleam like meteors in thy rays;
Forest-aisles and groves are swelling
With the feathered minstrels lays.

Up to heaven the lark is winging,
Carolling in merry glee,
And the eagle from his eyrie,
Soars aloft to welcome thee.

From the peasant's lowly dwelling,
See the curling smoke arise;
While the wreathing mists are lifting,
Like the breath of sacrifice.

Countless numbers thou art waking,
Sunny youth—and shadowy age;
Opening to all breathing nature,
One divinely glowing page.

Humble roof—and gorgeous palace,
Are alike thy place of rest;
Hope and joy to all thou'rt bearing,
Lowly heart—and princely breast.

Hail! thou art a glorious emblem
Of the Father's boundless love;
Lighting up earth's darkest places,
Lifting all to thee above.

EARLY CULTURE.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

'Train up a child in the way he should go.' SOLOMON.

'How happy are you, my dear Mrs. Loring, in having such dutiful children,' said Mrs. Brown to her neighbor, one morning. 'Your little daughter, Rosetta, is always assisting you, though younger than my second girl, who never does an hour's work from morning to night. And your eldest daughter, Ann, has taught school these two years, and is making herself both useful and eminent; while mine, alas! is fluttering about like a butterfly, now pleased with one piece of finery, now fretting about another, until my patience is quite worn out. It seems to me she will never be pleased with anything, or adopt any settled rule of conduct. I do not see why your children should be so much better than mine.'

'I cannot suppose they are better,' said Mrs. Loring, 'I am sure your children are intelligent, and pleasing. Your little daughter, Maria, is a beautiful, sprightly creature, pray how old is she?'

'She is nearly ten.'

'I suppose by this time she does all her own knitting,' said Mrs. Loring.

'O no, she cannot knit at all. It is much easier you know, to hire it done, than to spend time in learning so young a child. She will learn easier by and by.'

'Perhaps her time is all taken up in study.'

'She attends school, but not too steadily. It would be too much like drudgery to keep her confined there.'

'Have you not yet begun to learn her that some useful employment ought to occupy a part of each day?'

'O no, I do not interfere with her pastimes. It is well that children should play much, it makes them so cheerful. Would you have me put my girls to hard work, as if they were to earn their own bread?'

'I certainly would not prevent the pastimes of children, yet, as I consider useful labor perfectly consistent with the refinements and accomplishments of a lady; I think it best to habituate the young mind to look upon labor as necessary to their happiness, and the proper development of character. Besides, how can we know that our daughters may not be obliged to toil for their living?'

Mrs. Brown looked thoughtful. 'Fortune is variable,' she at length said, 'and my daughters may indeed be obliged to labor; but it seems hard to make slaves of one's children, when there is no prospect of their coming to want?'

'Not slaves surely. That cannot be called slavery which teaches us to blend the useful with the agreeable; to feel that we are of some real worth in the world, that we are useful as well as agreeable to those we love. Now do you candidly think my eldest daughter a greater slave to her employment than yours is to fashion and her love of dress?'

'No indeed. Ann appears ever contented and cheerful, with a smile and a kind word for every one; and Louise is never satisfied, though I take every pains to leave no wish ungratified.'

'Well,' said Mrs. Loring, 'I suppose you gave the same course of instruction to your eldest daughters that you are bestowing upon your younger; and though you have praised mine so highly, I do not think she deserves more praise than yours. She is the same wild scion by nature, and cultivation has made the difference.'

'Pray then teach me your secret of education, that I may try it upon Maria before she is past teaching.'

'I am perfectly willing to impart all the information I possess, and give the credit where it is due. You remember my maiden aunt who formerly resided with me.'

'Yes, but I must confess I never fancied her much, she was so odd from the rest of my acquaintance. I am sure your daughter could never love her, she was so severe, and always restraining her innocent sportiveness.'

'And yet she did love her, and her love was founded on sincere respect for her character. My aunt had long been engaged in teaching youth, that laborious, yet delightful occupation; and had learned by experience that the heart long retains the bias it receives in the genial spring-time of childhood. She did not disapprove mirthfulness, save when it tended towards constant levity. It is true, as governess of my child during my long years of illness, that she would not allow her to romp through the fields in boisterous sport, or skate by moonlight upon a glade of ice, to the imminent danger of breaking her neck. She gave her habits of industry, by carefully blending amusement and instruction with the useful tasks upon which she employed her tiny hands; and awakened in her breast that feeling of honorable pride which ever attends the accomplishment of any useful or amusing design. She stored her mind with knowledge too. She would walk with her in the fields and groves, and bid her listen to the wild, mysterious melody of the many-voiced anthems, ever pealing forth from nature's sounding organs. She learned her to listen with delight to the early carol of the wild-bird, as it mounts upward in the misty morning twilight, toward the golden gates of the East, to warble its hymn of praise in the ear of the Most High. She would give her lessons upon a leaf, or a flower, until her young spirit bowed with reverence before that great First Cause, who kindled the fires of the day-king, and set his flaming orb as the centre of our system, who laid the beams of the vast ethereal chambers, and unfurled the gorgeous canopy of mystic azure, where suns and systems wheel their stated rounds through the vast immensity of space—who hung the earth in her golden balance, and piled up the vast rocky thrones where grandeur sits in solemn majesty, while round his brow the cloudy garlands weave their fantastic wreaths—who bids the magic hand of Spring unlock the ice-bound fountains, spread out the green carpet of the meadows, and woo the sweet-scented flowrets to unveil their blushing petals. These sentiments of devotion had a tendency to check the thoughtless levity of childhood, but it made her none the less cheerful; for her governess taught her from the great volume of nature, the power and wisdom of Him who rolls on the vast wheels of eternal ages, and guides with unerring hand the countless spheres that sail in order and harmony along the trackless oceans of space; and then led her by the light of his revealed love to place her perfect trust in Him, who is the fountain of all goodness.'

'But my dear Mrs. Loring, I never heard that your aunt was a christian. I always heard she was an unbeliever.'

'Her religion was not of a kind that needed to be proclaimed to the world,' said Mrs. L. 'It was of that quiet, unobtrusive kind that shuns the glare of ostentation, and displays itself more in kindness of action, than in words. "I know my own heart," she would say, "and the light and strength that is given me to combat with sin; but I may not judge the heart of another, its passions and temptations; nor can I say how far he may stand condemned or acquitted in the sight of Him who ponders the secrets of all hearts,"'

With such views and feelings, her too sensitive heart would not allow her to make open professions of religion, but her life was a severer satire upon vice than was ever written.

Mrs. Brown thanked her friend for the useful hints she had given her, and resolved to practise upon them. And indeed it was becoming necessary for her happiness that she should begin to lay the foundation of character in at least one of her children. She was the mother of two sons and three daughters. She was a kind mother; if attending to all the fancied wants of a child, allowing it to roll in the streets for spite, and bestowing sweetmeats and sugar plums to soothe its ruffled temper, constitute a kind mother. But she had never supposed it devolved upon her to train the minds of her sons in youth, to fit them for the active duties of life. She was well pleased when they were old enough to play men in miniature, and as they were fine appearing boys, she never once doubted that the sons of the wealthy Mr. Brown, would, as a matter of course, become men of respectability, without any effort on her part. She never cultivated the garden of their minds, thinking that the plants of virtue, honor, and benevolence, would grow spontaneously; but while she slept an enemy sowed the tares of vice. And when they were of the ages of twenty-three and twenty-five, they were devotees of fashion, good judges of dress, but knew no more of the industry and calculation necessary for obtaining a livelihood, than the little boy who throws stones into the river, that he may count the bubbles as they rise.

About this time Mr. Brown passed from the busy, scenes of this life to the lonely mansions where silence and darkness spread their gloomy pavilion. Of course the funeral ceremonies were imposing, and the mourning deep, so far as crape and color were concerned; but when the burial was past, and the world began to look for traces of heart-sorrow, and reflection; then the frivolity and dissipation of sentiment, appeared. The sons and two eldest daughters were more gay and splendid than before. They were the very ton of fashion, and their splendor at church formed a subject for the comments of the unthinking during the week.

Maria was now the only companion and solace of her mother, who had turned to good account the advice of Mrs. Loring, and attended herself to the formation of her mind; answering judiciously all her questions, and giving her that instruction in her useful and amusing labors which it should ever be a mother's privilege to impart; and by becoming a companion for her child, securing in return the companionship of that child. O how much do mothers misjudge of their own true happiness, and the welfare of their lovely charges, who carelessly entrust them with uninterested persons, that they may be free from the task of watchfulness over them. At the age of thirty the eldest son married a splendid little beauty who had displayed her graces to some advantage at a series of parties which he attended. The younger son soon after absconded, to escape the opprobrium and punishment due to deeds of villainy.

The constant outlay for continued scenes of dissipation, with the careless manner in which business had been managed, soon brought ruin to the splendid mansion of the Browns. This was a sorrowful stroke to the poor mother, who now painfully felt the evil of not inuring her children to habits of industry, and teaching them in their youth the value of time. She now regretted that she had neglected to warn them of the quicksands that abound in the streams of indulgence, and indecision. She had formerly neglected to discipline their minds, and fortify them against reverses of fortune; and now in their utter helplessness, they repaid her ill-judged kindness with murmurings, scorn, and ingratitude. The two eldest girls could not content themselves with this reverse of fortune. They knew not how to make themselves useful, and moreover they lacked the will, for they had never been taught to live for any other purpose than the gratification of their own selfish whims and caprices. But Maria was comparatively happy. She mourned, to be sure, for the sad reverse to which her mother was reduced, but being inured to active habits, the blow fell less heavily on her than upon her indolent sisters. She now found that she could repay in a measure the love and care which her mother had bestowed upon her in the helpless, infantile years; and that the sums that had been lavished upon her education, could now be partly refunded, and moreover that the use of her talents would not only serve to beguile the hours that would otherwise hang heavily on her hands, but would give her a sense of independence, which was far more gratifying to her than to spend her time in listless fashionable nothingness. With the proceeds of the sale of her drawings, she administered to the support and comfort of her mother; and she solicited, and soon obtained a number of pupils to instruct in ornamental needle-work, in which she was a proficient.

Time sped on with his usual swiftness, and two years had already passed, since Maria, in a humble cottage, had been the only solace and support of her widowed mother, and notwithstanding her poverty, she often found means to give comfort and consolation to those more wretched than herself.

At this time, George Loring, who had been some years absent, came on a visit to his parents. He expressed a wish to see his old schoolmate, Adela Brown, who lived with her mother and sisters about two miles distant, and accordingly a visit was planned, and notice sent to Mrs. B. Evening saw the little party apparently happy in the reminiscences of past scenes of mirth, and school-day pastimes; but there was one, who, notwithstanding her apparent ease, was the prey of chagrin. Miss Adela, in better years, had deemed herself far superior to her playmates the Loring, because they were not always on the highest scale of fashion in dress or appearance, and this to a weak mind, was sufficient evidence of inferiority. Mr. Loring, the elder, was a plain, sensible man, of small, but independent fortune, who made no effort to swim upon the tide of popularity; but wrought steadily with his sons, and took good care that they should learn to manage farming and other business, and have their daily tasks neatly accomplished. In her girlhood Adela had repelled the slight attentions of George; but when Rosetta Loring informed her that this visit was made on purpose to please George, who wished to see her, the rainbow visions of hope danced in the brightening vista of the future; for George had become a wealthy merchant, and she began to hope that she might again mingle in the butterfly circles of fashionable dissipation, and escape what she termed the miserable plodding of Maria and her mother. But she saw, or fancied she did, that when George addressed Maria, he displayed a greater degree of timidity than he seemed to feel in conversing with the rest. She could hardly forgive him, a rich gentleman as he was, that he should condescend to notice, and praise the ornamental work of Maria; for she was so unfashionable as to continue her work in this familiar visit. Business urged him to make a short stay at home, yet he found time to pay a number of visits to his old neighbors, and Miss Adela seemed to be the centre of attraction. At one time, however, as she and her eldest sister came in from a walk, they found George in close confab with Maria, who appeared to be laboring under a slight attack of palpitation of heart, attended with hectic. What was the exciting subject of their tete a tete, we cannot presume to say, as Maria declined giving any account of the matter. But after this, she was in the habit of receiving letters from the city where George resided, which she contrived to read and answer without her sisters looking over her shoulder. And when the golden sun looked brightly down from the pensive sky of autumn, upon the rich and glowing fruits, and many-colored foliage of the landscape, George returned to his native village, and made Maria his happy bride.

She had at first refused to marry, as she could not think of leaving her mother desolate and helpless. And desolate she would be without Maria, for her eldest son had become an inebriate, and a nuisance to society; and her two eldest daughters were mere pensioners upon the skill and industry of Maria. But this objection was soon removed by the assurance of George, that his Maria's mother and sisters should always find a welcome home with him.

The eldest sister continued to reside with Maria at our latest advices, but the scornful, querulous Miss Adela succeeded at last in attracting the attention of a gentleman of no particular calling, and is now the miserable, neglected wife of a dissipated gambler. Mrs. Brown, at a good old age, passed from the varying scenes of this earth to that undiscovered country from whence no traveler returns; and to her last day thanked heaven for the valuable advice given her by her excellent, but humble friend, Mrs. Loring.

THE STORMY NIGHT.

INSCRIBED TO E. W.

Do you remember how it stormed,
That wintry night we watched together,
Upon that old gray rock which formed
Our only shelter from the weather?
How snug and cosey was the cave,
Which kept us safe from wind and wave!

How wildly shrieked the north-east wind!
How madly roared the foaming ocean!
How reckless went we forth to bind
Our boat amidst the fierce commotion!
For what cared we for wind or snow?
We both desired the storm might blow.

We loved that dark tempestuous night;
We felt, you know, our spirits higher,
Than if we'd been where eyes were bright,
Around some pleasant, social fire.
We had no longing wish to be
Elsewhere than by that roaring sea.

And what are storms of human life?
Not things to fear, but things to cherish;
The soul grows strong amidst their strife,
Without them we should waste and perish:
Let's take our place on some high rock,
And brave the tempest's rudest shock.

FOOLISHNESS OF PREACHING.

I APPREHEND that the Scriptures term the preaching of the gospel foolishness, for two reasons. First. That unto those who are filled with the selfish wisdom of the world, its simplicity and straight-forwardness appear foolish. The humility which it teaches would be, by the children of the world, termed baseness; and the hopes which it cherishes would be, by the wise philosopher, considered delusive. Second. The means appear disproportionate to the end.—Preaching is designed for the salvation of mankind; and those who have found bolts and bars and standing armies insufficient to secure the morality of their fellow-men, cannot understand how simple preaching, being without the authority of the magistrate and unsupported by the sword, cannot only make men moral, but also devout and godlike.

With regard to the objections brought by the worldly wise, we find that the Greeks were not the only persons who regarded the preaching of the gospel as foolishness. Many whom the world has considered wise men—men of great genius and of extraordinary powers of mind, of great reading and research—have looked upon the gospel as a string of silly stories. On the other hand, men of equal intellect and learning, have revered the gospel, and written in its defence. We may be assured, therefore, that there is nothing in human learning and intellect which is necessarily opposed to the truths of the gospel. In so far as human learning is sound, it runs parallel with the truth. Surely there is nothing in the multiplication table, or in Geometry, or in the Newtonian philosophy, which contradicts the gospel of Jesus Christ. It is when men endeavor to fathom the deep things of God by the exercise of the same sort of reasoning and research which they apply to earthly matters, and when they place low selfish cunning in opposition to the simple and plain requirements of the gospel, that the artless simplicity and super-human revelations of the Divine will and purpose become in men's eyes as foolishness.

The wisdom of God and the spiritual knowledge of his kingdom, are unlike the wisdom of man and the knowledge of mere worldly matters. God is, of course, a higher being—a being distinct in his nature from the human creature; because he is essentially spirit, whereas man is bound by the chains of flesh and blood. Being partly bestial, he has no right to judge of the things of the spiritual kingdom, by the hearing of his ear, or the sight of his eyes. To be fleshly minded is death. The wisdom of the world cannot, then, be applied to the deep things of God—because it is carnal, selfish, and perishable. Preaching is foolishness to the carnal mind, because it is spiritual, and cannot be grasped by human reason. If an ox could speak, he would call our schools of learning, the fine arts, and our admiration of nature's beauties foolishness—simply because he can know nothing of mental pleasures, and the satisfaction which we derive from the pursuit of knowledge. The ox would think a wisp of hay of more importance than Harper's Family Library, and the swine would prefer a trough filled with offals to the most luxurious country-seat. When the intellect of man is prostituted to worldly purposes, it bears the same relation to the wisdom of the spiritual kingdom which the appetites of the swine bear to the intellectual desires of man. How has worldly wisdom been applied to the things of the heavenly kingdom? By endeavoring to subject the philosophy of spirit to the philosophy of human expediency. Men have found that in order to overcome cold, they must apply heat, and that in order to stop the course of a stream, they must build a dam across it. So in their worldly governments—they hold up the sword of the law as a terror to evil doers. They do this to preserve themselves from harm —to save themselves from the inroads of thieves and robbers—to preserve, by physical force, the harmony of society. Hence those who are appointed to enforce the laws are termed peace officers.

By applying the same kind of wisdom to spiritual things, they have supposed they could enforce obedience to the gospel, and make men religious, by holding up an endless hell, in terrorem. This is the wisdom of this world. This is the cunning of the carnal mind. Thus have they made void the commandments of God, and have instituted a law of wrath and vengeance in the place of a law of love—supposing God to be such an one as themselves, that he should be angry. But this has proved miserable philosophy, and has never made a christian, since it was first taught. It is one of those 'damnable heresies,' which come in when the church retrograded, and fell from its original brightness—and eagerly was it grasped at by rulers and potentates, by Popes and domineering priests, and by all interested men, who desired to exercise unlimited authority over the consciences of their fellow-creatures. Many minds have been ruined by it, in these latter days. God has been defamed and dishonored; while the barbarous, the tyrannical, and the intolerant, have used this cruel and diabolical engine in order to harrow the nerves of the timid, and bring them into subjection to themselves, both soul and body. Had the Apostles taught the doctrine of endless misery, the Pharisees, the wise Greeks, and other children of this world, would not have regarded it in the light of foolishness; for the end aimed at would have seemed to them proportionate to the means used for its attainment. Their barbarous policy would have been satisfied with the threat of an endless hell as an inducement to a holy life, and they would have seen no folly in such a system. We have many such persons in these days of greater light; but they hold out no real inducement to their fellows to lead a holy life.

This invention is the very poorest one that can be imagined; and when short-sighted human wisdom thus clashes with the plain revelations of Scripture, it proves that the foolishness of preaching still remains foolishness to those who would fain eke out something to give temper and pungency to its character.

But the great Author of the Scriptures knew much better what was good for us, than we know, and our wisdom has been confounded, inasmuch as the inventions of men have wholly failed to bring about the proposed effect. No doubt that when the first preachers of hell-fire thundered forth their impious threatenings, they imagined they were going to drive people into the christian church in droves. If the fear of hell has had this effect, the question arises, were they any better men and women after having been driven within the pale, than they were before? It is true that they might have been baptized; they might have subscribed to what was called the christian creed, and given of their substance to support what was called the christian church—and now having turned 'christians,' they burned with hatred toward every one who did not hold the same tenets with themselves. One would think that such a conversion might have been dispensed with without any loss. Yet, although the Inquisition is abolished, and Popery is at a low ebb, and although we have no established religion in this country, yet I fear such conversions are nearly as common as they ever were. But why should these converts hate their fellow creatures? Simply because the wisdom of man has invented a place of torment which the foolishness of gospel preaching never had the wit to think of!

This very convenient, but somewhat dangerous ally, was not pressed into the service of the church until it had discovered that human wisdom was better than heavenly wisdom, and that the sword and spear were very convenient ministers for the execution of wrath upon the ungodly, and for the conversion of infidels. It was then that an endless hell was brought into the field, and a God of love was represented as the arch-destroyer of souls. When the heretic had actually expired amid the flames, and the priests could work him no more injury, they consoled themselves with the reflection that he would drop from their flames directly into a hotter fire where he would writhe in endless torments. Such are the merciful and comforting doctrines of the gospel of peace, of hope, of joy, of charity, of love unspeakable! How well is it calculated to inspire our hearts with sincere and honest love to God, to be assured and convinced that, unless we love him, we shall burn for infinite ages, and that of our torment there will be no end!

THE SPIRIT'S REST.

BY IONE.

'There remaineth a rest for the people of God.'

AND shall that rest be mine?
Am I accepted of redeeming grace?
For peace withheld am I no more to pine,
While love and faith and hope my pathway trace?

Where shall that rest be found?
Show me the haven from life's billowy main!
Direct my bark, for rocks and storms surround,
And I am lost, if faith cannot sustain!

When shall that peace descend
To the far depths of my awakened soul?
When shall the smile of God my path attend,
And all my weakness, all my fears control?

When shall I cease to faint
For freer draughts from Heaven's unsparing well?

When shall the earnest voice of my complaint,
Win for me strength my spirit's foes to quell?

I know by many tears,
By the vain yearnings of a heart unfilled,
By the remembrance of unhallowed years,
That not on earth shall sorrow's waves be stilled!

Lead thy bewildered child,
Father Almighty, to the home prepared!
She trusts in thee, through Him, the undefiled,
Who all her conflicts, all her griefs hath shared!

Upon that perfect rest,
May I but enter when my toil is o'er,
Then shall my spirit, sanctified and blest,
Sing of redeeming love forevermore!

SARAH SEYMOUR AND MRS. CARTER.

BY MIMOSA.

'DOMESTIC happiness, thou only bliss
Of Paradise, that has survived the fall!
Though few now taste thee, unimpaired and pure,
Or tasting, long enjoy thee.' COWPER.

'If solid happiness we prize,
Within our breast this jewel lies;
And they are fools who roam:
The world has nothing to bestow;
From our own selves our joys must flow,
And that dear hut our home.' COTTON.

'MRS. WINTHROP, do you remember our friend Sarah? She lives in town.'

'I do affectionately remember her—dear, good girl! with her pleasant humor and elastic spirit. You spoke of her living in town,—is she married?'

'She was married ten years ago; but her husband's tastes and ideas are so different from hers that she is no longer the gay, happy Sarah that gladdened our youthful days. Beloved as she was, she made a poor match, and is, consequently, unhappy.'

'She is fortunate, then, in having her early friend near, to comfort her; you can lighten her sorrows, and bring back the smiles which formerly danced on her lips. She, doubtless, sets a high value on your society.'

'Indeed, Mrs. Winthrop, I rarely see her. After her arrival, I called on her, but she seemed changed, and her situation was different from the one she formerly occupied; so the pleasure I anticipated from my visit was not realized. Besides, she goes out but little; she devotes her time to domestic cares, therefore we are, comparatively, strangers. Once, who could have thought, Sarah would become commonplace and uninteresting? I think it is her husband's fault; it seems he has broken her spirit.'

'Mrs. Carter, I think the world misunderstood Sarah's character; it regarded her as a butterfly, fluttering among flowers in a summer atmosphere, or as a gilded insect of fashion. But in her heart were deep feelings, and a well of living water strengthening every virtue that beautifies and endears domestic life. I cannot think Sarah's home is unhappy; if her husband is morose, her gentleness and good nature will not fail to smooth and soften his temper.'

'This, Mrs. Winthrop, is not the cause of her sorrows. Before her marriage, she was accustomed to the luxuries and refinement of high life; her style of living is now characterised by frugality; her house is small, plainly furnished, and Sarah with her own hands attends to the wants of her family. She was once a brilliant ornament of society; but from this proud eminence she has descended, and in her present humility, she is divested of her splendor and her charms. Is not this enough to make any woman miserable?'

'I think not, Mrs. Carter; Sarah's heart fed not on sensual food, its affections were not placed on the things you mention, and it could not grieve for the loss of them. Her aspirations were not satisfied with wearing the drapery of life. Of all on earth, that only, which is the image of its Maker, the soul exalted, pure, spiritual, received her homage, and with this she had joyful communion; nor was her reverence withheld when the divine emanation was shrouded in clay of a coarse kind or of a rough surface. I yet hope to find Sarah happy, as she always desired to be, in the society of loving ones. We must remember that happiness is not found in the excitement of crowds; it is not the child of affluence, it springs not from external circumstances.'

Mrs. Carter did not reply; for a little boy that had been out, playing on the wet ground, with dirty frock and hands approached to whisper something into her ear. Fearing he might soil her nice dress, Mrs. C. put out her hand to prevent his coming near. Thus repulsed, the little fellow retreated with a sad look, and his mother said to her visitor, 'How dirty boys do get,—I dread to have mine come near me.'

Late in the afternoon, these ladies walked out to see Sarah. Her dwelling was situated apart from the bustle and din of business, and surrounded by scenery of enchanting beauty. She received them courteously, and entertained them with her usual unaffected politeness and warm hearted simplicity. Mrs. Carter had determined to find Sarah exquisitely wretched; but she was forced to admit, that the tranquil happiness she enjoyed, was preferable to the pleasure found in fashionable society. A chubby little girl, just from a ramble, ran in with her apron full of wild flowers, and having bound together some butter-cups, clover-tops and daisies, she put them into her mother's hand and extended her arms for a kiss. Mrs. Seymour was answering a remark of Mrs. Carter's, but she bent her neck to the little one, and it was instantly encircled in its arms and warmly pressed, while kiss after kiss was applied to the maternal cheek till the little darling laughed in the fullness of its joy. 'Baby, too,' she said, and covered the infant's lips with lavish kisses.

A brother who had been guide to little Lucy's rambles, now came forward to kiss the baby, and seeing the attention of his mother's visitors directed to a passing carriage, he placed an arm about her neck, and imprinted a kiss on her forehead. His head rested one moment on her shoulder, while he spoke something in a low voice; she replied, and he left the room, followed by Lucy. The ladies had a glimpse of this; but fearing to wound the lad's delicacy, they kept their faces averted till he retired. This manifestation of filial love, was a new idea to Mrs. Carter. Her children never approached her unless they wanted to complain of injuries, or make demands for some indulgence. For any pleasure, often on mere pretence, they forsook her society—if such her forbidding coldness and repulsive dignity could be called—and associated with it no ideas of enjoyment. But the affections of childhood will cling to some object. They would, if not repelled, wind around the parent's heart, with fond and close embrace; but if they find it cold and uncongenial, with instinctive aversion they turn from it to something that offers them sympathy; or, failing in this, they twine their tendrils about the weeds and thistles in their vicinity, with a tenacity which only brings them nearer the ground. The delicate respect and tender affection evinced for Mrs. Seymour by her beloved children, brought a sigh from Mrs. Carter, as she thought of her own little ones avoiding her, or sent from her presence on frivolous pretexts, that she might be rid of their noise. To Mrs. Winthrop, the visit was delightful; she felt that Sarah, thus blessed, must be happy,—that the husband of such a woman, the father of such children could not be regardless of their happiness. Before leaving home, Mrs. Carter had limited their visit to half an hour; but hour after hour passed, and left them talking with Sarah. At length, warned by the descending shades of night, they departed.

'You are now convinced of your error, Mrs. Carter; you feel that Sarah is happy, truly happy,' said Mrs. Winthrop.

'In her family she appears to be; but confining herself at home, she cannot enjoy society as we all ought to do.'

'The husband, children, and the intimate friends she spoke of, are the choicest society, and should satisfy a sensible woman. A wife knows not the sacrifice she makes, when she exchanges the confidence and affection of her husband for the glitter of fashionable life, the bustle of artificial society,—when she barter the heart's purest, most elevated enjoyment, for the pride of equipage, the vanity of external attractions. Mrs. Seymour's neat, rural habitation, is a domestic paradise; she is the presiding spirit of goodness, dispensing to all about her, their portion of bliss. Call her not wretched,—misery dares not look into a place so hallowed by the pervading influence of unobtrusive, watchful love; believe me, it leaves no dark foot-prints in Sarah's home.'

'Well,' replied Mrs. Carter, 'we cannot all be happy in one way; with my disposition, I could not enjoy a life so secluded as Mrs. Seymour's; misery would sit by me all day long.'

'It must first receive license to become your companion; we are rarely miserable against our wills. Happiness and misery spring up around us; we may extract either from the common objects and common occurrences of life. You have not drawn your happiness from domestic life; you have plucked its gaudy blossoms from public haunts by the wayside, and suffered weeds, dark, overshadowing weeds, to grow around your threshold, to flourish around your hearth, to cluster around your table. They have concealed and robbed of nutriment the germs of bliss which God placed there for your culture and your comfort. Has not the happiness gathered from the barren soil of fashionable follies, faded in your hand? has it not been as a shadow in your grasp? does it satisfy the affections or high aspirations of your heart? Oh, Mrs. Carter, you have left the real object which was near you, and chased a phantom, beautiful, indeed, at a distance, but retiring in mockery at your approach, like the illusive spring on a desert of burning sand.'

Mr. Carter, coming from his store, joined the ladies just before they reached his house, and the conversation was turned to other subjects. During the few days of Mrs. Winthrop's subsequent stay at Mrs. Carter's, this lady was more devoted to her family than she before had been; her husband wore an unusual smile of cheerfulness, and her children, she thought, were remarkably pleasant.

Since Mrs. W. left them, I have had no tidings from their family circle; but I hope, as the reader does, that Mrs. C. instead of squandering her smiles on the sterility of dissipated life, treasures them up to cheer, warm, and invigorate the virtues of her family.

EXTEMPORE LINES.

BY MRS. J. R. SPOONER.

THE pale wan moon
Is just emerging from a fleecy cloud,
Which hangs like graceful drapery around her.
Its silvery white, contrasted with the hue
Of the dark azure of the 'upper deep,'
Is beautiful—and countless stars are set
With dazzling brightness in night's diadem—
And moon and stars look coldly down upon
This vain, vain world, as if they would reprove
In solemn silence deeds of sin and shame.
Such times should be the Sabbath of the soul.

The laborer's task is done; the busy hum,
And cheerful tones of men, have long been stilled,
And bird and beast alike have sought their rest—
The very air seems hushed to calm repose.
All nature seems devout! shall I alone
Refuse to blend thought, feeling, soul, with these,
The sacred harmonies of earth and heaven?
I have been wont, and I would be so still,
To cherish fancies wrought from scenes like this,
And seek communion then alone with God.
In early youth I joined the giddy throng,
And once, when winding 'mid the mazy dance,
I saw the yellow moonbeams trembling through
The draperied window, and I stopped and gazed
Upon a scene, like this I look on now.
Though many a year since then has rolled away,
I ne'er forgot the influence of that hour—
Would I had heeded more its warning voice!
Which seem'd to tell me, in deep searching tones,
That I was made for better things than this,
The morning of my days to waste away,
In empty pleasure sowing seed which would Bring no good harvest, when my night was come.

NOT FANCY SKETCHES. NO. III.

SAUL BELLINGTON.

IN one of the seaboard towns of New England, a town remarkable for its wild and rocky scenery, and somewhat noted for the hardy and unsophisticated character of its inhabitants, lives and labors a certain blacksmith. I was struck with the nobility of his appearance and address, the first time I set my eye upon him. He belongs to that class of mankind towards whom we feel irresistibly drawn by some invisible and mysterious influence. Whether this phenomenon can be solved by animal magnetism, I have never ascertained. But I know that I feel a confidence in the opinions of such men; a sort of safety in their presence, and a reliance upon their powers. I note their every expression and movement as I note those of no other class of mankind.

Saul Bellington is a man of this description. He is every inch a man—which is much more than to be every inch a king. In stature he is about the middle height, his frame strongly knit and sinewy. His complexion is dark, his brow lofty and expansive, and his features and expression indescribable by any other terms than noble—manly. His eyes are not large, but deep set and brilliantly black. Saul is a man of hard toil. I love to see him work. Unlike lame Vulcan, the originator of the sledge hammer art, Saul's every movement is graceful, and Longfellow would say, poetic. Whether he works at the bellows or strikes upon the anvil, you love to look at him, even though his swart bare arm is dirty and his face begrimed with smoke. His shop is most romantically situated. It stands upon the brow of a rock which shelves abruptly down to the sea. More than once, in the darkness of a still autumn night, I have sat in a boat at some distance from the shore, and enjoyed the strange and picturesque scene before me. Had the objects been transferred to canvass by any one of our celebrated landscape painters, I should not have been more delighted, than I was on those occasions with the rude reality. The dark and easy swelling sea, the cloudy heavens, the frowning cliff, lifting itself some fifty feet in the darkness, like a huge monster, and this surmounted by the rude shop, which poured out at regular intervals through the open door and windows, broad columns of brilliant light, produced an effect at once grand and unique. When the blowing at the forge ceased, and the fire burned but dimly, the ring of the anvil and the low murmur of the surge, added music to the interesting scene, and gave to it an air of the wildest romance. Fanciful persons contemplating such a scene, if they did not know the man whose form they saw gliding every few moments in the glare of the forge, would have imagined the place the workshop of Vulcan, and that he and his cyclops were sweating there over some huge thunderbolts for Jupiter, but I could never bring Saul so low in my own mind as to compare him with the deformed and vulgar god.

Saul is not a drudge to his business. He does not make the accumulation of dollars and cents the main object of life. He has the elements of a true philosophy in him—and his leading maxim is, 'Life was bestowed for man's use and enjoyment, and not to be his tyrant and master.' Hence he seldom declines the requests which are frequently made by visitors to his town, to go out beyond the harbor on an excursion of pleasure. As soon as he learns that a party of his friends are down from the city to enjoy a sailing and fishing excursion, he flings aside his leather apron, hurls his hammer to the ground, changes his clothes, brings his large and commodious pleasure boat to the shore, and when all are seated takes the helm—and then he is in his element. A most skillful sailor, he frequently amazes us with his feats of seamanship. Sometimes he will run alongside some large craft, which is under full sail, so close, that our hands are involuntarily removed from the gunwale from fear of their being crushed between the two vessels. He will then sheer round and cross the bows of the craft so near that the masts of his boat just clear her bowsprit; and then heading for some rock half hidden by the waves, he entertains as well as intimidates the company by his near approach to the appalling danger.

He is always the soul of the company. No matter what subject is introduced for conversation or discussion, Saul has something to say upon it that is pointed and just. He utters his thoughts with such earnestness and energy, that his manner gives force if not beauty to his ideas, so that whatever he says is clearly understood and seldom forgotten.

He is a politician—one by birth and one too by education. Politics is a theme in which he delights. He throws all the energy of his sturdy soul into the subject whenever he converses upon it. No matter if the company on board are all Whigs, they love to hear him. Standing erect in the stern sheets, with his right hand upon the helm, while the boat is cleaving her way through the waters, he pours forth his arguments and invectives, as Carlyle would say of Napoleon, like Austerlitz battles. His left arm gesticulates vehemently, and his large muscular hand comes down upon the air, whenever he finishes a period, with the force of a sledge hammer. His eye, which is 'like Mars to threaten and command,' gives forth those terrible flashes which are the sure indices that the speaker feels his subject. He is a natural logician. But the unmeasured severity and the withering sarcasm with which he denounces the bank—tariff—distribution and other Whig measures, make you lose sight of his reasoning in your admiration of his powerful utterance and his earnestness of declamation.

Saul is a truly religious man, that is, he is constitutionally devotional. And then with his strong native intellect, he sees through the shell of things. He looks beyond the narrow circle of materiality and perceives and has faith in, the invisible. 'All nature,' he says, 'not only bears the evidence of God's existence, but likewise of his goodness. If God be not good, and does not design our happiness, why did he create such a beautiful world for us to live in? It is a sin, a great sin, and I will never be guilty of committing it, the sin of doubting the Deity's love to us here, and the continuance of it hereafter.' With Saul, religion is a matter of reason, feeling and practice. It is a thing which becomes him. If the comparison be not inapt, it fits him like a well cut garment, adding grace and beauty to the man. Yet he is unconscious of it. He retains it for its intrinsic worth, and not for display. On one occasion while repairing the buoys out beyond the harbor, there came up suddenly a severe hurricane. He was three miles from the shore, in an open boat. There had not been so violent a gale for many years. The storm was terrific; and the flashing of the lightning and the pealing of the thunder were incessant. There was but one vessel in sight, and she could carry no canvass, but her close reefed topsail. It was a perilous hour; but Saul quailed not, or for a moment lost his presence of mind. Two of his apprentices were with him. With the tact of an old sailor, he kept the boat's head to the sea and rowed for a buoy which was near; and making fast to that, he ordered the apprentices to keep bailing, for the boat was fast filling with water. 'No boat like this can live out this gale, my boys,' said he with perfect composure. 'Keep steadily at work, and if we must go, drowning is an easy death, and if we perish in the sea, it will be the Lord's doing and for our good, though we can't exactly see it now.' For more than an hour the storm raged with unabated violence. Many vessels were driven from their moorings, and many wrecks were made, and some lives were lost—but Saul's boat rode out the hurricane, and he came ashore, praising the strength of his craft, and thanking God for his mercy. Saul reminds me very much of Hawk Eye, that admirable character so well delineated by Cooper. He blends a true philosophy with the most liberal views of religion, is always moralizing upon passing scenes and events, is never desponding, but faithfully and cheerfully discharging the duties of his humble life. Bold and decided in action, fearless in the utterance of his opinions, inspiring confidence and attracting admiration wherever he moves, we look upon him as one of nature's noblest works. After he had lost all his property by shipwreck, all he said about it was, 'Why should I murmur? I can get more, for the Lord has given me health and strength and materials enough to exercise them upon, and room enough on the earth to swing my hammer in; and though the times are hard, yet we shall soon have a democratic administration, and then the times will be better.' Thus, with philosophic and christian, and I might add, political resignation to the dispensations of Providence, his life glides on, occupied with hard toil, and pleasant thoughts—making the most of this world, and anticipating immortality in the other.

Such is the mere outline of Saul Bellington's character. Many readers will recognize the individual as an old friend, and such will bear me witness that the sketch is not fanciful in the least, but true to literal fact.

GROUNDS OF TRUST IN JESUS.

BY HENRY BACON.

It is a common assertion and one by which timid, undisciplined, or wavering minds are sometimes sadly affected—that to deny strict and essential divinity to Jesus, is to take away all ground of solid and satisfying confidence in him as a Savior from sin. Such a remark reveals the existence of many theological errors in the mind that utters it, and shows why it is that all religion is made to depend on the belief of a few dogmas, rather than on the essential wants of the human soul and their adequate supplies in the revelations of God's grace in the Gospel. If it be allowed that there is no such thing as possessing confidence in Jesus as a Savior apart from the recognition of him as the very God, then it easily follows that none but Trinitarians are disciples of Jesus, and none but they are entitled to the name of Christian. This is a short way to gratify exclusiveness, but it is no more just than the dogmatism that begets it.

It may be well, in view of the evils of the assertion alluded to, to trace out the process of mind by which we conclude as we have done respecting it. Otherwise, it may be said, Assertion only meets assertion—it does not conquer. We, therefore, would devote a short space to set forth the true ground of confidence in Jesus as a Savior; and this ground we briefly state to be—The unalterable ordination of God by which Jesus is the Savior of the world; and there is no other name by which we can be saved. What he is between God and Humanity, is our foundation. Who has a better? And from the very fact that he is the Mediator between God and men, we must put from us the doctrine of the Trinity as subverting the order of the Redemption. It is not so much in Jesus as in God, that we repose our trust, for he is an Image to keep in view the Invisible. The ever-living, inexhaustible, and boundless love of God, was the moving spring of the Redemption; and of this infinity the spirit was given to Christ without measure, and he was 'full of grace and truth'; this grace and truth ever spake and acted in harmony with the declaration—'I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of Him that sent me.' Our trust is in that WILL which Jesus came to do; and in the office of Doer we see the beauty of Jesus, and why his birth was 'good tidings of great joy, which shall be unto all people.'

And thus we claim that our foundation is on 'the very God,' while we affirm that we honor Jesus as he required of his disciples—as the Son and Representative of the Father. It would be easy to show that the objectors are really those who do not found their hopes in essential divinity, so far as theories are concerned. They first behold God on the throne of universal empire, robed in vindictive Justice, and the whole race of humanity, from Adam to the last of the latest posterity, doomed to everlasting and unutterable perdition. Jesus is seen stepping forth to avert this doom—to turn aside the bolts of vengeance, and proposing to satisfy the Justice of the Deity by suffering himself. As a substitute he came forth, and all the acts he performed tended to this one point—to properly constitute him a substitute for man. While the believers in this doctrine look at God, they see him adverse to human salvation; while they look on Jesus, they see humanity's friend. And it is what he hath done as a human being, that their confidence is reposed; therefore they are guilty of the folly they accuse us of—the losing sight of essential divinity as the ground of hope of salvation. But as for us we can say—'Our christian faith and hope rest not on the metaphysical character of Jesus, but on the evidence he produced of a Divine Commission.' 'The living love of God is the only Savior.' Jesus is to be loved and honored as the complete representative of that saying love. 'God commendeth his love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.' For us he rose and lives—for us he reigns, and unto him be the glory due as Mediator.

EARLY FROST.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON

THE summer flowers are fading one by one,
 Touch'd by the chilling wand of sad decay.
 It was but yesterday the smiling sun
 Look'd proudly down upon the opening buds,
 Wooing them to unfold their velvet leaves,
 And fling their perfumes on the breezy air.
 It seemed that Flora had prolonged her reign
 To gild Pomona's triumph. But alas!
 The hoar frost came from out the northern caves,
 And spread his star-like spangles o'er the bloom
 Of the soft blushing petals. Brightly beam'd
 The shining crystals, on the crimson leaf,
 Lit by the silver moonbeams; but alas,
 When from the golden chambers of the East
 Aurora flung her rosy pennons out,
 And Phœbus urged his coursers up the steep
 Of the cerulean arch, and shed his beams
 Of light and glory on the awakening world;
 How sad the desolation which his rays
 Reveal'd o'er hill and dale!

Tis true the gems
 That pendant trembled on each tiny spire
 Seemed changed to silver 'neath his radiant smile.
 Diamonds and pearls in rich profusion hung
 Upon the leaf-clad spray; and brightly gleam'd
 The fair round globules on the silvery leaves;
 And tear-drops by night's pensive angel wept,
 Like tiny emeralds seemed, inlaid among
 The damask folds of the half opened rose.
 It was a splendid mockery; for the seal
 Of stern decay, beneath those shining gems
 That smil'd so gaily in the morning beam,
 Sat with an icy chillness.

I have seen
 The wretched dupe of ignorance and sin;
 When innocence, and purity of soul,
 And all the godlike qualities of mind,
 That, like sweet flower-wreaths shed a fragrance o'er
 The sterile desert of this fleeting life;
 When all had wither'd 'neath the searing blast
 Of the fierce simoom of ungodliness;
 And moral death, and misery, and woe
 Prey'd on the warm heart-fibres—I have seen
 The joyous wreath entwine the aching brow,
 And blindest smiles sit on the pallid lip,
 When the dark soul was writhing 'neath the fang
 Of stern remorseful thought. O sad, and drear,
 Like shadows 'round the gloomy charnel-vault,
 Rise visions dark, that in funereal train
 Sweep o'er the mental vision: holy truth,
 And seraph-innocence, and gentle love;
 All sacrificed upon the Moloch-shrine
 Of wild, consuming passion. And the hours,
 The mis-spent, spectral hours, how sad they glide
 Before the wearied spirit, that would fain
 Hide from the world, with the fantastic gleam
 Of pleasure's frosted spangles, the dark stain
 Of the corroding worm, that preys upon
 The sad heart's quivering strings. O were it not

For the all-glorious star, that points away
 Through the bright opening vistas, to that clime,
 Where an undying spring shall renovate
 Each loved, sin-blighted bud of intellect,
 And crown it with a glory ever pure;
 The soul would pine along the weary waste
 Of this vain life, and fondly wish to hide
 Its sorrows 'neath the veil of endless night.

MARY STUART, QUEEN OF SCOTS.

How thrilling and yet how painful emotions may be excited by a name. None perhaps awakens those more powerfully or recalls associations in which admiration and pity are more closely blended than that of Mary Queen of Scots. Her residence in bright sunny France, is the only period of her life on which we love to dwell. Fortunate Mary, to have passed even a few years of thy eventful life in that happy clime where thy sun rose to its zenith in glory ere it set in darkness and death.

France at that period had attained a high literary pre-eminence among her sister kingdoms, and men of true genius and talent thronged the Court, and lent an additional lustre to the reign of Henry II. Knowledge was generally diffused, and the cottage as well as palace was often the abode of literary elegance. Surrounded by such an atmosphere, Mary could not have failed to imbibe the spirit of the society in which she moved. Possessing a mind of superior strength and activity, she early discovered a quickness of perception, an acuteness of understanding, far superior to her years. The most distinguished among the literati of France, were selected to superintend her education; and in the rapid progress she made in every branch to which her attention was directed, she eclipsed all her youthful competitors. Nor did she excel alone in the more solid attainments, but in the lighter accomplishments of the day, she was unequalled. The natural grace and dignity of her person, united with pleasing manners, excited the warmest admiration, while the vividness of her imagination, the originality and superior qualities of her well cultivated mind, commanded the respect of all.

Amidst the splendors of the palace, the magnificent fetes and gay tournaments, or listening with all the eagerness of her susceptible nature to the foreign ambassadors and men of distinction in the private drawing-room of Catherine de Medicis, or joining with the noble and high-souled Princess Margaret, in the encouragement of all that was great and good, still she was the gentle, confiding, yet talented and dignified Mary Queen of Scots. None looked upon her but to love her, and Henry delighted in rendering her life one uninterrupted scene of happiness. Time passed rapidly away in pleasure and improvement, in study and amusement, until her marriage, which had been so long in contemplation, becoming, in her sixteenth year, the bride of the Dauphin Francis. Nothing could have exceeded the magnificence and extent of the preparations for this event. The ceremony was the most grand and imposing perhaps ever witnessed. In the church of Notre Dame, amidst assembled thousands, the youthful couple plighted their mutual faith, while the vaulted roof re-echoed the applause of the surrounding multitude. The festivities, pageants, tournaments and processions which followed, were in unison with the whole. For a while Mary was permitted to enjoy the quiet of domestic retirement, but the death of her affectionate father in law, Henry II., again recalled her to the scenes of public life.

As Queen of France and Scotland and heir presumptive to the crown of England, Mary seemed to have attained the height of worldly ambition, but misfortune had marked her for its own, and she was destined to drink to the dregs of the bitter cup. The death of her husband Francis, and of her mother the Queen Regent of Scotland, severed the ties which bound her to France, and called for her return to her native country. In bidding adieu to those happy shores, she bid adieu to happiness. Bitter trials were in store for her, trials of which her young heart had never dreamed. Sorrowful indeed were the tears she shed in her last fond farewell to the home of her childhood and youth; and though upon her arrival in Scotland, she was received with cordiality and apparent loyalty, accustomed as she had ever been to the warm, open, generous manners of the French, the formal respect of her friends, the coldness and even haughty disdain of the Scotch reformers, must have fell with a blighting influence upon her sensitive and feeling heart.

She found her kingdom divided by party dissensions and animosities, but her unwavering rectitude of purpose, her favorable, moderate and conciliatory measures, might have quelled the turbulent spirits and gained the respect and love of her people, had not Elizabeth of England, by her machinations, secretly undermined her influence, gained to her interests her most influential counsellors, those in whom she placed the most implicit confidence, and by every means in her power, incited her subjects to continual insubordination, gratifying her insidious enmity by every species of petty arrogance, by open and concealed opposition to every act or design which involved the interests of Mary or those of the kingdom over which she reigned. Surrounded by enemies the more dangerous because they wore the garb of friends, Mary was obliged to exert every energy of her powerful mind to guard against treacherous counsel and pursue a course which would be for the nation's true and lasting benefit. Her firm policy and integrity of principle, silently but steadily accomplished the fulfillment of her wishes, and established her well regulated system of government. Scotland became more prosperous and flourishing than under any preceding reign, and rose rapidly in the scale of refinement and intelligence, bidding fair to take a high rank among the surrounding nations.

But all events are in the hands of an over-ruling Power, no human foresight can foretell or avert impending calamities. A storm was gathering over the devoted head of Mary, which in its devastating influences should sweep her from her throne and kingdom. Rejecting the splendid advantages which would accrue to herself by a foreign alliance, to gratify her subjects and secure the interests of the realm, she chose from among her Scottish nobles their future king. But her union with Lord Darnley, instead of securing her own and her people's happiness, was, perhaps, the foundation of the future evils which befell her. His death, her unhappy marriage with the Earl of Bothwell, to which she never would have consented, had not a petition from the most distinguished of her nobles, the battle of Langside, her flight into England, the perfidy of Elizabeth, were events so rapidly succeeding each other, that the mind at first can scarcely comprehend the full extent of their calamitous influence.

Judging the queen of England by her own generous heart, Mary threw herself in her power, nothing doubting but that she should meet the reception due a sister and a queen. But the cold-hearted, selfish Elizabeth, seldom listened to the dictates of justice or humanity, where she fancied her own private interests were affected, or forgave where her vanity had been wounded. Mary's claim upon the crown of England had from the first, excited the jealousy of the English queen, and she had ever evinced towards her a spirit totally incompatible with every christian principle or the honor of a queen. Even before her leaving France, she had taken every opportunity to load with opprobrium a sister queen, whose descent, birth, station, and accomplishments, were so much superior to her own; and on her return to Scotland, had refused the usual civility of granting her a passport, and even had the effrontery to make an attempt to intercept and secure her as a prisoner.

In pursuance of her base and insidious policy, she endeavored by every possible means, even in the most trivial affairs, to distress and injure her; by corrupting her subjects, and instigating them to rebellion; by actively opposing her forming any foreign alliance, using every secret art and influence for the accomplishment of her marriage with Lord Darnley. But as soon as Mary had decided in its favor, declaring it not only injurious to the interests of the two kingdoms, but prejudicial to the continued friendship of their sovereigns; by her artful insinuations at home and abroad, and even to Mary herself, that she was accessory to the death of her husband—the foul-est slander that ever emanated from prince or subject, and could have originated but in the envious bosom of Elizabeth herself; by detaining her against all principle and right as a prisoner, when she had enticed her by fair promises to apply to her for aid, instead of treating her with kindness and hospitality, or suffering her to proceed for assistance to France.

By the insulting and degrading trial to which by false representation she prevailed upon Mary to submit with her rebellious subjects, granting their leaders the favor of a personal conference, a privilege she refused their queen. After having invested herself with the dignity of umpire, by violating every principle of justice in acting and consulting with the principal of her rebels, assuring them that if they could attach even a suspicion of Mary's guilt in the murder of her husband, their cause should rest in their own hands. But even with this assurance the only evidence they were able to procure, and upon which the fate of a queen and kingdom were made to depend, were a few sonnets and letters without address, signature or seal!

But even these were sufficient to justify Elizabeth in the cruel and unjust imprisonment to which she had destined Mary, though forgery was written upon them so legibly, that she not only refused that the originals, but that even copies of them should be delivered to Mary or her commissioners; by suppressing the Earl of Bothwell's confession, transmitted to her by the King of Denmark, in which he declared himself the murderer of king Henry, expressly freeing Mary from all implication in his crime, solemnly protesting her innocence, and speaking of her with the greatest possible respect; by causing the circulation of publications injurious to the reputation and cause of the Scottish queen, while those in her defence were 'positively interdicted.' To such low and contemptible means was Elizabeth obliged to resort, to disgrace the character of Mary; 'which must be done,' she writes by her minister Cecil, 'before other purposes can be attained.' What those 'purposes were,' her subsequent conduct plainly proved.

By acts of arbitrary cruelty too numerous to mention, and which could in any way injure the feelings or render more insupportable the sufferings of her victim; by instigating the private assassination of Mary, through the means of Sir James Paulet, her keeper, who though harsh and unfeeling, would not degrade himself so low as to become a midnight murderer, even though upheld by his mistress the queen of England, she proved that the life of Mary Queen of Scots, alone could satisfy the implacable hatred of Elizabeth: and by the most consummate art she at length accomplished her purpose—condemning to death the Queen of Scotland, her superior, as much in mind and person, as in birth and education; thus arrogating to herself a power, which no other sovereign in christendom would have dared usurp, a power which belonged to God alone.

In the hour of trial, in the prospect of an ignominious death, Mary still preserved the natural dignity of her character, the sweetness, serenity and magnanimity of mind which had ever characterized her, dying as she had lived, with the spirit of a queen and the christian resignation of a martyr. But Elizabeth, though her once fortunate rival was crushed to the earth, and no longer capable of exciting either her envy or her fears, still evinced towards her the same unforgiving, relentless spirit to the latest hour of her life. She gave her but a few hours notice of her approaching execution, a precipitancy which no criminality could justify, denying her request that a clergyman of her own faith should be allowed to attend her, and expressly commanding that none of her friends should be permitted to accompany and sustain her in the last trying scene. But in this her executioners were more merciful than their mistress, yielding to the earnest expostulations of Mary, and suffering six of her attendants whom she chose to witness her death.

Mary was not destined to enjoy an earthly crown, but she gained instead, the crown of a glorious immortality. Had she not had the misfortune to have been surrounded by ambitious and designing ministers, subservient to the interests of another, and had the sovereign of the neighboring and more powerful country of England, not only professed the christian religion, but possessed a little of its spirit, Mary's reign might have been prosperous and happy. Even her enemies were obliged to allow her to be the most able and talented woman of the age, and so long as she retained her power, she surmounted every obstacle, overcame every difficulty, but treachery and violence drew her at once to the earth—the morning beholding her a queen, the evening a helpless captive, like the imprisoned eagle her subsequent efforts to regain her freedom were useless and unavailing. The triumph of her enemies was as sudden as it was complete. Had she been permitted longer to have swayed the sceptre of state, the world would have been compelled to acknowledge the superiority of her talents, the wisdom of her government, the equity of her regulations.

Had she been fortunate, she would have been all that was great and good and noble. But she was too diffident of her own judgment, too willing to be guided by those she considered more capable than herself; she was too willing to forgive the most deadly injuries; she was too mild and gentle, too pure and open-hearted, too generous, too confiding. She possessed an influence over the heart more lasting than any rank or title has power to give. If in her happier days 'the vivacity and sweetness of her manners, her openness, her candor, her generosity, her polished wit, her extensive information, her cultivated taste, her easy affability, her powers of conversation, her native dignity and grace,' excite our warmest admiration, the 'fortitude and nobility' she displayed in adversity, should command our love and respect.

'It seems certain indeed,' said the venerable archbishop who delivered her funeral oration in the church of Notre Dame at Paris, 'that Providence made her afflictions conspicuous only to make her virtues more conspicuous. Others leave to their successors the care of building monuments to preserve their name from oblivion; but the life and death of Mary are her monument. Marble and brass and iron decay, or are devoured by rust; but in no age, however long the world may endure, will the memory of Mary Stuart Queen of Scots and Dowager of France, cease to be cherished with affection and admiration.'

A SISTER'S INFLUENCE.

BY MIMOSA.

O'ER him temptation threw its wiles,
Enticing with illusive smiles;
Round him its silken net-work wrought,
Till heart and mind were captive brought.

Now, seated at the gambler's board,
Elate, he shows the shining hoard
Which cunning suffered to be won,
A surety for the mischief done.

Bright, golden visions, dazzling, rise,
To mock his passion-blinded eyes;
But wealth and pleasure, nought he sees,
Hears gratulation, flatteries.

The wine-cup sparkles at his lip,—
The subtle poison will he sip?
Nay, sudden thoughts his hand arrest,
In tumult heaves his troubled breast.

The tempting cup is put away,
He flees from scenes which shun the day;
He turns from pleasure ill-acquired,
Spurns all his misled heart desired.

So blinded, duped, how could he see
His danger and iniquity?
A sister's warning, kindly spoken,
Showed him the moral statute broken.

It came upon his sleeping soul
With irresistible control;
Her soft, persuasive accents came
To turn him from his guilt and shame.

He saw her earnest, watchful eye
Look into his entreatingly;
Sweet words of caution, gently said,
A healing on his dark wounds spread.

A kiss upon his unstained brow,
Returned as pure,—he feels it now;
Time-hallowed tears his pale cheek laved;
They roused his strength,—the youth was saved.

Speak to the erring, speak again!
Who works by love works not in vain;
Speak with the sweet and pleading breath,
It will redeem from shame and death.

'OUT OF THE HEAT A VIPER CAME.'

BY HENRY BACON.

'There came a viper out of the heat.'

Acts. 28.3.

If in endeavoring to convey important moral truths home to the mind and heart, the preacher can engage the imagination and fancy in company with the reason, he will be sure to succeed better than if he appealed simply to the reason alone, and he will awaken an interest in his theme which he otherwise cannot create. The imagination and fancy sway too mighty a sceptre in the dominions of mind not to be regarded by the moralist or religious teacher, and desired as aids in the work of progress. They are regarded and appealed to by the true utilitarian—by him who values aright man's love of the beautiful, and esteems poetry as one of the chief ministers of God—who believes, and acts upon the belief, that nothing is useless that weans man from fastening his thoughts on mere earth and earthly things, and awakens him to a knowledge of the higher and nobler ends of his being.

In accordance with these thoughts, I would use an incident recorded in the book of the Acts of the Apostles: 'There came a viper out of the heat.' I do not choose these words to attempt to gather from them some deep and mysterious meaning, but as the thoughtful uses a picture which embodies some part of a history, and from which he gathers good lessons as he meditates. The eye of the imagination has the province of the bodily eye, and gazes on the historian's portraiture, as the eye on the work of art, and reflection in the meanwhile is busy to learn what it teaches. Let it be with the reader, as it is with the writer, and we shall be profited.

And first to the historian's sketch. The scene is the island of Malta, or, as it is here called, Melita, and the time is that of the deliverance of Paul and his companions from the terrors of the stormy sea. The barbarians, who inhabited the island, exercised great kindness towards the shipwrecked company, and received every one to the comforts they could offer, while without were rain and cold. Paul was no idler, and therefore we see him gathering wood to feed the fire; when he laid the gathered sticks on the fire, a viper came out of the heat and fastened itself upon his hand.

The barbarians, according to the common superstition of the age, deemed this incident a certain sign that the Apostle was a criminal, who having escaped human justice, the gods were determined that he should not escape, and as the viper fastened itself on his hand, they deemed him a murderer, and that hand the living instrument of death. But as he soon shook off the viper, and they saw no swelling—no evidence of poison—they went to the other extreme of opinion, and considered him a god. They expected at first to see him swell, fall and die, under the subtle influence of the viperous poison, and gazed a great while on him with these thoughts, but saw no harm done by the venomous reptile; therefore they felt themselves to be in the presence of a superior being, and owned him as a god.

As I see the gathered group on the island, shut in from the storm, and screened from the cold by the fire, I think of social life, and the joy of escaping from the troubles and trials of buffeting with the evils of the busy world, and retreating from its noise and tumult, the storms of passions and the chilling influences of selfishness and duplicity. The storm may still rage, the winds blow, and the rain fall, but the sheltered group find happiness among themselves, as all exercise feelings of friendliness, and forget the false distinctions of outward life in the one feeling of the common need of each others aid. Here were the centurion, the soldiers, the sailors, Paul the apostle, Luke the beloved physician, prisoners of other ranks, and the barbarian inhabitants of the island. All these various characters, tempers, and dispositions, mingled together in peace, for generous feeling and a sense of dependance, brought into exercise the right disposition, and all was well. And so it would be in social life, if we all remembered our dependance on society for much that makes life a blessing, and were careful to keep in exercise that generous feeling which prompts us to contribute to the enjoyment of others. We must meet with all kinds of tempers, and it will not do to exercise any aristocratic feeling, for we are indebted to the humblest in society, as well as to the exalted and great—the head cannot say to the feet—'I have no need of you.' The centurion needs the soldiers, as much as they need the centurion, and they all, coming though they did from a polished and enlightened nation, had need of what barbarians could do for them. And Luke has recorded the fact that the barbarous people showed them no little kindness, but kindled a fire and received every one. In this they teach all to be given to hospitality—to kindle the fire of sociality and receive with generous kindness the variety that presents itself in the intercourse of life. Thus only can we obey the exhortations of our religion to be courteous to all men—to honor all men—and thus only can we awaken within them those sentiments towards us that will permit us to do them moral good.

As I see Paul entering the group and throwing on the fire the gathered wood, I see an example of well directed effort and industry to contribute to the comfort and happiness of others. He did not wrap himself in a stern dignity, and leave the work of feeding the fire to others—to the soldiers, the sailors, and the barbarians; neither did he move among them as one superior to them all. No; he encountered the rain, the cold, and the storm, and gathered for his own and others good the requisite materials to keep alive the grateful flame. The spirit of his religion would not permit him to be inactive when he could do something for the good of others, and as he threw on the gathered sticks, the increased warmth blessed himself as well as others. Should it not be so in social life? It should. We are bound to be active in contributing to the real enjoyment of social life—not clothing ourselves in repulsiveness, or disdaining to mingle in with the gathered group. Nor must we be content with mere feeling and desiring to contribute to the enjoyment of a certain occasion, but add thereto real and strong effort to contribute a mite, or much, as we may be able. The poor widow made an effort to add a little to the treasury of the temple, and she did so; though it was but a mite, it showed that her desire reached the springs of action, and was not mere desire, and the Lord blessed her deed. We all have the ability to add something to the enjoyment of social life, and if a kind and generous spirit is kept active within us, it will give birth to many little kindnesses, which are much in the aggregate. The wood gathered by Paul and added to the fire, is but a poor emblem of what we can do. He did more by conversation.

As I see the viper coming out of the heat, which the Apostle had unconsciously brought in with the wood, I think how frequently it happens in the social circle that a well meaning person unconsciously introduces a viper amid the contribution he brings to the grateful warmth of the circle. He would fain contribute to the enjoyment of the time, that the sorrows of the past and the evils around may awhile be forgotten, and the sweets of social life be participated in. He makes an effort to this end—he ranges from part to part of the mental island within—he gathers here and there a little, and throws it upon the fire of sociality which enlivens and cheers the whole circle. But alas! all unconsciously, he has brought in a viper! Soon it starts out from the heat which forced it from its concealment, as it is warmed into activity. Something that the friend utters is misapplied or wrongly taken, and degree by degree, as the heat of the kindling sticks, a warmth is created which forces out the viper—anger or resentment. Anger is, indeed a viper, for its form or aspect is hateful, the associations connected with it give it a hideousness that makes it hateful to us, and we are not easy in its presence. It is indeed a viper, for it hath a subtle poison, which in a moment pervades the whole man, and he swells with passion, and there is, for the time, a suspension of real life—the life of affection. It is indeed a viper, for it can leap from person to person in a group, and fix its poison in each, and create much and terrible wretchedness. It is a viper, for we are taught to look upon it as such—all it begets is like the brood of the viper, ready at birth to do a deadly work, and in the language of Isaiah, 'that which is crushed breaketh out into a viper.' How careful then should we be, that from out of the heat of discussions and controversies there does not come a viper! Warmth, or a generous glow of feeling, we all desire in social life—in our circles, and in our intercourse with each other, but we certainly do not wish vipers to be warmed by the same heat; and if such is our desire—if we wish the warmth without the viper, we must be cautious what we throw upon the fire, lest a concealed or torpid viper be warmed by the heat into life to leap therefrom. And how can we do this but by examining what we are about to throw in—to see if wrapped up in the gathered ideas, there be not some epithet, insinuation, or implication, which will be a viper coming out from the heat of controversy, full of poison. We can have the warmth without the viper, and we should be as careful as possible to have it, though sometimes we may as unconsciously bring it in as did Paul; he was aware, as an inspired teacher and observer of society, that we are in danger of exciting anger and resentment, even when every feeling of our heart is right, and therefore his exhortation is, 'As much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men'—live peaceably as far as the exercise of a christian spirit will enable you to live. Seek ever to be courteous and kind; as much better as our religion is than worldly principles of conduct, so much better should be the characteristics of our daily life, always remembering that a soft or gentle answer turneth away wrath, while grievous words stir up anger, as the heat of the kindled sticks did the viper. Here then is the caution to be used—against uttering grievous words, and to clothe our thoughts and ideas, as the preacher did, in 'acceptable words.' He tells us he 'sought to find out acceptable words,' and so should we; for we can clothe an idea in words that will sound musically, as well as with words that cannot but sound discordantly, and that make the lips as Milton represents the opening of the 'lower regions'—'grating harsh thunder.' To seek out these acceptable words should be a principle of duty with us, especially when engaged in discussions or disputes on interesting and important subjects. 'Words cost nothing,' is a common proverb; they should cost some little labor in choosing. As we gather and throw on fuel for the feeding of the fire that warms without consuming, let us look first to our words, and if there be a viper there, let us put it away silently and carefully, and not throw it in to break up the circle and alarm and terrify the timid and gentle.

As I see the viper that came out of the heat, fastening itself on the Apostle's hand, I think how a grievous subject introduced, or word uttered, is soon made to affect the introducer, though entirely unconscious of offence being therein. He has added fuel to the social flame, but out of the heat comes a viper—the viper of quick resentment—and fastens itself upon him. All gaze upon him—all expect to see the poison work, and as the flushed countenance and kindled eye are seen, the observers may speedily adjudge him to be no favorite with God—no christian, though perhaps there may be a Luke among them who knows the Paul. How much depends upon the issue! The esteem and veneration of many will be lost or gained, and that is no unimportant matter to a christian. The memory of that hour will be connected with the whole life of the individual, and it will add brightness or shade to the mental portrait. The viper has fastened itself—is its poison felt—is the vitality of the heart impaired—is the person falling?

As I see the Apostle throwing off the viper, and behold him unharmed by it, I think of the nobility of the characters of some who permit the viper of anger or resentment of wrong, never to settle its deadly poison in them; and though, at the first, they may be startled and moved from their habitual quietness to momentary agitation, and we may deem them to be of the common caste, yet speedily the viper is shaken off, and no harm remains—and we acknowledge the God in them! we see manifested a true nobility of character; and the momentary storm only serves to make a beautiful manifestation of the divinity of the spirit that can effectually say, 'Peace, be still!' Such show us a clear commentary on the Apostle Paul's language, 'Be angry and sin not; let not the sun go down upon your wrath.' Not that he would have us to be angry, but if in the collisions of the world, the spirit of anger should be awakened, we should not indulge it—nurture it, and strengthen it, but throw it off speedily. For the sin of anger lies in the cherishing of it—and Solomon tells us to 'be not hasty in spirit to be angry; for anger resteth in the bosom of fools,' or simple ones. And the same wisdom hath also declared, 'It is the glory of a man to pass by an offence,' which accords with the christian spirit, that demands of us the exertion of good in the conquest of evil—to shake off the viper into the fire that will consume him, as did Paul the reptile that leapt upon him. The barbarians owned him a god; and even the barbarous tempered of our age, will freely own the divinity of the spirit that makes, in the strength of goodness, a conquest over anger and revenge. In times of excitement, and seasons of warm controversy and discussion, let us fully honor the divinity of this noble spirit. We can think strongly, feel warmly, and speak earnestly, without being angry; and to be angry, is to deprive ourselves of the full power of thought, the advantages of sober consideration, and bring out from the heat a viper, that will fasten itself upon us, and which we may not be able to throw off as easily as Paul did, harmless, but that may fix in us a long enduring and wide spreading poison.

Let us seek to have more and more of our Master's excellences, who when reviled, reviled not again; and then, as the blow of the axe on the sandal tree serves to bring out its delicious fragrance that tells of the virtues of the tree, so the attack of the vipers of anger and revenge, will only serve to enable us to manifest the christian spirit and prove the virtues of the well disciplined mind.

TO * * *,

ON RECEIVING FROM HIM A BEAUTIFUL, HALF BLOWN ROSE.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

THY Rose, my friend, like the Dodonean oak,
Speaks in bright oracles of coming fate;
Shall I be priestess, and for thee invoke
Sweet prophecies of Manhood's rich estate—
And 'mid its delicate tracery seek to find
Prophetic readings of thy heart and mind?

Unlike Agrippa's mirror, which revealed
The Future only, there are visions here
Of pleasant hours the Past had fain concealed—
How bright amid these leaves those scenes appear!
Hast thou no mirror where thy soul can trace
As I do here, an absent form and face?

Thou wouldst have called this Rose a worthless gift;
It shall not be so e'er to thee or me;
For it hath power the veil of Time to lift,
To show what has been and again may be;
Hours of sweet converse, and of gentle mirth,
And playful wit to which thy mind gave birth.

But listen to thy Priestess. She will read
The sybilline leaves whereon thy fate is writ;
And thou, most dutiful, must give true heed
To whatso'er the oracle deems fit.
Doubt not its readings, for my soul hath power
To see deep meanings in thy faded flower.

There is a Temple—so I read, my friend—
Upon the brow of a most glorious Hill;
Thither ten thousand pilgrim footsteps tend,
Ten thousand now its golden portals fill;
Tablets are there where each one writes his name—
It is the Temple, and the Hill of Fame.

Thither thy course is tending. Slowly now,
And with most cautious steps thy way is traced;
Yet thou shalt stand at last upon its brow,
Thy forehead with a wreath of glory graced.
Wilt thou remember, when that crown is thine,
The village Priestess—and the rural Shrine?

Well, let her be forgotten. 'Tis not then
She cares to be remembered; but if now,
When thou art nameless and unpraised of men,
One kindly deed of hers can light thy brow
And fill thy heart with hope, she is content,
Nor deems her humble labor idly spent.

Go on, young poet—scholar—whatso'er
Title or mission suits thy spirit best;
Go on sublimely in thy bright career,
And keep, 'mid all thy fame, a guileless breast.
Go on—the oracle repeats the plea—
And she who reads it, hopes all things for thee!

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF WOMAN'S LIFE. NO. V.

BY MISS CHARLOTTE A. FILLEBROWN.

THE MOTHER'S HEART.

'Number thy lamps of love, and tell me now,
How many thou canst re-light at the stars
And blush not at their burning? One—one only—
Lit while your pulses by one heart kept time,
And fed with faithful fondness to your grave—
One lamp—thy mother's love—amid the stars
Shall lift its pure flame changeless, and before
The throne of God burn through eternity—
Holy—as it was lit and lent thee here.'

THERE is something holy and touching in the expression with which young people gaze upon their first-born child; the new and strong link in the beautiful chain of their domestic affection—the tie which neither time nor misfortune, sickness, disgrace, nor even death itself shall have power to sever. As they bend over the helpless babe, imagination rapidly and hopefully pictures forth his gradual progress through the different stages of childhood, youth and manhood, and weaves bright crowns of honor, fame and happiness, to deck his brow; and the mother looks forward to the time when her hours of pain and suffering and the future cares that await her, shall all be amply recompensed by his love and welfare.

Such were doubtless the thoughts and dreams of Leslie Ashton and his young wife, the wedded lovers of a year, the parents of a few brief hours, as they gazed with speechless delight on the fair boy just given to their love and their embraces; and each sought to trace in its tiny features the lineaments of the other. There was another too beside that couch, a stately and beautiful woman, who bent with mingled smiles and tears over the young mother and her child, and blessed them with a full heart. This was Isabel Somers, the cousin of Mrs. Ashton, and the tried and true friend of her whole life. Isabel had been many years the wife of one who possessed every requisite to make her happy; wealth lavished its countless luxuries in her home and on her person—love the most devoted and untiring was around her pathway, and her social and intellectual feelings alike met a ready response and sympathy—but one desire yet remained unsatisfied. Her spacious halls echoed not the sound of childhood's happy voice and merry laughter—the deep fountains in her heart had never been stirred by the lisping tones or the soft embrace of one whose very life-blood was her own. 'Would that I, too, were a mother!' was the earnest prayer of her spirit, as she looked on the quiet yet intense happiness of her friends—and then inwardly reproaching herself for her secret envy, she returned, languid and dispirited to her home. She entered her luxurious dwelling, so different from the small and simple abode she had just quitted, and strove to forget in her usual avocations that scene of domestic felicity. But in vain she essayed to charm away those haunting thoughts by the spell of sweet sounds; the notes were discordant, for the soul of the musician was away—in vain her flowers blossomed and shed their fragrance around her, and her birds strove by their sweetest songs to win her attention; her ear listed and her heart yearned for a far dearer sound. 'O that I were but a mother!' she wildly exclaimed, as she dwelt more and more on the happiness of the Ashtons; 'gladly would I exchange wealth, ease and every luxury, but to clasp to my heart a being to whom I had given birth, and to hear its first lisping accents murmur "mother."

Days, weeks, and months went by, and daily and hourly was that wish repeated till it became an earnest aspiration, a fervent prayer; and then Isabel began to experience a new feeling, a sort of jealous envy towards the young cousin whom she had ever loved so dearly, and by degrees she discontinued her visits there, for the sight of their deep, quiet enjoyment made her very heart sick and weary. But at length her prayer was answered, and in the twelfth year of her wedded life, Isabel Somers embraced her first-born son. There were tears in her deep, dark eyes, as she imprinted the first kiss of maternal affection on its smooth round cheek, but they were tears of heartfelt joy and thanksgiving. This was the era in Isabel's life. She had been happy as the only and idolized child of the most devoted parents—happy as the beautiful and gifted heiress, flattered and courted in the gay circles in which she moved—happy as the cherished wife of one who had been the playmate of her childhood, and the beloved companion of her youth—but never, till now, had her felicity been perfect and entire. Time sped, and joyously it passed with the inmates of Somers House. The little Ernest grew in grace and beauty—each day developed some new infantine charm, and Isabel was blest indeed. Home was now to her the centre of all enjoyment; what to her ear were the warblings of the sweetest vocalist compared with the faintest lisp of that loved one—what to her eye the most graceful movement of the accomplished danseuse with the delight of watching its tiny feet, and training its feeble steps.

Till Ernest attained his seventh year, he had enjoyed the most unbroken health, and his doting mother had often exulted in his bright eyes, rosy cheeks and agile movements; but about that time a contagious disorder broke out among children. Among the first whom it attacked, was the eldest child of the Ashtons, who, unlike Ernest Somers had always possessed a feeble constitution and delicate health, and unable to resist the ravages of the disorder, he soon became its victim. From the time of his attack, Mrs. Somers had kept Ernest in strict seclusion, but her cares were unavailing, for scarcely had the grave closed above his little playfellow, when the young heir of Somers House was seized with the fever. Isabel was well nigh distracted. Mrs. Ashton, ever self-sacrificing, roused herself from the indulgence of her own sorrow, to administer consolation to her friend, whose less evenly balanced mind and ungoverned feelings so much required it.

'Do not talk to me of patience and submission,' cried Isabel, in reply to her cousin's gentle pleadings, 'I cannot bow my heart to this stroke, and say "Thy will be done!" You cannot feel as I do—you have lost your child, 'tis true, but you have others left to fill his place, while I, if I lose him, have no other hope, but shall be left alone, ay more than if he had never been given me. But surely God cannot be so cruel, he will not take my darling from me! O if he might but be spared to me, gladly would I suffer peril, pain, and privation of every kind, ay death even, for what were life without him? I know I am a wicked, sinful creature, Margaret, but if he is to die, I cannot, will not survive him, for how could I live when the sunshine and glory of my life had departed?'

Alas! how often does that which we crave as our chiefest blessing, prove to be our bitterest curse! At length the crisis of the disorder came. 'Must he die!' murmured the trembling, despairing mother, in that low, sepulchral whisper, which sounds so fearfully in the silent chamber, to the kind and skillful man who bent over the couch of the little sufferer.

'While there is life there is hope,' was the reply; 'he appears now to be sinking into a quiet slumber, and "if he lives till sunrise," he may yet recover.'

'Till sunrise,' slowly repeated the mother, 'and the sun is but just now setting.'

In vain did her friends seek to withdraw her from the room, and urge her to take some needful repose; for it was now the ninth day of Ernest's illness, and during all that time Isabel had scarcely ate, drank or slept—nor would she now. 'If he lives, I would be the first to know it,—if he dies, mine must be the last look upon his living face.'

The long weary night passed away—the gray light of the morning dawned, and still that pale, anxious watcher sat by the bedside of her child, with her dark, heavy eyes fixed earnestly on his small and wasted person which lay listless and languid, and save his low but now regular breathings, perfectly motionless. Once only her voice broke the silence to whisper to an attendant, a request that the shutters might be unclosed. The sun was just rising, and as its full, broad beams fell on the pillow of the child, he opened his large blue eyes, no longer bright with feverish delirium, but clear and unclouded as that morning sky, and turning them, full of love and recognition on the wan face of his mother, in a faint voice murmured her name. From that hour his recovery commenced gradually but surely, and ere many weeks had elapsed, Isabel's heart was once more elate with joy.

But the shadow of the Destroyer's presence had not yet vanished from her dwelling; the uplifted sword fell, and Mr. Somers, the husband and father, was cut off in the prime of his existence. Yet he died not by the wasting of disease, no premonitory warning was given, and his death fell like a thunderbolt on the hearts of his friends. He was taken ill in his counting room, was carried home, and in a few hours expired without having spoken to, or apparently even recognized his wife or son. Not till his remains had been consigned to their kindred earth, was the cause of his death discovered. That morning he had received letters from abroad, and it was after perusing them that he was seized with the attack which terminated his life. They proved, on examination, to contain tidings of the failure of some houses with which he had been so closely connected that their downfall involved his own—his fortune was completely wrecked, and he had probably dwelt upon the situation to which it must reduce his delicate and high-bred wife, and the fair boy to whose future eminence he had looked forward so proudly, till the revulsion proved too great for his highly wrought and sensitive nature to bear, and he had sunk beneath it. Thus in a brief space was Isabel Somers, the pampered child of luxury and fashion, left widowed and poor to struggle through the world with the child of her idolatry, with nothing but a 'mother's heart' and a mother's never dying love to sustain her. Many wondered that one who had always manifested so much devotion towards a husband as Isabel had done, should make so little outward demonstration of sorrow; for in that light did they regard the simple mourning she had adopted, not as proportioned to the loss she had sustained, but as best suited to the straitened circumstances in which she had been left. When all her affairs were adjusted, but a small portion remained of what had been a princely fortune; with Mr. Ashton's assistance, this sum was safely invested, and a small, neat dwelling procured, not very far from the city, where Isabel was soon established with her boy. No sooner was she fairly settled in her new abode, than she set about the task of educating herself and Ernest. To many women this might have seemed no easy one, but Isabel possessed a mind which needed only culture and strong moral action, to render it capable of comprehending and performing any duty to which she might be called. Her education, despite the disadvantages, if so they may be called, of rank, wealth and fashion, had not been superficial; for Isabel had an insatiable love of reading, which having been under the guidance of the fine mind and cultivated taste of her husband, now proved of inestimable value to her. She was well versed in the branches which comprise the usual routine of a good English education, joined to the usual stock of young lady accomplishments, and it was to obtain a thorough knowledge of languages in which she was rather deficient, as well as of the higher and more abstruse studies with which it was necessary that Ernest should be conversant, that she now set herself to work; and with the strong stimulus of maternal love to urge her efforts, who can doubt that she was successful? The principal part of the day was devoted to Ernest's instruction, not neglecting those useful, though less carefully taught lessons which are to be found in green fields, singing birds, blossoming flowers and all beautiful things; but when he was at rest, then commenced Isabel's labors; and any of the villagers, who chanced to be out late at night, never failed to see the glimmering light of the solitary lamp, in the little study-parlor of the cottage, which told that the love-inspired student was still at her tasks. Night after night, she sat diligently poring over musty volumes, and storing her mind with the treasures of ancient and modern lore, ever and anon creeping stealthily into the adjoining bed-room, to look for a moment on the features of her sleeping idol, and then returning stimulated to still greater efforts. In order the better to economize her small income, and to enable her to afford Ernest every gratification as well as to excite in him a spirit of generous emulation, she received two pupils, the sons of old friends, by whom they were cheerfully committed to her care, to be prepared in like manner with her own son, to enter the University.

To accomplish this work, was an arduous task—but what mother ever shrank from aught that would promote the happiness of her child? Certainly not Isabel Somers! What mattered it to her that her cheek grew thin and pale, and her eye dim, or that many a silver thread mingled with her raven tresses—while she saw his stately figure developing itself into manly beauty—while his dear voice was heard singing merrily about the house, and his clear, bright eyes beamed with love and happiness upon her? At length her task was completed. Ernest, accompanied by his mother, went to Cambridge, was examined, and admitted as a student in the University, while Isabel returned to her humble home, to devise and practise some additional method of economy, by which she might be enabled to furnish Ernest with the means to make as good an appearance as any of his fellows. In order to effect this, she dismissed her only attendant, on the plea that she required some manual labor to counterbalance the effects of her sedentary life, and then set about preparing her simple meals, and performing her household duties herself, for the first time in her life. She was urged to receive pupils again, but the grand stimulus was gone, and Isabel confessed herself unequal to the task; but to add to the little fund, which the strictest frugality, and the entire absence of every little luxury to which she had been accustomed, enabled her to lay by for Ernest's wants, she consented to instruct a class of young ladies in the lighter accomplishments of the day.

Little did Ernest dream, when he received his liberal allowance, of the toil and privations it had cost his mother to obtain it! Yet she heeded it not. Willingly would she have coined her very heart's blood, to afford him but an hour's gratification, and amply did she deem herself repaid by the tidings which reached her of his diligence and good conduct. 'He is my all,' she would say to the friends who remonstrated with her on the privations to which she doomed herself, 'and why should I not give my life even, if need be, to make him happy?' And when in the vacations he came home to her, still the same, only more manly, more kind and gentle, more like his dead father, it seemed as if her very heart would burst with excess of gladness. Then the cottage assumed a new face; during Ernest's visit the little parlor was carefully arranged, the books he loved were laid on the tables, and flowers, of which he was passionately fond, filled the room with fragrance; and a proud and happy woman was Isabel, when on the Sabbath she walked to church, leaning on his arm and looking up, with confiding affection into his open, noble countenance. But those days were too bright to last! When at the close of his second collegiate year, Ernest returned home as was his wont, he was accompanied by a fellow-student, to whom Isabel as if instinctively, took an instant and fixed dislike. She remonstrated with her son, but for once her pleadings were in vain. Ernest had contracted a friendship for the young man, by one of those singular fatalities which sometimes draws together persons of entirely opposite tastes and dispositions. Pedro de Castigne was the son of a Spanish shipmaster and a pale, gentle girl, whom he had half coaxed and half frightened into becoming his wife, and who died of a broken heart, when this her only child was but six months old. Since that time he had been under the protection of his father, if such it could be termed;—knocked about here and there, and gleaning now and then such information as could be obtained among a bold, piratical crew. But he was a shrewd, artful lad, and withal rather good looking, with a bright face and bold, black eyes; and some benevolent gentleman having taken an interest in his situation, had given him the means of studying, and finally procured him admission into the University, rightly presuming that his natural talents, combined with a good education, would enable him to make his way in the world, with honor to himself and credit to his benefactor. And so it might have been, had it been possible for Pedro to keep out of mischief; but his natural tendency to this, aided by his early culture, proved too strong to be resisted, and the consequence was, that he was not only continually in disgrace himself, but he was ever drawing some easy and unsuspecting classmate into the same path. Such was the dangerous companion with whom Ernest Somers had linked himself; and when at the close of the vacation, he returned to Cambridge, Isabel bade her son farewell with fearful forebodings of evil.

The mother's worst fears were destined to be realized! Soon after the commencement of the term, it began to be whispered about that mischief was brewing at Cambridge, and ere long the storm burst forth. Some atrocious act had been committed, the perpetrators were detected; Pedro de Castigne was the ringleader, and high on the list stood the name of Ernest Somers. They were arraigned before the government of the College, the offence proved, and the delinquents expelled. Castigne departed, none knew whither, and Ernest returned to the abode of the stricken mother whom he had disgraced, and whose dearest hopes had been crushed and blighted. Nor did the trouble end here. Had Ernest returned like the Prodigal of old, humbled and contrite, conscious of his sin, and pleading for forgiveness, Isabel felt that she could have borne it better. But it was not so. He had grown sullen and morose; he mocked at her tears, and turned contemptuously from her gentle pleadings; and the temper which she had ever deemed mild and even, proved to have been but a slumbering lion, which, chafed and irritated by the battle which had been done, now rushed forth in violent fury, to destroy all who came in its way. His mother could gain no information from him relating either to the riot in which he had been concerned; or to his friend, the notorious de Castigne; but that Ernest received frequent letters from him, she could not doubt. At length, one evening contrary to his wont, he remained at home, and the mother's heart bounded with joy once more, to see him take his seat opposite her at the round table, where he had been accustomed to sit in those happy days when she was his teacher, companion and friend. There was a softness in his eyes which had not been there before for many a long, weary day, and a tenderness in his voice as he bade her good night, that made her heart thrill as it had done in by-gone days, and called up a smile of pleasure to her pale wan face. Poor Isabel! that smile was her last! She retired to rest that night with a lighter heart than she had done for many months, for she had hope that her erring child might yet be reclaimed—'he will be once more as in those blessed days, and we shall be so happy.' With this delightful anticipation she arose refreshed on the ensuing morning, and entered the parlor, confidently expecting the morning greeting from Ernest; but he was not there—neither was he in his bed-room or in the garden—he returned not that day, and after nearly a week of intolerable suspense, a letter came which told the heart-sick mother that her darling son, whom she had nurtured so tenderly, scarcely allowing the rough winds to blow upon him, had taken passage as a common sailor in a vessel bound for a long voyage to a distant land. He expressed no contrition for the past—gave no promise of amendment for the future, and now indeed was the last ray of hope extinguished in that MOTHER'S HEART!

From that hour Isabel Somers was a changed woman. For many days no one saw her; the cottage windows were closed, no smoke ascended from the chimneys, and there was an air of cheerlessness and desolation about the whole place. But on the succeeding Sabbath the lonely widow was seen slowly proceeding to church, and the few who ventured to steal a look at her, were shocked to see the ravages that short season of sorrow had made. Her stately figure was bowed, not with the weight of years; her hair, which had been remarkable for its redundant beauty, had grown thin and gray, and the large dark eyes which had captivated many hearts with their soft brilliancy, had now an expression of intense melancholy which saddened even the most indifferent beholder. Yet none approached her with 'the poor common words of charity' and consolation, for there was a sort of gentle, quiet dignity about her sorrow which forbade the intrusion. That day with a bowed and broken spirit Isabel laid herself with all her griefs and heart-aches at the feet of Jesus, and received comfort and support in her afflictions.

Two years passed wearily and heavily away, although Isabel had gained a greater degree of calmness and resignation than she had dared to hope for, and then came another and more terrible shock. The crew of the ship in which Ernest and his mad companion had embarked, irritated by some harsh usage from the commander, and instigated by de Castigne, had mutinied and turned pirates; they had been captured by a vessel and brought into port, and Ernest was now in prison awaiting his trial. Not a moment did Isabel hesitate with regard to the course she should pursue. To go to him, to comfort and console him, to remain with him during the dreadful period of his confinement, was the course which her heart prompted, and agonized as she was, she set forth, alone, to seek the poor criminal. Dreading lest she should meet some old familiar face among the numerous passers in the well known streets, Isabel, on her entrance into the city, procured a cheap conveyance to take her to the prison; on her way she passed the splendid dwelling which had been her home in happier days—lights were glaucing in the windows of what had been her nursery, and at the sight, came rushing back the memories of the past, soon to be dispelled by the fearful realities of the present. The vehicle stopped at the iron gate of the prison, and having obtained permission of the keeper, Isabel was conducted through the dismal stone galleries and down flights of steps into the damp corridor leading to the cells; and her guide having unbarred the iron door and removed the massive bolts, she was ushered into the presence of her guilty son. For a moment she regarded him in horror-struck silence, while he, unable to recognize in the wan, gray haired woman before him, the stately and handsome woman from whom he had parted less than three years before, stood before her, bending upon her a glance so fierce that she shrank before it. 'Ernest'—she at length faltered forth, and with a faint wild cry, the miserable man fell at her feet and pressed to his ashy lips, convulsively, the hem of his mother's garment. During his confinement on shipboard, and since, in that lonely cell, his mind had returned to its natural state; for strangely had it been perverted in his intercourse with the reckless and dissolute Pedro de Castigne; horror and remorse had taken the place of the wild, fierce desperation which had led him on to the cruel and terrible deeds in which he had been an actor. He was again gentle and childlike, and listened with tearful earnestness to the tender words of his grief-worn mother, as she urged him to seek forgiveness where he had most deeply sinned. With tears of heartfelt penitence did he confess and mourn over his apostacy and downfall—he spoke with shuddering horror of the dreadful crimes which he had committed, and lamented with bitter, though unavailing sorrow, over the untimely and disgraceful doom to which he had consigned himself—he, who had been so highly gifted, so carefully instructed! His mother sought to soothe him with kindly words, and promises from sacred Writ, and at length wearied and exhausted, he sank into a profound slumber with his head pillowed on his mother's knee. 'And is this,' thought Isabel, as she gazed on his sleeping face, 'is this the babe for whose birth I so longed—the fair child by whose sick bed I knelt in agony, and so earnestly prayed for his life—the noble boy to whose nurture and instruction I devoted the best years of my life—the manly youth whom I looked up to as the future support of my declining years? Yet oh how much dearer is he now than ever he was in the brightest days of his prosperity!'

The remainder of my story is painful, but it shall be very brief. Isabel remained with her wretched son till he was brought to trial—she stood near him at the bar, and listened in fearful suspense to those on whose words hung life and death—she nerved herself to bear the worst, and heard with unblanched cheek, the sentence which doomed her only son to the scaffold—she returned with him to the dungeon, from whence he was to emerge once more, to become the gaze and talk of a vast and heartless multitude—she clasped his cold hand, and bade him farewell for the last time on earth—she heard the shout which told her that all was over—that she was a lonely, childless widow, and then her sight grew dim—she remembered nothing further!

In a remote corner of the little church-yard in the village where she had passed so many chequered years, did Isabel consign her son to his last dreamless sleep! She heard the clods rattle on the coffin—saw the earth heaped upon what had been her idol, and then returned to her home—desolate indeed! But not long did the weary spirit remain in bondage—ere the grass had grown on the grave of Ernest Somers, his broken-hearted mother was laid by his side.

Peaceful be thy slumber, thou martyr to maternal love! and in that better land to which thou didst fondly point him, mayst thou meet thy poor wanderer, ransomed from sin, and washed white in the blood of his Redeemer.

Reader! 'tis an ow're true tale—I have drawn my characters from life—nor is Isabel Somers the only mother who has seen her dearest hopes thus crushed and blighted; as many a poor, stricken heart will bear me witness; but never, thank God! has storm or blight, disgrace or even death, had power to dim or quench the lamp which burns on ever, with holy and steady light, from the cradle to the grave, through all chances and changes in the true MOTHER'S HEART!

RAPHAEL'S MOTHER.

BY MRS. N. THORNING MUNROE.

'OBSERVE, said Raphael, the feminine softness of expression, the beautiful harmony of thought and feeling. When I take my pencil for high and noble purposes, the spirit of my mother hovers over me. It is her countenance, not my own, of which you trace the resemblance.'

It was most beautiful, and startlingly
Like life. The painter sat and gazed upon His glorious work. The soft, bright eyes met his,
The long, fair hair parted upon the brow,
Was strangely like his own; and like his own
The wavy curls, and the small, classic head.
But there was more. There was the soul that looked Out from those deep, blue eyes, there was the meek,
The holy, chaste expression of the brow,
The earnest thoughtfulness about the mouth,
The heavenly light of heart and mind, that shone
In every feature's grace, and spoke that face
A woman's and a mother's.

What marvel that the artist thus could paint
That lovely countenance? that he could give Such heavenly radiance to those tender eyes,

The seal of thought unto that glorious brow?
What marvel? Was it not his mother's face?
The eyes the same that watched his infancy,
That smiled upon his boyish sports, and looked Upon his first, faint efforts in an art
He loved, approvingly! And had they not
With their soft, earnest gaze, looked as it were
Into his inmost soul? Were not those lips
The same that had so often pressed his own,
That duly as the evening came, had prayed
To God for blessings on his boyish head?
Those long, fair curls! O were they not the same
With which his infant hands had played—the same
Which had so oft been mingled with his own?
'Twas even so. Each feature of that face
Was graven on his heart; and when his soul
Swell'd high with noble thoughts, that lovely face
Smiled on him, and 'twas his mother's spirit
Hovered o'er him. And who can tell what deeds,
What noble thoughts and aspirations, owed
Their birth to that pure source? O say, does not
A mother's spirit ever watch her boy?
E'en though she dwell in heaven, does she not look Down on the earth, and mark him where he stands?
Whether bright laurels circle his young brow,
Or whether scorn and poverty be his?
Is not her spirit near him? Does it not Sometimes whisper, to his o'er wearied heart
Sweet words of peace? O answer, ye, within Whose hearts lie sweet remembrances of her,
Who watched you with a mother's holy care?

And though he dwell in heaven, does she not pierce
The clouds, and see him where he stands, amid
The angel throng? Does she not hear his voice, Chanting sweet praises to his God? She knows
That God has called him to himself; He thought
Her cherub worthy of a heavenly seat.
Is she not blessed to be so marked of Him,
That her young treasure was deemed fit to dwell
In holy courts? Does not her spirit soar
Above, and with the angels, and her God,
Watch that bright one, himself an angel now?
He draws her heart to heaven, and makes her feel
That she herself, is nearer to her God
Since she has yielded up that angel form.
And so her spirit still bears on, she feels That though he will not come to her, yet she Shall go to him.

'LITTLE KINDNESSES. Goethe in a conversation once said, "Life is short, and we must miss no opportunity of giving pleasure to one another." He said this to one who desired to defer till the next morning a visit to a poor dramatist, when requested to communicate to him the complete success of one of his works. Goethe could not consent to take a night's happiness from him, and leave him to anxieties that were wearing the springs of life.' B. . . Little kindnesses are like the lesser stars, sprinkling the foreground of the Queen of Night! which is a star of much greater kindness, shining on all! PR.

Hark, Lottie ! The sound of trumpets and the cries of heralds ! Let us go sit awhile in yonder deserted watch-tower, and look down upon the army as they pass.—What a glorious procession ! How majestically the broad white Banner of Love swells to and fro to the soft winds of Heaven. Look ! its insignia is but a simple cross, with the motto ‘ God is Love ! ’ Yonder cometh the Leader of this splendid array. He is attired in pilgrim-robes, and his sandals are worn and soiled ; but Napoleon never wore so proud a crest, as the thin, proud locks that wave upon this good man’s brow. And here, Lottie, cometh another General—the pride of the army. With firm step and undaunted brow, he has been foremost and strongest in the battle. He has crossed Alps, and warred amid the Pyramids ; nor has he been driven back by worse than Russian snows and Moscow fires. Yet see him when the hour of rest has come, and you will find a

The vision has faded, Lottie, and here we sit again, as through the magic of Ali's carpet, in this quiet, secluded chamber. The gossip-spirit has deserted me; and I have a fancy, now, instead of amusing others, to be amused myself; so draw your chair a little nearer to my throne, and in your own beautiful words, give me one of the 'Lights or Shadows of Woman's Life.' Alas, Lottie, the Shadows are so numerous in poor woman's lot, that if you are in the mood for it, I would rather the present sketch should be a sunny one—a Light instead of a Shadow.

THAT man is happy who pleads for the fatherless.

THE MOURNER.

BY IONE.

THERE are people in this world of ours who scoff at the idea of enduring sorrow for the dead; and we must admit that there are too many reasons for the charge of infidelity to the departed, in the readiness with which the mind casts off its burden of grief, and again hurries into the excitements of pleasure or business; but to say there are no real mourners, is a libel upon many a wounded spirit. Beneath a calm, and even a smiling, exterior, there may be depths of unimagined sorrow, to which the spirit turns in its lonely hours and yields itself in the very hopelessness of grief.

I recall a remark made years ago by a highly respected friend which left a deep impression upon my mind. 'I think,' said he, 'that in general the human mind is too willing to forget its grief, thus preventing its salutary effect upon the moral and social feelings. I would have the remembrance of bereavement constantly present to the mind, solemnizing without saddening the spirit, like a sense of the immediate presence of God. Thus should we hallow the memories of the departed, and increase our energies to victoriously resist in the great battle with the world's temptations.' Subsequent observation on mankind has convinced me that the remark was founded upon a deep knowledge of human nature. An abiding sense of the presence of a pure and holy God, it is well known, produces a salutary effect upon the character, and such, in an humble measure, is the consequence of a nurtured remembrance and reverence for the holy dead. The omnipresence of God! The mind is tempted to exclude the thought from its very vastness, but let the erring, wandering sinner take this truth to his heart, and he has entered a fortress from which the powers of darkness must flee, appalled and defeated.

I would say to the young pilgrim upon life's lengthened journey, 'Strive, wherever you may be and whatever may be your occupation, to realize the actual presence of God, and do not exclude from your thoughts that gentle sorrow for the loved and lost, which elevates and purifies the character.' I have said there are real mourners, and I will give a sketch of one as it was told me a few days since.

'You said, Aunt Mary, that you have known Mrs. Montraville from childhood. Was she always as calm and passionless as now? Did you notice yesterday when the merry laugh went round that she only smiled? She speaks in so low a tone, and at such long intervals, one would suppose that she feared her own voice. Tell me something about her, Mary, for I dearly love the romance of real life, and there are events in the history of all that possess a strange and thrilling interest.'

'Well, get your work, Jane, and I will tell you why she is sad when all around her are joyous, and ever reminding me of a flower which the frost has blighted without destroying.'

'In early life,' continued the narrator, 'she was a fair, light-hearted girl, motherless, and filling an important station in her father's house. It was with real pleasure that we heard of her betrothment to a gallant young sailor, who had been a highly esteemed friend for many years. His form was graceful and buoyant, his face beamed with generous emotions, and of his waving brown locks we suspected him of being a little vain. He was a general favorite, and his presence was an antidote for gloomy thoughts. They were married, and he continued to brave the perils of the great deep with a sailor's ardent love for his profession. At length his ship was ordered to one of the West India Islands, and with a heavy heart he bade adieu to his happy home and group of little ones. To his wife his absence was a source of real sorrow, and she counted the moments of separation with an anxious solicitude, which only those in a similar situation can understand. He had been absent the appointed time, and his return was hourly looked for with the most lively emotions of joy.'

'It was a mild autumn morning, and Mrs. Montraville sat at the breakfast table, surrounded by her children, whose artless inquiries about the absent and beloved one, were answered with truly maternal tenderness. At last the mother was alone, her head resting upon her hand, and her thoughts full of the subject nearest her heart. A neighbor entered bearing the dreadful story of her husband's death in a foreign clime. A wasting fever had robbed him of his strength, and conscious of his situation, he asked to be dressed and carried upon deck. 'My hours are numbered,' he said, 'and I wish to die looking out upon the sunny sea, and fanned by the pure breath of heaven.' They complied with his request, and he passed the day talking of his far-off home and family. 'Long will they wait for my familiar footstep and deeply will their hearts be wrung when hope shall forsake them;' he murmured as the day wore away. 'But I leave them with One able and willing to save. Oh! faithfully does memory portray their sweet faces, drawing me away from the spirit land I so soon must enter. My Ellen, dearer than when I first called you my own, and our precious children, what will become of you? It is sad indeed to die thus, beneath stranger skies and untended by the ministries of affection,—but God's will be done.' Ere the sun went down, his spirit was with its God. The remains of the true-hearted sailor were borne from the deck to fill a new made grave upon a distant island, 'and there was sorrowing among the crew—for a favorite had left them.'

'The young widow received the sad intelligence in silence and without raising her head. Friends approached to offer consolation, but she was like one stunned by a violent blow ; they laid her upon a bed, but no tear came to her burning lids, and no wail of sorrow betrayed the depth of her anguish. Days passed thus, and her physician averred that she must weep or die. She could listen to no details of his sickness or death, as the agitation it produced threatened her very life. At length her overburdened spirit found relief, and she arose from her couch of suffering worn and wasted, and armed herself to bear a little longer the burden of life for the sake of the dear ones who clung to her in the helplessness of infancy.

'Years, long and many, have passed since then, but the memory of that first, dark hour of bereavement, has lost none of its poignancy. Of her husband she never speaks, save when some familiar friend mentions his name, and then her words are few and mournful. I have never seen her laugh, and only a faint smile betrays her sympathy with the happy beings around her ; but nothing like moroseness mingles with her sadness. It was a fiery trial for a young and devoted spirit, and no wonder it left an ineffaceable impression upon her whole character.'

Have I proved that there is one sincere mourner in this careless, selfish world ? If so, my task is done.

HYMN.

How MANY lessons, Oh our God !

Around our feet are spread ;
On every flower-enamelled sod
Thy goodness may be read ;
In every tuft of waving grass,
In every golden ray,
In all things beautiful that pass
Along our joyous way.

Oh may our hearts, as true to Thee,

Thy faithful goodness prove,
And wheresoe'er their lines may be,
Still execute thy love.

Thy love, which falls in sunny showers

Alike on good and ill ;
Which spreads the fruitage and the flowers
At every creature's will.

Oh let us press this holy love

Within our heart of hearts,
And wear it, wheresoe'er we move,

A shield from sorrow's darts.

A gentle monitor of good—

A guardian spirit, given
To light our feet along the road

To happiness and Heaven.

THOUGHTS ON THE BIRTH OF JESUS.

BY T. B. THAYER.

EIGHTEEN hundred years ago, or more, a company of shepherds were watching their sheep on the plains of a small tract of country bordering on the eastern waters of the Mediterranean Sea. The day had worn lazily away, the sun had gone down, and the angel watchers had hung out their star-lamps along the skies. The shepherds were gathered in companies to talk, or were scattered not beyond voice-distance, while the faithful wolf-dog, ever-moving, ever-watching, went his rounds to the outer-most circle of his trust. Much talk had these lone shepherds in their indolent employment ; and it were not unreasonable that they should have given space to the all-absorbing theme of the day—the Deliverer that was to come, and of whom Jew and Heathen had made mention as expected to arise in the East.

Prophecies, dimly interpreted by Rabbis and Scribes, had spoken of one who was to come out of Zion, who was to be of the House of David, the great King of their glorious and heroic age, now long gone. All men talked of him, they of the palace and the hovel, and wondered. The olden records of law-giver and seer had been diligently studied, and re-studied for more decided and satisfactory information of the event and the man.

Weary had the people become of the power of Rome the seven-hilled. Oppressed by her servants, galled with their yoke, and with the memories of glory and dominion, they had grown impatient of longer suffering and endurance. Men gathered in crowds in the city and in the field, with dark and threatening looks, and ill-suppressed murmurs and throbs. The mailed soldier of the city, sword in hand, scattered the malcontents who met in the street and talked of their oppressors with expressions of hate, and in angry tones. But in the caves, and forests, and fields, and on the hills, stern men and fearless gathered, and bravely plotted for their country's deliverance. Every where the clouds seemed lowering. Herdsmen and shepherds were beset with promised Messiahs and Deliverers, were led away from their quiet employment to blood and battle and miserable death beneath the swords and javelins of Roman legions.

It was a dark time for the oppressed, yet did the low voice of discontent and threat continue to be heard—and many paused to listen. A dark time, yet true men hoped, and too faithful believed. True, no prophet had come to the people for hundreds of years ; the fire of inspiration had been gone out that time, and the altar was cold. The Urim and Thummim were not ; and dwelt not between the cherubim as of old. But for all this, many hoped in spite of themselves ; and some hearts everywhere, in high places, and among the common people, were big with expectation.

So wide spread and deep had grown this feeling, that even the unbelieving had ceased to utter his jibes, and waited, for he could not tell what might be. And the scorner held his breath, at times, and listened, as though God might come, after all. And even the proud ruler who would lord it over his slaves, and the iron-hoofed legionary who insulted the descendants of David on their own soil—even these grew more respectful, for there was on them an undefined feeling, not capable of word-expression, that there was at hand some great change. They knew not what it might be, nor in what shape it might come—but something, such as not every day the world witnesseth. Even at Rome men talked, and wrote—and waited for the Star in the East, but knew not that it was a Star for which they looked.

Such was the far spreading feeling of dim, uncertain expectation, when the company of shepherds, named before, were clustered together on the plains not far from Bethlehem village, by night, watching their flocks. Their conversation would likely run on the great subject of thought and speech. Traditions of better days, when their chosen city was the glory of the whole earth, came upon them, and the general hope of a Deliverer, who was to restore those glorious old days, rose up in their hearts—when, suddenly, their thought and converse were alike broken up, by a strange sight, and awful! The heavens were opened, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them; and the voice of his angel was heard proclaiming the glad news of the Deliverer's birth! They were sore afraid, but the messenger of light, hushes all fear—'I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be unto all people. For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Savior which is Christ the Lord.' 'And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God, saying, "Glory to God in the highest—on earth peace and good will toward men."'

And so God revealed himself, by night, to certain rude and obscure shepherds, as they watched their flocks—and not to the learned and the scribes, not to the leaders of the people and to the high in place! Strange choice this, and unexpected. Nevertheless, consider it attentively, for there is much in it. Consider it, and thou shalt be wise for the study, and know more of God, and of his method of teaching the wise of this world by the foolish, and confounding the strong by the weak. God may be oft-times seen in the star-light, and heard in the solemn night-winds, when in temples built for him neither his voice is, nor his presence. God can make his own temples; and to his own, the pure in heart, he will reveal himself, however humble. Therefore, as seen, to shepherds, and not to Pharisees, He speaks to honest men, unsophisticated and simple, and not to the wise in world wisdom; to the crowd, and not to the honored, or sought-to-be honored of the crowd; not to them of the Priest's court, but to such as wait in the court of the Gentiles.

But what of these shepherds, and of the revelation made to them of the Zion-Deliverer! They rise up, and say, 'Let us go to Bethlehem, and see farther of this wonder;' and they go, and find as the angel had told them. But do the rulers and the teachers of the law believe their story? Oh no. What have they to do with the carpenter's son, born in a stable. He the promised Savior of Israel, the Messiah and anointed of David's God? 'But,' say the shepherds, 'God himself has so told us, lately, by night, on the plains as we watched our flocks.' 'Let him tell us,' reply the proud bigots of the old temple and synagogue—'God reveal this glorious King-birth of Israel to you, and not to us! to ignorant sheep-tenders, and not to priests! Absurd pretenders—who shall believe that God will do so foolish a thing?'

But the honest-hearted shepherds persist. They go to Scribe, to Lawyer, Pharisee, Priest and Rabbi, but no man of them will believe; and their story laughed at, and ridiculed, and rejected, they grow weary and ashamed of saying, 'God has spoken to us, and we have seen the desire of one nation, the Deliverer of David's house.' And so, by and by, turned out of doors, jeered at, believing nevertheless, they go back to their flocks, and among themselves they speak of it. And oft-times in the long night-watches, they call up that strange scene, and seek to divine its significance; and they half-fancy the heavens are opening again, and wait, with quick-beating hearts, if God will speak to them once more!

Thirty long years have rolled by, full of oppression, of plotting and suffering. The story of the Bethlehem shepherds is forgotten. What has become of the manger babe, none know or care, since none believe, save a few true hearts to whom God had also spoken. They believe mighty things of the child. Yet dimly, after years of waiting, burns the light of memory on the altar of even their hearts. Once, however, when found in the temple disputing with the doctors, they hoped much, for even then these were amazed at his knowledge, though they seem not to have known that this was he of whom, twelve years before, the shepherds had revealed strange things, as revealed to them.

Thirty years have gone-by—and on the banks of Jordan there stands a stern man, having raiment of camel's hair, and a leathern girdle about his loins. Rough-clad is he, but a prophet of God; and he baptizes to repentance and preparation for the long expected Deliverer. One cometh to baptism, a man of humble mien, of calm face, and few words hitherto. None think him more than others of the crowd—but as he cometh from the water, the heavens open, and God speaketh, 'This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased!'

So comes the revelation again to a crowd, on the bank of the Jordan, and not to the priest in the temple, not even to him who only once a year entereth into the Holy of holies. This also hath much in it worthy of thought.

But this meek man, whom the rough-clad man baptizes, and whom the heavens claim as beloved—who is he? It is he of whom the shepherds heard from angels on the plains of Bethlehem, thirty years ago, of whom they told their wild story, which was not believed. It is the lad who eighteen years ago left his parents to confound, by his wisdom, the doctors of the Temple. It is the great Deliverer of Israel—of Israel only? not only, but of the world also. His mission is opened. Mighty and beautiful thoughts he utters now, and on mount and plain the multitude of hearts are heaved to and fro by his thrilling voice, as the waves of the sea by the tempest-spirit. And his hand is mighty in wondrous works. The blind see, the deaf hear, the dumb speak, the dead live again! 'Verily,' say the leaders of the people, 'he speaketh as no other man ever spake, and with an earnest and solemn air; not as the synagogue and temple teachers, but as one having authority. And there are indeed strange and mighty works which he doeth continually—notable miracles, we must confess. But this is not the state in which the great Prince is to come. Not a carpenter's son is he to be; not so poor and humble as this man; nor yet is he to come from Nazareth, for no good cometh thence. Besides, he cometh not to us, the Scribes and Pharisees, and rulers of the people. He hath no counsel with us, and asketh not of our wisdom, but gathereth his disciples, his council of state, from mechanics and Galilee fishermen; and he goeth about preaching as a beggar, rather than a king to be. This is not the Messiah. We know more than he, and are better; and will not believe in him.'

So reasoned these men. But the coming to the common people, and the fishermen disciples! This, so strange to them, was significant of much; which, as seen, has been oft pointed at before, of God.

So reasoned the Pharisees and rulers, and therefore waited for another, who should come in the glory and dominion of David, in the wealth and splendor of Solomon the temple-builder, in the pomp and parade of a Conqueror, with clanging trumpets, and floating banners, and neighing steeds, and mailed men, and victor shouts! So waited they. So have they waited through eighteen hundred long and weary years—and he cometh not. Wicked men were these; proud and foolish—a stiff-necked, disobedient people even now. Yet amid all their unbelief and hardness of heart, can not we also say, Sublime men are there, who, after eighteen slow-rolling and awful night-centuries, can still trust so strongly, and amid degradation, and oppression, and contempt, and hope deferred, wait so patiently and bravely for the promise given to the fathers! A mightier and a loftier faith this, than much that is called christian. And though mistaken the faith and the men, they will get for themselves in spite of us, reverence for their greatness and far-reaching strength.

For one as David and Solomon looked they. Yet a greater than David, a wiser than Solomon and all the prophets, was this meek man whom they despised. He was the Messiah, after all; the great Deliverer of whom the Law-seers had witnessed. But he came for a mightier and nobler work than they in their happiest visions had ever conceived. He came to save, not from the Romans, but from the Jews; not to save the Jew only, but all men from themselves; not to establish the kingdom of David, but the kingdom of God; not a dominion over the outward world, that to-day is, and to-morrow is not; but a dominion over the greater world within, which is forever. He came not for meat and bread and raiment, not to draw water from Jacob's well, but to give to the world the bread from heaven and the water of life, of which if a man eat and drink, he shall never more hunger, nor thirst, nor die. His mission was to the soul, darkened, long-wandering—to call it back to light, to save it, to sanctify it, to enable it to gather up its wasted energies, to put on the likeness of God anew, to be true to its own dignity and heavenly origin, to be pure and brave, and erect as in the days of its youth and innocence, when it walked with God in Eden at eventide, and was not afraid. This was the glorious mission of that humble and true man, who was rejected alike of the proud Pharisee, the learned Scribe, and the sneering Sadducee. This was the God-sent Messiah, the true Prince of world-Israel, the anointed High-Priest of that divine temple of God, even the SOUL, which, though defiled, his Presence has never yet wholly deserted.

Do we wonder, then, that angels announced his coming? Do we wonder that the heavens were opened when he was baptized to the beginning of this great work? Do we wonder that God from out the heavens proclaims, 'This is my well beloved Son?' It is good, then, that the earth also should rejoice with songs and hallelujahs, that men should have part in the triumph hymn sung of angels, and heard of the Bethlehem shepherds eighteen hundred years ago, by night, 'Glory to God in the highest'—and doubly should they rejoice, for there is added to it, 'On earth peace, and good will to men.' And herein might they who rejected and scorned, see something of the nature of his kingdom and mission.

No battle shout, no victory-hymn was that of the angels in which the birth of this divine Prince and Savior was announced. Not to make war upon Roman, or Samaritan, or Persian, did he come; but 'peace on earth' is his herald cry. Not to create hate and evil among men, but to establish 'good will,' was the object of his mission—to break down the walls of nation, party, sect, and gather all men into one great and holy family, breathing into every heart the feeling of common brotherhood, and of love to the common Father, God. And that this might be so, he revealed to them God as a Father, kindly disposed, having good will to all men, who were his children. He called upon them to love one another, and bear each other's burthens by the way, as they journeyed heavenward to their home. He sought to make men feel how great and sublime a thing it was to be the children of God, twice children, created and born of God. By the influence of these truths, he labored to inspire them with high and heavenly thoughts, to dispose and enable them to put under their feet all that is earthly and sensual, all that is base and wrong and sinful; and in the place of these he sought to beget within the soul a deep thirst for holiness, and a ceaseless striving to rise up and live with God evermore. Not to-morrow would he have them begin this work, but to-day, this hour—'Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation.'

Not so have christians learned Christ or Christianity. With them Christ came to save from pain and suffering, from flames and hell, not to sanctify and make the soul God-like. Hence men are expecting to be saved from what is to come, and they labor not to be saved from what is. They wait to have their heaven hereafter, and so strive not to begin it here. This is the great error of the church, which values religion not for what it brings us and makes us now, but for what it shall bring us and make us in the future.

Let us escape this error, and remember that Christ may be our Savior now, if we will have it so. Let us not fold our arms, and wait for Christ to make us pure in the life to come, but seek, with his aid and God's blessing, to be pure in the life that is. This is the work of the true christian; this was the divine life of Jesus, and the salvation which he came to work out for the world. And this he would do by giving life and light to the soul, by calling out its energies into mighty spiritual action, till it shall again be toned with the Father-Mind, and once more there shall be perfect harmony in the universe of God.

Let all men rejoice, then, in his birth, and be glad for his heaven-directed mission, for not vainly did he come; not vainly have been spoken to the heart the holy truths of his religion. His ministry within the soul's Holy of holies, is silent, unseen, unheard of the crowd without, but not less true and sanctifying; and by and by the High Priest shall appear to the waiting world, without sin unto salvation, and praise ascriptions shall be made to the Lamb that taketh away the sin of the world. Then shall the kingdom be delivered up to Him who is the All-in-all, and the angels shall again sweep their harp-strings, and earth, no longer silent, shall join, with answering chord, in the sublime world-anthem of 'Glory to God in the highest—glory forevermore.'

SONNET TO WINTER.

WHAT! here again winter? why what brought you back?
Have you come after something you wanted to carry?
We did not expect you,—alas and alack—
You'll make so much mischief! we hope you'll not tarry.
Have you come now to stay, or only to call?
'Tis not fair you should tarry—pray tell us now, is it?
We've had but a few days of summer and fall,—
'Tis too soon, O, by half for your annual visit.
You've made a mistake in returning so soon;
But a few days have passed since your old visage vanished;
You ought to be freezing the seas in the moon;
And forever from earth we all wish you were banished.
Old Winter heard not—for he stretched forth his hand
And froze every stream—every thing in the land.

HAPPINESS.

BY MISS M. A. DODD.

'Oh, happiness how far we flee
Thine own sweet paths in search of thee!'

ONE whose sweet and mournful lyre-strings are now hushed to waken in melody no more on earth, has described in thrilling lines the traveller's disappointment, when his long cherished desire was granted, and he stood by the source of that mighty river whose waters fertilize the land, and make glad the hearts of those who dwell upon its borders. He had experienced illness and want, weariness and suffering; he had braved every danger, and overcome every obstacle; and with throbbing pulse, and brow uncovered to the hot sun of Egypt, he paused from his wanderings at the goal of his ambition. Did the fruition of his hopes bring happiness to the weary pilgrim? did the springs of joy gush forth anew in his bosom? or did he not rather say, 'and is this all? have I toiled and suffered for this?' The burning sands were behind him, and the fiery sky above, and before him the dark, slow moving waters. Were there not rivers more beautiful in his own far away land? did not the voice of some bright stream call him back to friends and home? and was there not a whisper in the solitude saying to his heart, 'are not the rivers of England better than all the waters of Egypt? couldst thou not gaze upon them and be satisfied?'

'Night came with stars:—across his soul
There swept a sudden change,
E'en at the pilgrim's glorious goal,
A shadow dark and strange,
Breathed from the thought, so swift to fall
O'er triumph's hour—And is this all?'

He wept—the stars of Afric's heaven
Beheld his bursting tears,
E'en on that spot where fate had given
The meed of toiling years.
—Oh, happiness! how far we flee
Thine own sweet paths in search of thee!'

We may well believe it was even so: we may well sigh to think how many a wanderer has found disappointment, instead of happiness, at the end of his journey.

'And is this all?'—How often has this question been asked by the unsatisfied heart! how often does that for which we sigh bring only sorrow and disappointment, and how many find in the attainment of some long desired object a curse rather than a blessing. Alas, for our short sighted knowledge! alas, for our unwise desires!

'Man never is, but always to be blest.'

We are never satisfied, and never happy; for there is still a restless longing, an unquiet seeking after something which we do not yet possess; but could we say with the sacred writer, 'I have learned in whatever situation I am, therewith to be content,' we should find ourselves blest with one source of joy; for Contentment is the twin sister of Happiness, and where one takes up her abode the other will dwell also; but how few of us open our hearts and our dwellings to those angel visitants, though they stand without, waiting admittance, or sit by the wayside unseen, while we wander far off in search of them.

The young man will not make Content his bride, and dwell with her in the home of his fathers. There may be enough and to spare, within and without the domain; there may be broad lands, and herds and flocks; there may be fair sights, sweet sounds and healthful breezes; but he is not satisfied; he dreams that happiness dwells in the populous city, with the brilliant assemblage and the bustling crowd, and flushed with joyous expectation, he takes up his residence in the busy mart. But the glittering show which first allured him, soon becomes tarnished, the gay mask falls off, and he sees vice and misery and despair, walking at noon-day before him. His eyes are opened, and we hear him saying in the hour of disappointment, 'and is this all? was it for this I left my lovely and peaceful home?'

The maiden, too, tires of the quiet of her home, and follows the phantom joy, to the fashionable promenade, the gay party, and the brilliant dance, and though she turns from the empty show, the idle vanity, with aching head and disappointed heart, she cannot yet believe that happiness might more surely be found where her parents smile, and her young brothers con their books around the pleasant fireside.

That which the world calls pleasure is not happiness. Pleasure 'sits a queen in her palace hall,' and calls her votaries around her with music and revelry. She spreads forth tempting viands; she holds out the sparkling wine-cup; she displays the tissued garment, the jewel and the plume; and with honied words and syren smile, she robes her followers and leads them to the banquet; but deceit is in the word and smile, poison lurketh in the cup, and satiety renders tasteless the viands; and like the skeleton at the feast of the Egyptians, there is often something amid the mirth and song to sadden the unquiet heart, something which bids it ask if this be all? if pleasure brings no more than this?

Not so with Happiness. She shuns the glaring light, the giddy crowd, and the palace hall; but where two or three are met together in some shady grove or quiet spot, she comes with her soft smile and her beaming eye. When the gay motions and glad voices of childhood call forth our affection; when we minister to the wants, and sympathize with the feelings of those around; when we walk in the path of duty, be that path ever so difficult; when we overcome temptation, or yield willingly to the will of Heaven, or sit in the sanctuary with hushed and humble hearts, then Happiness is beside us, she takes us by the hand, and we are blest. She has not left the earth, as some would teach us, for a home in the skies, and we need not go far in search of her, for she will come to us. Wherever the sweet waters of affection are welling up pure from the heart; wherever holy love kindles a flame which the floods cannot quench or the waves drown; wherever mind triumphs over matter, and virtue comes forth from its trials, like fine gold which the furnace has purified; there, is happiness; in the loving, the purified, the trusting heart she finds her home.

She is not the handmaid of wealth, or grandeur, or fame; for the coffers may be full, while the heart is burdened with care, and dead to every noble or generous emotion; a name may be sounded wide over the land, while its owner is the victim of despair, with a heart full of envy and all unholy passions; and the multitude may bow in adulation around an idol, who will seek for a true friend among them in vain.

'For the most loved are they,
Of whom Fame speaks not with her clarion-voice
In regal halls!—the shades o'erhang their way,
The vale, with its deep fountains, is their choice,
And gentle hearts rejoice
Around their steps!—till silently they die,
As a stream shrinks from summer's burning eye.'

There was one who left the shades which would have sheltered him from many of the storms of life, and its fiery trials, though in the valley where his fathers had lived and died, love, and peace, and plenty wooed him to remain; but ambition had taken him up into an high mountain and showed him the wealth of the world, and the glory which seemed to follow it, till his soul was filled with brilliant visions and wild desires; and he turned away from the fond heart and tearful eyes of which he had become the idol, to seek the yellow dross that perishes in using; the wreath which pains the brow; or the empty name that is shouted for a season by the fickle crowd. His desires were granted. Wealth poured her treasures at his feet; the green crown wreathed his locks, and his name and titles were familiar words in the streets of the city. But the once kind and generous heart had become hardened by contact with the world and its selfishness; his hoarded gold dispensed no blessings to the destitute, and brought no real joy to the possessor; the wreath won in the political arena soon lost its freshness; and the name which had no virtuous deeds to grace it, was soon forgotten. At last, when youth, and hope and peace were flown, he turned again with seared and saddened heart to his early home. One, who might have been his bride, had wept over his neglect and forgetfulness, till she faded away from earth, and the long grass now grew above her true and gentle heart. Other familiar names were written in the church-yard; he asked for the loved ones, but they came not back, and as the memories of his early and sinless years, rushed over his spirit; his soul was subdued within him; and he wept to think how widely he had wandered from life's peaceful and pleasant places, and how far he had fled her sweet paths in his vain search for happiness.

'WE HAVE BEEN FRIENDS TOGETHER.'

BY MISS C. A. FILLEBROWN.

WE have been friends together, in happy days lang syne—
My heart has felt thy sorrows, and thou hast shared in mine;
But now alas! that holy light has vanished from thy brow—
We have been friends together—why are we parted now?

We have walked and sat together 'neath the solemn forest shades—

We have laughed and sung together in the green and sunny glades—

And are they all forgotten now, those blithe and gladsome days,

And shall those ancient words, no more re-echo to our lays?

Through the gay resorts of pleasure have our merry footsteps roved—

We have wept sad tears together, by the graves of those we loved—

And though the silver chord is loosed, let memory whisper thee

'We have been friends together, if never more we be.'

We have been friends together, and oh 'tis hard to part
The tendrils that have twined so close, around my inmost heart—

Nor mine alone—for still, despite the coldness of thine eye,
I'm sure thou canst not quite forget the sunny hours gone by.

And when thy thoughts turn wearily to muse upon the past,
And thy mind reverts to former days, too beautiful to last,—
Then let Faith's angel-finger point thy glistening eyes above,

Where broken friendships are unknown, for all is perfect Love!

THE FAMILY BURYING GROUND.

If there is a place for meditation, a spot to call up thrilling scenes or summon the feelings of the past, it is the family burying ground. In a retired but verdant spot, surrounded by beautiful trees, which annually yield their rich and mellow fruit, guarded alike from the intrusion of the crowd, the noise of business, or the bustling of the wily politician, are the graves of our household. Here are the remains of the aged grandsire and matron, the blooming cherub of a few months, and the infant of a day old. Here too is the grave of my father! and as I lay aside the rose bush which, like virtue, yields continual fragrance to read the inscription, I am struck with a feeling of profound reverence.

'Each duty done, as sinks the clay,
Light from its load the spirit flies,
While heaven and earth conspire to say—
Sweet is the scene where virtue dies.'

This was placed on his tombstone not for a vain boast, but because of its literal fulfilment. Thoughts unutterable spring up as I recall the past. Mountains and valleys, rivers and streamlets, separated us for a few short months, and while I reveled in joy, in the luxuriance of happiness, the buoyancy of hope, and the anticipation of a happy meeting, I dreamed not of the trial that awaited me. I left him in all the strength and vigor of manhood; I found him quietly laid in his last resting place.

What a treasure is memory! How many scenes of by gone days are brought before me as I recall the past. I linger with pleasure on the contemplation of the many tokens of parental love, the sunny visions of youth, its bright and joyous dreams, its early but enduring affections. 'Its memories cling round my heart like hopes of heaven.'

O thou unrelenting past! Thou hast my better years, my youthful hopes, my dearest friends. Thou hast the good and true, the kind and venerable. Infancy with its helplessness, childhood in its mirth, youth in its buoyancy, and manhood in all its pride and promise, are yielded up to thy dominion. My spirit yearns for the loved and the lost. An intense desire struggles in my wayward breast to draw back thy bolts, and live again with thy captives. Unhallowed thought! Unholy desire! Thy gates are securely barred. The streaming eye or the bursting heart will never call them back to life. Beauty and excellence are hid in thy abyss; earth's wonder and pride, the good and the faithful, the charitable and the wise with their labors of love, in thy folds are gathered together as waters to the sea. Undying affection, imperishable love,—love that commenced in hope, that grew with years, that was nurtured with grief, that struggled with misfortune, and that faltered not even in death, are thine,—inevitably thine. Thine for a little space, but not forever. Thou hast not the Eternal keys. Inexorable as thou art, thou shalt yield up thy treasures. There is a Power above thee over which thou canst not everlastingly triumph. Thy chains shall fall at the Almighty fiat.

Thy gates shall open before the King of Kings, and all that from earliest time was good and true, and lovely and glorious, shall come forth released from thy relentless sway, in all its prime and beauty.

'They have not perished,—No,
Kind words, remembered voices once so sweet,
Smiles radiant long ago,
And features the great soul's apparent seat,' shall all come back again. Each kindred tie shall be united, each fond affection shall be renewed, each blasted hope shall spring up with renovated vigor. Nought shall be subject to thy sway, or dwell in thy dark domain but sorrow. Then shall I again behold my early friends, the children of my love, the husband of my choice, and him by whose paternal side I grew, and who cherished and watched me even in maturer years.

PROGRESS TOWARDS TRUTH:

OR THE TWO FRIENDS.

BY HENRY BACON.

CHAPTER V.

'To be driven by external motives from the path which our own heart approves; to give way to anything but conviction; to suffer the opinion of others to rule our choice or overpower our resolves, is to submit tamely to the lowest and most ignominious slavery, and to resign the right of directing our lives.' Rambler, 185.

WHEN Ellinor returned to her home, she was much interested by the earnestness with which her cousin reasoned against using reason in matters of religion, but as she deemed it idle to return like coin, she permitted her to talk on till she had finished. When there came a pause, she thus addressed her: 'You have heard Clara, of what is called the "Analogy of Faith"—haven't you?'

'Yes, our minister alluded to it last Sabbath, but I did not know what he meant.'

'Well, it is easily explained, and I have thought much of adopting it in my search for Truth, as Mary recommended.'

'O, I suppose then it is some Universalist scheme, but I thought our minister spoke in favor of it.'

'He might have spoken in favor of it, but certainly it is no Universalist scheme, for I looked out the reference in Buck's Theological Dictionary, as Mary recommended. Let me read it.'

'Certainly—my father thinks every thing of that book.'

'Well, here it is;—"The Analogy of Faith is the proportion that the doctrines of the gospel bear to each other, or the close connection between the truths of revealed religion. This is considered as a grand rule for understanding the true sense of Scripture. It is evident that the Almighty doth not act without a design in the system of Christianity any more than he does in the works of nature. Now this design must be uniform; for as in the system of the universe every part is proportioned to the whole, and made subservient to it, so in the system of the gospel all the various truths, doctrines, declarations, precepts, and promises, must correspond with and tend to the end designed. For instance, suppose the glory of God in the salvation of man by free grace, be the grand design; then, whatever doctrine, assertion, or hypothesis, agree not with this, it is to be considered as false." There, when I read that first, I determined in my own mind, God helping! that I would make it my rule of study; and my resolution to do this, was strengthened by reading some biographies of great discoverers in science and philosophy.'

'How did such biographies strengthen your will?'

'They strengthened my will, because I saw that the greatest discoveries had been made by persevering study to see what phenomena would agree with a given principle, and what harmony could be made by adopting a certain view of things. Thus it was with Newton, when he conceived the existence of the great law of Gravity or Attraction; he went from thought to thought, till "the whole material universe was spread out before him;—the sun with all his attending planets; the planets with all their satellites; the comets wheeling in every direction in their eccentric orbits; and the systems of the fixed stars stretching to the remotest limits of space."'

'Why, Ellinor, you are getting quite scientific!'

'It is best to be a little scientific in the formation of religious opinions, that if ever we get a hope, we may be able to give a reason for it, "to every one that asketh."'

'Well, I suppose that's right—'

'Suppose! Why, the apostle Peter, in so many words, lays it down as a duty (1 Peter iii. 15); and I'm determined to be able, at least, to give to my own conscience a reason for what I shall adopt as true.'

'I see you are in earnest; but be careful you do not yield to Mary—for only think, the Universalists are a good-for-nothing sort of people.'

'A people is one matter,—what is truth? altogether another. The whole religious world was against Galileo when he asserted the stability of the sun and the moving of the earth; and though it was said that none but infidels believed as he did, or professed to believe, yet now his opinion is universally received. I ask not what Judas betrayed, nor what Peter denied, nor what Thomas doubted, nor why the Corinthians were dissipated, nor wherefore the Thessalonians were idle and busy bodies; but I ask—What is Truth? for I know the truth must be favorable to virtue, however much men may have failed to endear it to their moral affections or to practise it. We read of "holding the truth in unrighteousness," (Rom. i. 18) but the unrighteousness did not alter the truth—did it?

'Why—no; but I think we ought to inquire whether the religious and the learned believe the doctrine or not.'

'I thought so once—but I read of persons in our Savior's time who rejected him because the religious and the learned, as they were deemed, were against him, and it was thought sufficient to ask, "Have any of the rulers believed on him?"' (John vii. 48). Yet I find by my reading that it is now, as in ancient times, many believed, but confess not, (John xii. 42, 43), and these facts seem so much like the accounts detailed in the history of opposition to great reformers in philosophy and science, that I have become completely free from the vanity of receiving opinions because great men believed them.'

'You are getting proud quite fast.'

'That may be. I feel a pride of mind to use my own reason to find out if I have a heavenly Father, and whether he loves me or not, without reference to how few or how many may be with me in opinion.'

The cousins continued their conversation for a long time, and it was evident that Ellinor had caught a portion of Mary's enthusiasm, and that Clara was in danger of imbibing the same. She had been awakened also to think—to think! that loftiest power of the human soul, by which the rich gifts bestowed on human nature are discerned and appreciated. How little does the great mass of professing Christians think—how little do they search into the real nature of the opinions they avow, and compare the doctrines involved in those opinions with the plain declarations of Scripture! But when once the soul is waked to the luxury of thought, and the divine influence of strong thinking pervades the whole being, as the cooling and vivifying influence of a sweet draught from a mountain spring on a summer's day, the spirit will not easily be made to yield the delight. The soul feels invigorated as by the mountain air, and the element of thought is found to be the element of health and true vivacity.

Ere Clara parted from her cousin, she was careful to renew her cautions, and to warn her that if she ever did adopt Universalist views, she must expect to be held in less esteem in social life. O it was a beautiful sight to see the queenly dignity with which Ellinor responded to these remarks, her countenance suffused with warmth of feeling, and her bright eyes flashing with brilliancy. There was that in her tone which told of the new passion that had been kindled in her soul—the passion for Truth—for that which God had revealed, and not for that which man had invented.

'I shall be held in less esteem, shall I? Well, be it so—if I find cause to receive Universalism as Truth. To sacrifice the good will of those who love opinions more than character, is but a small offering at the shrine of Truth and Duty compared with that which Jesus offered. If truth is unpopular, I'll not be a hypocrite to uphold the unpopularity, but that which I believe, I will confess and advocate firmly and truly. It is by what we do and bear for the Truth, that we test the depth of our sincerity, the strength of our convictions, and the value we set on Truth. You see I am resolved.'

'Yes!' answered Clara soberly, 'I do see you are resolved, and I mourn for the consequences.'

'What do you mean? I may not understand you precisely.'

'I mean that you will become a Universalist, for I have never known one who has cast off what you are casting off, who did not become attached to that faith. It is dangerous, and if you adopt it nothing can save you.'

'Nay, cousin, think not so. To do the commandments, will insure the favor of God.'

'True!' quickly responded Clara, as though a bright thought had dawned upon her,—'True! but to believe is one of the commandments.'

'What is it to believe?'

'Why, to be fully convinced of the truth or reality of any thing.'

'If so, then I shall believe when I am fully convinced, if ever I am, of the truth of Universalism.'

'O no! you must believe the Gospel.'

'What is the Gospel?'

'The Gospel—the gospel—Why, it is Christianity.'

'And what is Christianity?'

'Christianity is the doctrines Christ taught—to be sure.'

'Yes, and "to be sure" that we understand what are the doctrines of Christ is no unimportant matter. If I study and after I make all the effort of which I am capable, I am "fully convinced" that endless sin and evil is not a doctrine taught by Jesus, shall I not "believe" when I cherish the doctrine of eternal holiness and good for all?'

'But you must not be so convinced; you must receive the evidence of the truth of eternal death.'

'I am ready to receive it and examine it. A court receives all kinds of evidence, but it is another thing to so impress the minds of the jurors as to make them believe it. Belief is not voluntary.'

'You are quibbling, Ellinor. "You should'nt trifle with sacred subjects,"' said Clara, very solemnly.

'I plead "not guilty" to that charge. I have spoken very soberly, for I never felt such a solemnity in all my life before. When I look around upon humanity and consider what a vast majority have not the means of believing Christianity, how few of those who have the means use them, and yet how few of those who do use them are faithful, I am filled with horror when I contemplate what must be eternity, if your doctrines are true! It is the worst possible view of things, and we should not adopt it without the strongest and most conclusive reasons.'

'We have them in the law of God,' replied Clara, '—in the penalties affixed to transgressions, and in the death of Jesus.'

'Those considerations afford the strongest and most conclusive reasons—do they? How shall I know it? how shall I choose between weak and strong, conclusive or inconclusive, reasons? I must exert my reason, or dignify credulity with the name of faith.'

'I see, said Clara, there is no use of talking, and so I'll bid you good bye. Come to see us soon. Francis will be home next week.'

The cousins parted—the one perplexed and troubled, the other marvelling why she felt so strong, why she had such elevation of spirit, why she desired so much to swell a chorus of praise with angels. Into her soul a new life had come; she turned to the Bible as to a book of wondrous enchantment, and bowed down before it as though it were, as a material thing, holy. It was a small neat copy which Mary had given her, to keep ever in her mind what she had frequently told her—'Believe nothing, receive nothing, merely because I receive and believe it. The Bible, and the Bible only, is the religion of Protestants.' She kissed it as the ardent Catholic maiden does her crucifix, or as she seals thus a vow on her rosary; and when this tumultuous feeling subsided, she knelt down and prayed. Never had she been so near to God before—never had there entered her soul such a heavenly bliss. She rose, and went about her tasks with a cheerful spirit, and her duty became her pleasure.

The Bible! is it the religion of Protestants? We feel it is too much the religion of Protestants as a material thing—as a book; and too little as a revelation of doctrines to be believed and duties to be done. When a new doctrine professedly founded on the Bible is broached, crowds will arise and furiously declaim on 'unsanctified reason'—'daring impiety,' and 'dreadful and dangerous tendencies,' who, at the same time, have never studied the Scriptures, nor given them one hundredth part as much consideration as they do their account books, their field, or 'labor saving machines.' The time is fast approaching when men shall hear the voice that commands them to THINK—the voice of the infinite God!—and obey it. Then shall they see that the fanaticism of our day had its origin, and received its food, from the consequences of blind subjection to the God-denying and man-degrading usurpation of spiritual teachers or dictators. But the judgment is even now upon master and slave. The clergy in many places are powerless to stay the increasing current of Millerism, and why? Why! because they have cultivated a blind reception of dogmas—a passive acquiescence in the most terrific views of the future in order to be on the 'safe side'—and because the weapons forged on the anvil of Orthodoxy to conquer Universalism are the very ones used by these desolating fanatics, and to break one of these does a double work—it proves that they were at fault at first in making the weapons, and second, it will destroy the best swords and spears with which they warred according to their motto—cut and kill Universalism. Had Universalian views of prophecy been received, Millerism never would have had a name, and the fanaticism that now destroys so much happiness would never have existed. Would to God that the Bible—its everlasting truths—all that makes it 'The Book'—were the 'Religion of Protestants!'

OBITUARIES.

DIED in Lancaster, August last, Miss ANN ELIZABETH, youngest daughter of Capt. Joseph Farwell, aged 17 years.

We wish the name of this young lady recorded here, because she was a good girl, and one who lived and died in the exercise of our most holy faith. Though not personally acquainted with her, we have been told that she possessed a most amiable disposition, and a temper mild, affectionate, and patient to the last. For many months we had been accustomed to see her in her wonted seat at church, till admiration of her meek, pleasant face, became almost a necessary link in the chain of our religious emotions; and the vacant seat in the family pew never meets our eyes without awakening pensive and almost regretful feeling that one so young, so devotional, and so dear to the hearts of her friends, should have been so suddenly removed from our midst. God be with and strengthen those whose hearts have been afflicted by this stroke of His chastening hand; and may the memory of her virtues, of the patient fortitude with which she endured her painful illness, and the calm faith which supported her through the trying hour of dissolution, cast ever a soothing light over the darkness of their bereavement.

There is a vacant place in our old church,
And the young, tranquil face is gone
That used to fix its earnest look of love
And holy reverence on the man of God.
That fair young face is gone. We miss its light
As old astronomers amid the host
Of glittering stars, missed from its wonted place
The vanished Pleiad. But we know its light
Has been rekindled at the shrine of God,
And shineth now amid the radiant host
Of those who worship in His heavenly courts
With blissful songs, and an undying love. S. C. E.

WE give, by request, the following Obituary from the 'Christian Freeman.'

'DIED in New Boston, Conn., Oct. 11th, of consumption, MOSES D. BARNES of Andover, Mass., son of Joel Barnes of the former place, aged 29 years.

By this early demise a family has been broken, society has lost one of its principal ornaments, and the church at Andover, has been bereft of one of its main pillars. The affectionate husband, the kind father, the honored son, the beloved brother, the faithful friend and devoted christian, is gone—gone in early life. But early as he has gone, he has left behind him a name which will be embalmed in the memories of all who knew him, and a life which we trust will be sanctified to the good of many—many hearts. His name is a good name, better than "precious ointment;" and his life is one we may all imitate; for it is a golden link in that chain by which we ascend upward to the great Pattern of all excellence.

Br. Barnes was a good man; he was one who in the fullest sense lived so that they "of the contrary part" had no evil to say of him. Few men ever lived who combined more sterling traits of character than he. He seemed to possess all the virtues and none of the vices of mankind. In religious faith he was a Universalist. He lived in the practical enjoyment of this faith, and in death it sustained him. "Do not," said he to a friend a few days before he died, "do not mourn for me; I have a faith that sustains me now." And it did sustain him; he suffered without a murmur, and calmly, serenely, and sweetly fell asleep in Jesus. He often expressed a wish to live for his wife's and child's sake, but if it was God's will he was ready to go. He felt confident of meeting all his friends in another world, and herein did his faith give him great comfort and support. Nought but this could have sustained him in that hour. Nor does he shine as a religious man alone. All who knew him, loved him. In the counting-room he was esteemed for his unbending integrity and faithful application to business. And in all the relations of life whether as husband, father, child, brother, friend or citizen, he shone forth with a peculiar brightness, and a brightness that has made his name precious to all our hearts. We weep, and 'tis well; for in this we but imitate our blessed Lord and Master. We mourn, but not without hope; for "we know if this house of our earthly tabernacle were dissolved we have a building of God, an house not made with hands eternal in the heavens." We feel the wound that our Heavenly Father has inflicted upon us; but while we thus feel and most deeply feel that we are severely stricken, we do not forget that we have a faith which of all others is best calculated to enable us to meet this severe dispensation. "In the midst of darkness, therefore we are in the light;" and we do not forget in the loss we have sustained, that "whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth." We will, therefore, trust in the Lord though he slay us.

TESTIMONY OF GOD, IN THE HUMAN SOUL.

I ADDUCE what seems to me a convincing proof of the existence of an all-pervading Spirit, an omnipresent Being, from the simple fact, that we sometimes feel grateful emotions, arising spontaneously, towards some other object than our own species. When we, in contemplative mood, have recounted the blessings we enjoy,—when we have been rejoicing in health, surrounded by friends, and participating in delights provided for us without reference to any foresight or after-sight of merit in us,—have we not sometimes felt thankful? Has not an emotion we could not utter in words, a grateful feeling we could not exactly define, arisen in our minds? Towards whom, or what, did we cherish this emotion? To the dumb, inanimate things of earth? Certainly not. We never feel any gratitude towards the soil, that is rich and fertile; nor to the trees laden with fruit; nor to any of the unintelligent mediums and channels of good. But we do feel grateful towards some object. We feel the uprisings of this gratitude, till it matures to adoration; and this, of itself, without the utterance of the tongue, is a voice, speaking to the heart, of the Father of mercies. 'Tis the divinity that stirs within us.' It is the vibrating of a chord in our souls, when they thrill in delightful harmony with the great Spiritual Harp.

SELECTIONS.

THE WAY TO MAKE MEN BETTER. A zealous man hath not done his duty, when he calls his brother 'drunkard' and 'beast;' and he may better do it by telling him he is a man, and sealed with God's spirit, and honored with the title of a christian, and is, or ought to be, reputed as a discreet person by his friends, and a governor of a family, or a guide in his country, or an example to many, and that it is huge pity so many excellent things should be sullied and alloyed with what is so much below all this. Then a re-prover does his duty, when he is severe against the vice, and charitable to the man, and careful of his reputation, and sorry for his real dishonor, and observant of his circumstances, and watchful to surprise his affections and resolutions there, where they are most tender and most tenable; and men will not be in love with virtue, whither they are forced with rudeness and incivilities; but they love to dwell there whither they are invited friendly, and where they are treated civilly, and feasted liberally, and led by the hand and the eye to honor and felicity.

JEREMY TAYLOR.

I AM rich enough, says Pope to Swift, and can afford to give away 100 pounds a year. I would not crawl upon the earth without doing a little good. I will enjoy the pleasure of what I give, by giving it alive, and seeing another enjoy it. When I die, I should be ashamed to leave enough for a monument, if there were a friend in want above ground.

EDITOR'S BOOK TABLE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., DECEMBER, 1842.

The Book of the Year, in Twelve Chapters. Chapter Twelfth, unfinished.

The last chapter of the Book of the Year is being written; the whole will soon be completed, and sent forth from the press of Time. How varied are the contents of this strange volume! How perpetually do our feelings alternate from joy to sorrow as we turn over its mystically written pages! How much would each reader strike out, and how much he would like to have printed in bolder relief! But there, it will be unalterable, and he only is wise who reads it as it is, and learns from the past to better estimate the present and prepare for the future. We commend it for this purpose to all; we must read it for ourselves, solemnly and earnestly. Another volume will soon be put to press, but of its character we know nothing. Yet how often are we more interested in that which is in embryo, than in that which has been brought forth; and thus, too often, we let go that which would make the coming issue far more honorable to us—its details of our 'life and doings' more consistent and beautiful. How many give hours to the records of the flying visit of 'Boz' to our land, who are not willing to yield scarcely a moment to read carefully the Book of the Year! Yet how much more important are the records in that book, than all the 'Notes for general circulation' ever sent forth to the world.

Life of Washington. By Jared Sparks. Abridged by the author. Boston: Published by Tappan & Dennet. 1842. 2 vols. Pp. 330 and 344.

The sight of this work is as pleasant as a beautiful field of wheat waving in golden richness ready for the harvest. It is an evidence of patient labor well directed, and eminently does it 'give seed to the sower and bread to the eater.' Jared Sparks is a fine, clear, and strong writer. His historical researches are highly honorable to his industry, and his discriminating use of them evidences the superior talent and tact he possesses as an accomplished Historian and Biographer. The work now upon our Table is to be placed among the chief 'elect and precious,' and when a decided taste for such works shall be formed in community, a brighter star of promise will rise than now shines in the American firmament. We are confident that among the many minor volumes on the same great theme, the work before us will be the chosen one. Its author has been favored with materials of great value which have not been within the reach of others, and by them he has been able to present matters of importance and interest not found elsewhere.

The Author, it is well known, has been engaged on a stupendous work entitled 'The Writings of Washington,' in twelve octavo volumes. 'The materials have been drawn from a great variety of sources; from the Manuscripts at Mount Vernon, papers in the public offices of London, Paris, Washington, and all the old Thirteen States; and also from the private papers of many of the principal leaders of the Revolution. The entire mass of manuscripts left by General Washington, consisting of more than two hundred folio volumes, was in the author's hands ten years. From these materials it has been his aim to select and combine the most important facts, tending to exhibit in their true light the character, actions, and opinions of Washington.' The volumes before us are an abridgment of the first volume of the large work containing his life. 'The omissions are mostly of a political and general nature.' The work deserves an extensive circulation, and will add richness to any social or family library. It should also be in our Society and Sabbath School Libraries.

The Publishers have done themselves great credit by issuing the work in so elegant a style, even superior in typographical beauty to the 'American Biography.' We are enchanted by the exquisite profile portrait.

[The Publishers of the 'Abridgment' are now engaged in publishing the large work—The Life—in monthly numbers, fourteen completing the set—the first was published August first. Each number is to contain between 40 and 50 pages; and during the issue fourteen fine steel and copper-plate engravings will be given. (See Advertisement on the Cover.) Nearly 4,000 subscribers have been already obtained, and among these are a large number of the most eminent men in the country. Agents for this Magazine can receive subscribers.

Tales of Shipwrecks and other Disasters at Sea. By Thomas Bingley. Embellished with Engravings. Boston: Tappan & Dennet. 1842. Pp. 224.

This is a very pretty book of stories of the sea, told in a simple and interesting style. The volume contains enough of the terrific to satisfy the common love of the awful, and will give some idea to young minds of the evils to which those are exposed who 'go down to the sea in ships.'

[We have received circulars concerning several works, but there is nothing in mere circulars to inspire us to write. We do no guess work, though a Yankee.

The Rose of Sharon. The Annual of the Season. A. Tompkins, Boston. $2.

As this is our last issue previous to the incoming of the new year, we, of course, must again ask attention to this work. It needs but to be examined, to be chosen. 'The Knickerbocker' has given a very favorable notice of it, more flattering than we could have hoped for, when we consider the efforts that are made to mark it as a sectarian work. If it is so regarded, we cannot but rejoice at the good influence it will exert, as the tendency of all that has a bearing on religion among its contents cannot be misunderstood, or made, even by prejudice's self, to favor any thing but the purest and loftiest aims in life. We have not seen an unfavorable notice of the Rose for 1843, and this we deem a very encouraging circumstance for the Editor. And notwithstanding the great parade of names connected with the 'Christian Souvenir' for 1843, we cannot see how any one can estimate its literary contents any where near the excellence of the 'Rose.'

We hope that the Christmas and New Year's gifts will exhaust the edition, for what can be more appropriate and beautiful as a Gift at those seasons than the 'Rose of Sharon'?

Discourses on Channing. By Revs. Messrs. Gannet, Pierpont and Clarke, of Boston, Ellis, of Charlestown, Parker, of Roxbury, Bellows, of New-York, and E. B. Hall, of Providence.

The above present quite a variety of Discourses on the death of an eminent and good man. Far, very far beyond all others is the tribute of Mr. Gannet. It is a calm and affectionate and just offering to the memory of one dearly beloved—to one esteemed as man seldom esteems his fellow man. The influence of its perusal, as we contemplated the moral excellence of its theme, reminded us of what Dante said of Beatrice, 'When I think of her, I feel myself in charity with all mankind, and ready to forgive my greatest enemy.' We now understand what Dante meant. Mr. Pierpont's is too hasty a matter,—it does little justice to the preacher's talents, and self is altogether too much obtruded. Mr. Clarke's is a commendable performance, but nothing unusual, though rightly earnest. Mr. Parker's is an eloquent production, with many very fine passages, and here and there a touch that seems to say—'I've the same spirit, and my persecutors shall know it.' Mr. Ellis is on

'the influence of a great mind when imbued with the spirit of the Christian Religion,' and we have no doubt we should have been better pleased with it had not the title caused us to expect more than we found. It is an excellent composition so far as style is concerned, but it impressed us with the fancy—it may be but a fancy—that the author was fearful of betraying enthusiasm, or that he did not feel any. Mr. Bellows' is altogether too much of an effort, pompous sentences which make us forget what should have been the object of the discourse. He came to eulogize, he said, but he mistakes the true idea of an eulogy on such a man as Channing, if he thinks he has done the work. Mr. Hall's is decidedly a good discourse, and is better adapted to give an idea of what Channing was to those whose minds and hearts were not drawn to him while he lived, than any other save Mr. Gannet's. We should rather transmit it to a friend than either of the other five discourses.

We rejoice that so many voices through the length and breadth of our land have spoken of the beauty and glory of that Mind which has done so much for humanity. We rejoice even that some have declared the teaching of their narrow doctrines, and have more than intimated that Channing is 'damned.' Men will see thereby, more clearly than a thousand sermons can make them see, the tendency of those doctrines which overlook moral excellence in devotion to dogmas. Br. Drew, in speaking of this, says, 'The orthodox will never be hung for their charity.' What does he mean by charity? If they think and believe as they speak, what kind of charity requires them to alter their speech? Let them only speak out clearly as they profess to believe, and the mind of community will understand what is the true character of that which commands the respect of man as of divine origin. Let them speak honestly, and men will hate the doctrines which blind the vision to all moral excellence that bears not the stamp of a sect.

Hints on the Interpretation of Prophecy. By Moses Stuart, Professor in Andover Theological Seminary. Andover: Allen, Morrill and Wardwell. New York: Dayton & Newman.

This work has attracted considerable attention, and we give the following notice of it from the New York Tribune as sufficient to give an idea of the production:

'The general attention which is paid to the Scriptural Prophecies, is a marked sign of the present times. Interpreters to be sure have before abounded—and have in various ages created alarm and hope by their divination of the future: but now men of every class—the learned and the unlearned—seem to have turned interpreters, and to have thrown forth their auguries in sermons, lectures or books—one or all—as suited them best. The latest, though neither the largest nor most pretending, work on this subject that has come to our notice, is that of which we have given the title above—written by a gentleman widely known as a learned and able commentator on the Bible. The position he assumes and seeks to maintain are these three:

1. He contends that the Sacred Prophecies do not contain the double or occult sense which is almost universally ascribed to them: but that they bear precisely and only the meaning which their words import.

2. He maintains that Prophecy is perfectly intelligible—even before fulfilled; and that every book is fully interpreted when the exact mind of the writer is unfolded.

3. He insists that, with regard to the designation of time, every passage in Prophecy is to be interpreted as bearing a primary and literal sense: that a prophetic day is not a year, but simply a day: and that therefore all the labor and learning that have been bestowed upon tracing the events of History with a view to adapt them to the Prophecies, on the ground that a prophetic day means really a year, have been quite thrown away.

These are the chief points he seeks to establish: the discussion is conducted with the fairness, ability and learning, which are characteristic of the author; and all men of candor will receive enlightenment and benefit, if they be not convinced of its truth, by reading the work.'

The Hierophant; or a Monthly Expositor of Sacred Symbols and Prophecy. By George Bush. New York: Dayton & Newman.

The Lectures of Professor Bush on Prophecy, have attracted considerable attention through the Reports published in the New York Tribune, and it seems that this work is to embody the researches given in those lectures and whatever of knowledge may be obtained by subsequent or future studies. The name of the work is meaningless to the mass of mind, but signifies 'The Expounder of Sacred Mysteries.' It was commenced in June last, and the numbers thus far have been of an interesting character. The tendency of some of his opinions may be judged of from the fact, that he has been spoken against as favoring Universalism by his system of interpretation!

The work is very handsomely printed; each number contains 24 pages; and the price is $1.50 per year.

Lowell Offering. Published at Lowell, Mass.

We have received from our friend, the editor, the first number of the third volume of this interesting publication. The former proprietor, on removing from Lowell, transferred the work to Mr. Schouler, by whom it was united with the 'Operative's Magazine,' and placed under the editorial charge of one of the former contributors to the 'Offering.' The work is therefore now not only supplied with articles from the 'mill-girls,' but also edited by one of the number. As our copy, above alluded to, happens just now to be 'borrowed,' we cannot notice it so particularly as we desire. The best piece, according to our judgment, is that on 'Pocahontas,' whose character is very ably and beautifully delineated in a brief outline of her history. Some very pretty verses to Queen Victoria open the volume. There is also a poem of considerable merit, illustrating the pretty mezzotint—'The Bridge of Sighs'—by Sartain, by which this number is embellished.

The editor, among her notices, speaks of the one exchange with which the 'Offering' is favored. Let our publishers in future be more gallant; they will lose the reading of many fine articles by their neglect, as well as fail of receiving the notice of one of the most talented writers in New England.

☞ We should deem ourselves just did we not insert the above, inasmuch as the 'Offering' has not been sent to us for a long time. It has 'long, long ago,' been sent to us, and we have noticed it and then—we received it no more. What is meant by the one exchange? Ours has been sent—or, at least, so have we directed.

New Hymn Book. By George Rogers. Cincinnati, O. 1842.

We learn by the 'Star in the West,' that Br. Rogers is about issuing his new hymn book which has been promised long. It is now stereotyped, and of course, will soon be in the market. It will contain 668 hymns, arranged under 45 heads, embracing a great variety of metres, 'from grave to gay, from lively to severe.' It will doubtless be found an excellent collection, perhaps better adapted to the West than any hymn book now in use.

The new hymn book is to be substantially bound in sheep, at 75 cts. the single copy, 62 1-2 cts. by the dozen. To wholesale dealers, a liberal discount will be made.

A Funeral Sermon, occasioned by the death of Moses D. Barnes, of Andover, Mass. By Wm. H. Griswold. Boston: A. Tompkins. 1842. Pp. 16.

This is a good sermon. The heart of the preacher was evidently in his work; we see the friend in the eulogist, and cannot but admire the sincerity and earnestness with which he weaves a chaplet for the tomb of the dead. It is well to let the world know how the deaths of the faithful disciples speak—what voices come from the past of their lives to impart wisdom to those to whom the present is given for virtuous and heroic action. We thank the author for our copy.

THE UNIVERSALIST AND LADIES' REPOSITORY.

JANUARY 1843.

HE GIVETH SNOW LIKE WOOL. Ps 147:16.

BY HENRY BACON. 147:16 Ps.

THE poet of the seasons, in the sublime hymn of praise which embodies his theology, has expressed himself in the strongest language in reference to the manifestations of God in the shifting scenes of the rolling year.

'These as they change, Almighty Father, these Are but the varied God.'

The peculiarities of each season, the adaptations to human good, and the harmonies of the relations of each to the others, present to the eye of wise contemplation varied manifestations of the Sovereign Deity. Not, as some unpoetical minds have charged upon Thomson, that he would represent the Deity as variable, and thus assist in countenancing a theology which regards God as altogether such a being as man. He looked on nature as the sacred writers did, as the garments by which the Divinity is seen, or the medium by which he manifests the attributes of his unsearchable perfection. And this philosophy is of the highest worth, inasmuch as by a thousand tokens it preserves in the soul a consciousness of the presence of God, and that consciousness has an intimate relation to every thing of moral goodness and mental loftiness. To the poet it whispers of the ministries of infinite Grace as he looks out upon visible beauty and strengthens his perception of nature's loveliness; and as he sings of the blooming beauties, or the solemn grandeur, or the astounding magnificence of the world without, he does not simply stand upon the Alpine summit, or ride upon the clouds, or visit the stars, but he penetrates all the veils that hide the Deity from grosser eyes, and pays his adoration in the third heaven of glory, before the very throne of Light. And it is this that gives the mightiest power to his song—that causes his theme to satisfy the deep heart and bring refreshment to the aspiring spirit that would feel more and more of God. Aye, without this, there is no true poetry, and from the lyre can spring no sound which shall travel to the most secret and holiest chambers of the soul and live there as an everlasting echo, like the eternal voice of the sea, which in its lowest murmurs and in its hoarsest thunders utters—God!

This is the philosophy of the Psalmist's declaration, 'He giveth snow like wool.' It teaches a divine lesson in the falling snow, giving far better than natural beauty. As we look upon the wavy, descending flakes, robing the earth with a warm garment, and crowning hill and tree and tower, which when touched with the golden light of the unveiled sun or moon, will remind us of the silver-haired old man radiant with goodness,—as we look thus on the Snow coming down in purity, we should remember by whose laws it is so, that it is a gift and a rich one, and that not only in appearance, but in reality, it is given like wool.

We need this God-discerning philosophy. Not the pantheistic mysticism that makes the phenomena of nature to be Deity, and the changing seasons literally 'the varied God;' but that poetical sentiment which sees the character of a Mind in the works its wisdom has given birth to, or wrought out. Earth's beauty is heaven's veil; but God is not the veil he has drawn between the outer court of the great universe-temple and the holy of holies. Within the veil—beyond all that we can see, is the presence of God. But through all we see He shines, as in the Temple of Israel the presence of the Deity was also without the veil; and therefore, there was the table of shew-bread, or 'bread of the presence,' and the soul of the believer felt God visited him.

The sacred writers in guarding us from pantheism, keep us also at an equal distance from the Epicurian idea. They do not seek to exalt God by deifying second causes and enthroning the Sovereign above all concern for his works. They rather speak of him as acting directly—as touching the first spring of all motion, and imparting to the first link of the great chain of causes the electricity of power that leaps from link to link through the whole range and pervades the earth with its vitality. And thus it was that the omnipresence of God was a felt-truth; and hence we read, 'Whatsoever the Lord pleased, that did he in heaven, and in earth, and in the seas, and all deep places. He causeth the vapors to descend from the ends of the earth; he maketh lightnings for the rain;

he bringeth the wind out of his treasures.' And thus it was with the great Teacher when he taught of the Deity's impartiality: 'He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust.' And so also with the Apostles: 'He left not himself without witness, in that he did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness.' 'In him we live, and move, and have our being'—dwelling surrounded by his presence as by the atmosphere we breathe.

This is the philosophy which we need to give us a wise insight to the presence of God in nature; to bid us speak of its phenomena and to study them, with a reverent spirit; to enable us to exercise a proper temper of mind when the cloudy vapor and stormy wind which do God's bidding, operate against the desires we cherish and the works we would perform; and to welcome every aid to the unfolding of scientific truth and the evolving of the facts of natural theology, that we may acquaint ourselves more with God, apply his laws of action, and constantly feel that 'he is not far from every one of us.' This is the spirit which will defend us from the foolish fears and vain surmises that have done so much to retard the progress of science and the consequent advancement of Art; and this is also the spirit that will keep the mind in a proper mood for patient discussion of its own and others' thoughts, preventing the outbreaking of volcanoes that do not 'minister good to man.'

Are not these reflections suitable and in some degree effectual, to cause us to reverentially consider the sentiment of the Hebrew bard—'He giveth snow like wool.' To so consider it, as that when our own individual comfort is lessened by the storm, or its fury spreads around the elements of suffering, we may remember the idea which the idea expresses, and be led thereby to religious thought and action;—thought that shall quiet our own mind, and action that shall bless and benefit others.

The language of the Poet first treats of the descending snow, as a gift bestowed by the Ruler of the elements—He giveth snow. A gift is an outward act expressive of invisible mind; and the more we are able to enter 'the treasures of the snow,' the more we shall see the divine benevolence in its various phenomena.

It is not a trifling matter to pause here and acknowledge the gratification afforded to the sense of beauty by the feathery snow—to some a great gratification. This, I have said, is not a trifling matter, for whatever ministers to this sense exalts man, redeems mind from a sensual thralldom, and breathes into the soul a diviner life. It makes him conscious, if conscious at all of the divinity of his make, that God benevolently constituted us to enjoy life—to look abroad with an open and glad eye, and feel as the poet felt:

'O, what a deathless beauty lies
Upon this world of ours!
By night, it has its starry eyes,
By day, its eyes of flowers;
Its very tempests walk the skies
To give the rainbow birth;
And every where, methinks, love lies
Upon this blessed earth!'

If the outward does take the hues of our own spirits, it is certainly of the highest importance to keep the eye of beauty open and clear and anointed to bear the strongest light which gleams out upon the earth. And not in vain has God given pleasantness to the light of the stars, the rolling clouds, the floating vapor, and the infinite variety of the beautiful above and around us. The law of beauty mingles its element in the fashioning and the descent of the snow, and not for a light matter is it done. In every clime the snow visits, it has its aspect of beauty, and the poet's song has praised it. Not less to the deep searching and severely scrutinizing philosopher is pleasure from this source given, than to those who are contented with the surface of materiality—imaginative creatures whose spirits leap merrily in tune with the dancing snow. To such, it has its aspect of glittering purity, its fantastic evolutions, its eccentric forms, and its adornments of the landscape in dazzling beauty. In other climes, where it finds a lodgment only on the highest mountains and loftiest hills, it is a hoary crown of exquisite loveliness, as the thoughtful mind reflects how it will there cool the hot and feverish winds that rush toward the valleys and plains in the summer season, and be thereby robbed of pestilential power. And he thinks also how that the same intense heat that will dry up the brooks, streams, and even the rivers, will melt those treasures of snow, and the glad waters will leap down the rough rocks to their relief, and fill again the exhausted channels. He thinks also, how from among the harvesters will go out the pitcher bearer to the cascades amid the rocks, and bring from thence the delicious refreshment—so delicious as to suggest to Solomon a happy metaphor;—'As the cold of snow in the time of harvest, so is a faithful messenger to them that send him; for he refresheth the soul of his masters.' He thinks also, how to many a weak and sickly one it will be borne as the richest draught, and what relief it will afford in the time of burning thirst. And he loves to gaze with fancy's eye and see it fall from the mountain head, as silver hairs from a hoary crown, and deems it one of the most pleasant features of the landscape. But to the calm and cautious thinker who sees beauty only as it comes through philosophical analysis, the snow is a divine gift and is lovely to behold and investigate. He has examined with microscopic precision the falling flakes, and seen how each was a regular crystal, and a hundred varieties in a small collection present themselves. And as he admires their beauties—the perfection of their conformation, if others tell him they are not so attractive as other crystallized substances, not being transparent, he has new admiration awakened by remembering that this want of transparency is caused by the lodgement of air in the pores of the snow, by which it is fitted for bestowing many benefits to the earth and plants—and even to preserve life and afford a dry and warm shelter to those who can have no other. He regards also as beauties in this gift, its extreme whiteness, its lightness, and its low conducting properties. He must continue his analysis by an examination of these properties, in order to discern the beauty of God's wisdom in the gift of the snow. And this examination will lead to a wide range of thought, too wide for me to follow out in the space I can venture here to occupy. Yet it is well to look in thereupon, that a few facts may present themselves to increase the devotional tendencies of our reflections.

Snow is indeed white, but wherefore is it so? Is there any marks of the beauty of divine wisdom in this effect? There is no accident in this, but it is a result of the action of the established laws which relate to colors, in connection with the absorption and radiation of light and heat. 'Consider,' says Prout, 'for a moment, what would have been the consequences if snow had been black, or in other words, if blackness had prevailed in the Polar regions. In this case, all the little light and heat that reach them would have been absorbed, and the effect would have been darkness, more or less complete. From the rapid melting also of the snow on the least exposure to heat and light, we should have been constantly liable to inundations. Thus the whole of the Polar regions of the earth would have been one dark and dreary void, inaccessible to organic life. But by the present arrangement, all these consequences are obviated. The white snow absorbs a certain portion of light and of heat, while so much light is reflected as is useful, and no more. Thus the adjustment of the colors of bodies to the circumstances in which they are placed, constitutes an example of the expedients by which those minor incongruities are obviated, that are necessarily incidental to the modes in which heat and light are distributed over the globe; and presents altogether one of the most obvious and beautiful instances of design connected with the agency of heat and light.' These are hints to an important branch of investigation, leading to beautiful evidences of the benevolence of God in the adaptations and harmonies of the material world; and attention given thereto, would bring forth sweet proofs of design in the whiteness of snow, as in the greenness of the vernal grass and the foliage of Summer, or the gorgeousness of Autumn's robes 'of many colors.'

The extreme lightness of snow, is another wisely ordained property of the gift of snow, which gives it the appearance of wool, as though ten thousand angels were drawing it from an inexhaustible storehouse and scattering it over the earth. A young and imaginative child once expressed the thought that the clouds of softest whiteness were flocks of lambs, and called her mother to see their gambols. Easily she might have carried out her fanciful idea, and deemed a season of snow-falling to be shearing time. Young thoughts have poetry in them—the poetry of innocence. The extreme lightness of snow results from a general law of matter, and in this instance the greatest benefits are seen to result from its application. This lightness 'is owing to the excess of the surface, in comparison to the matter contained in a snow-flake; as gold itself may be extended in surface till it will ride upon the least breath of air.' Were it not for this, what destruction would often ensue—to be computed in some measure by recalling the fatal effects of storms of hail. But by the beautiful law of adaptation, the snow falls gently on the trees of the forest, wood and field, and clothes them in its robes of purity, which shine and glisten in great and witching beauty when the sun returns. I know of no scene more grand that has thus been presented. The snow having continued to fall through the day, the coldness of night brought into closer adhesion its particles, forming over the whole a polished surface, which glitters in the beams of the risen sun, like purest pearl thickly studded with diamonds. Could we bear the intense reflection of light so as to be able to examine this jewelry of Winter—to gaze with a magnifier on its exquisite crystals, what splendid beauty should we behold, what delicate operations of the crystalline laws, what indescribable richness in the minutest forms of endless variety! But we cannot do this, for the attempt would blast our sight; and thus in this unapproachable beauty—in the gift of the snow, we have a type of what eye hath not seen, and in the mortal state cannot see, of the loveliness of the spiritual world. O glorious is the thought of that anointing by our God in the resurrection, which shall give us power to look steadfastly on forms of loveliness that now are veiled in mercy to our feeble vision! God giveth an eye according to the sphere of being in which his creatures are placed; he has given wonderful powers of sight to be developed by wisdom; and when it pleaseth him, he will lay his finger of power on the eye of the soul, and it shall open to take in a vision, the half of the glory of which, it hath not entered into the heart of man to conceive.

To the lightness of snow we owe many other properties by which it is to earth a blessed gift; by which tree, plant, and tender germs, are not crushed, and the earth is like a body clothed in a light woollen garment, which by its lightness permits the body to use and enjoy its warmth. And to the millions of human beings and animals who must bear the falling snow, of how much importance is this consideration of the lightness of these particles of ice! And not of little consequence is this property when we take simply into an account the labor required during a winter in removing the snow from place to place; and as often as we are engaged in this work, we can have cheerful thoughts to lighten our task by recalling these associations.

And this brings us to another property in the gift of snow—its protecting influence. By this I allude to the low conducting properties of snow, by which it is given like wool; covering many parts of the earth, it shields them from the severity of the cold, giving a warm retreat to many insects who are miniature ploughs in spring around the roots of tree and plant, and who without this protection would perish, as have perished Alpine plants in England notwithstanding all that could be done. Snow on the earth is as wool on the human body; being a bad conductor of heat, it prevents the vital heat from passing off, and retains it with its nourishing power, so that seed is still given to the sower and bread to the eater. Were it not for this, every thing herbaceous would be destroyed in the severe cold of the higher latitudes. From these properties of snow, it is a great fertilizer of the earth, and quickens vegetation by stealing down gently to the buried germs; so that we are assured that on 'the declivities of Mount Atlas, in the month of April, the green points of wheat are seen making their way through the dazzling surface of the snow. The inhabitants of Savoy and Switzerland, regard snow as the best source of their wealth.' On the return of Spring, the Swiss shepherds, followed by their flocks, go forth, with prayer and praise, from spot to spot where the warmth and nourishment of the snow have given growth to the grass so that their flocks find sweet food. And in this connection we cannot fail to recall the tales we have heard and read, or the sights we have seen, of persons and animals living beneath the snows; and it may not be vain here to remark, that, as saith Rees, 'when living animals, as hares and sheep, are buried in the snow, the water which the warmth produces, becomes absorbed into the surrounding snow by capillary attraction, and the creatures are not moistened by its droppings upon them; but the cavity enlarges, as the snow dissolves, affording them both a dry and warm habitation.' Thus travellers have sheltered themselves from death by cold; and thus also, we can discern how the snow habitations of the Polar regions are more comfortable than they otherwise could be—for snow is very porous, and contains much air in its pores.

But we must turn to the direct moral application of our subject. And first, it teaches us to search out, that we may appreciate, the peculiar blessings of each season, that the year may be full of poetry, and that of Winter we may say;—

'O, many gifts are thine,—

Many for eye, and soul, and deep, deep heart!

A sweet divinity of homes thou art,

And ever ready at the fireside shrine

Love's offerings to impart.'

The stars shine brighter, and the shooting streams of light glow in richer beauty than at any other season, and the air that is our life is laden with health and strength, to crimson the cheek, make the fire of the eye beam brighter, while a warmer and speedier flow is given to the vital current. And more than these are Winter's blessings, for how many are its teachings of the worth of the social feelings, and how many are its peculiar incentives to their cultivation! Add to these, the opportunities presented to exercise the social virtues, and the privileges of imitating him 'who went about doing good.' God ordained summer and winter, heat and cold, and it is only by these reflections that we can be able to discern his wisdom and how he crowneth the year with his goodness.

Again, our subject teaches us a lesson on Purity and its loveliness. The unsullied snow is always beautiful wherever and whenever seen, and its purity is often light to our path in the gloomy night when the stars are hidden. Even so is humanity clothed in moral purity—true virtue—lovely in every age, under all circumstances, and imparting light to guide us safely in times of darkness and peril. There is indeed no loveliness like that of the pure in heart. Remember this, ye that desire beauty—a beauty that is not vain, and that perisheth not. Remember this, ye who are guardians of innocent childhood—childhood that is like the snow flakes we sometimes see descending while the sunbeams are out on their gilding errand—pure and gilded with heaven's radiance. Aye, well has the poet said of the innocent child—

'That youth like snow appears,

Ere sullied by the darkening rain;

When once 'tis touched by guilty tears,

'Twill never shine so bright again.'

Snow is only beautiful as it remains pure; but when defiled, heaven's law of regeneration alone can purify it. There is such a law, natural and spiritual, and God's work is perfect. Some writer has well remarked concerning habits,—'Like flakes of snow that fall unperceived upon the earth, the seemingly unimportant actions of life succeed each other. As the snow gathers together, so are our actions formed. No single flake that is added to the pile produces a sensible change; no single action creates, however it may exhibit, man's character; but as the tempest hurls the avalanche down the mountain, and overwhelms the inhabitants and his habitation, so passion, acting upon the elements of mischief, which pernicious habits have brought together by imperceptible accumulations, may overthrow the edifice.'

And this thought leads me to the Scripture associations with the snow, and they are all precious, especially the invitation—'Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord: though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool.' This is cheering language indeed, as it assures us that even the scarlet sinner is capable of reasoning in some degree with God; at least so far as to discern God's grace in the requirements of duty. And this discernment will impart the most powerful persuasives to apply for baptism in the pure and broad river of sanctification; as the anxious soul stands upon its borders, waiting for the moving of the waters, its prayer will be that of David,—'Wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow.' And O how intimately connected with every thing mentally and morally good and desirable, is this purification of soul—this 'washing of regeneration,' 'by the word!' To a subject of this heavenly baptism, we can use the Psalmist's beautiful figure,—'Though ye have lien amid defilement, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver and her feathers with yellow gold.'

And O as we gaze on this transfiguration—on this glorious change from sin to holiness—this throwing off the scarlet robe and crimson vail and the putting on of the glistening white robe of Righteousness, we cannot but desire to see universal humanity thus clothed and sandalled with immortality. And while we thus pause in thought, a voice as from heaven steals upon our ear and we listen with joy as it says to us;—'As the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater; so shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth; it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it.' This gives us the assurance we need, and a bright and glorious picture rises up before us; we see and rejoice in a consummation worthy of the infinite perfections of Jehovah.

To what shall we yield this glowing picture? Who can present us a more beautiful one? No faith hath a genius so divine as to bid such scenes of immortal loveliness to pass before us as our faith can, and we may use Jeremiah's metaphor in answer to those who invite us to go away with them;—'Will a man leave the snow of Lebanon which cometh from the rock of the field? or shall the cold flowing waters that come from another place be forsaken?' That is;—when a man is athirst in the heat of the open field, will he turn away from the cool streams of melting snows that flow down the sides of Lebanon, or run along in brooklets? will he leave these in hope of better waters? No, if he have once tasted of them, admired their beauty and felt the pleasure they impart. Neither can we forsake the streams of Salvation from which we have drank and which have satisfied us. There can be no better streams, for these are living waters issuing from the river of Grace whose streams make glad the city of our God!

'Ho, ye who pant for living streams,
And pine away and die!
Here you may quench your raging thirst
With springs that never dry.'

Providence, R. I.

IT SNOWS, IT SNOWS.

BY MRS. HALE.

'It snows!' cries the school-boy—'hurrah!' and his shout
Is ringing through parlor and hall,
While swift as the wing of the swallow he's out,
And his playmates have answered his call;
It makes the heart leap but to witness their joy—
Proud wealth has no pleasure, I trow,
Like the rapture that throbs in the pulse of the boy
As he gathers his treasure of snow;
Then lay not the trappings of gold on thine heirs,
While health and the riches of nature are theirs.

'It snows!' sighs the imbecile—'Ah!' as his breath
Comes heavy, as if clogged by a weight,
While from the pale aspect of nature in death,
He turns to the blaze of his grate;
And nearer and nearer his soft cushioned chair
Is wheeled toward the life-giving flame—
He dreads a chill puff of the snow burdened air,
Lest it wither his delicate frame.
Oh! small is the pleasure existence can give,
When the fear we shall die, only proves that we live.

'It snows!' cries the traveler—'Ho!' and the word
Has quickened his steed's lagging pace;
The wind rushes by and its howl is unheard—
Unfelt the sharp drift in his face;
For bright through the tempest his own home appeared—
Ay, though leagues intervene, he can see
There, the clear glowing hearth and the table prepared,
And his wife with her babes on her knee.
Bless'd thought, how it lightens the grief laden hour,
That those we love dearest are safe from its power.

'It snows!' cries the belle—'Dear, how lucky,' and turns
From her mirror to see the flakes fall.
Like the first rose of summer her dimpled cheek burns
With musing on sleigh ride and ball;
There are visions of conquests, of splendor and mirth,
Floating over each drear winter's day;
But the tidings of hope on the snow beaten earth,
Will melt like the snow flakes away.
Turn, turn thee to knowledge, fair maiden, for bliss,
The treasures of earth are all fleeting but this.

'It snows!' cries the widow—'Oh, God!' and her sighs
Have stifled the voice of her prayer,
Its burdens ye'll read in her tear swollen eyes,
And her cheek sunk with fasting and care.

'Tis night—and her fatherless ask her for bread—
 But 'Hæ gives the young ravens their food,'
 And she trusts till her dank breath adds horror to dread,
 And lays on her last chip of wood.
 Poor sufferer, that sorrow thy God only knows—
 'Tis a most bitter lot to be poor when it snows.

A TALE OF THE BLIND.

THE advantages of Traveling have often been discoursed upon, and the theme is by no means exhausted. But among those who are best able to discourse with enthusiasm upon it—strange as it may seem—are some of those over whose visual organs the Almighty has been pleased to draw a veil—I mean the Blind. I feel the truth of this, not only from what I have read, but more especially from conversation with one who has seen much of the world notwithstanding his blindness. I have never been more interested in any human book than in him, and take my pen to sketch what he has put in my mind to write, collected in his own by journeyings. Among the many intensely interesting 'incidents of travel' to which I have listened, is one with which is connected a somewhat remarkable history. But as 'the ower true tale' which is to be penned, needs no embellishment by fictitious ornament, I shall give it as near as possible in the narrator's own language. Let him* be considered as the writer.

In the Institution of which I was a member and from which I derived all the knowledge I possess, the most trivial incident was sufficient to change the monotony of common school life, and the ordinary incidents of every day, which to us, confined as we were to a very limited round, were sufficient to awaken great interest, and are as fresh to my memory as the transactions of yesterday. I well remember, though many years have since passed, when Maria Bordon became an inmate of our school. The fact of her having arrived was whispered around among the pupils; and when the hour arrived for the introduction of a new comer—the time when we were accustomed to meet for the practice of music, the most delightful of all employments to the Blind,—to every pupil in the school was known her name, the place from whence she came, and the time she would probably remain with us. These facts had been grudgingly obtained from our good natured Director, who was by no means willing to tell us at once all that he knew, as his principle in dealing with the Blind was, that they should gain knowledge gradually that they might value it the more.

It is now necessary that I should introduce Maria to the reader, but as I have never looked on a human face, or beheld a human form, it will not be expected that I shall occupy much space in describing her exterior appearance. Maria was beautiful, if we may judge from the caresses of those who judge of beauty only by the symmetry of form and contour of person; but to the Blind she was beautiful, as she possessed a most sweet and musical voice, which to those who know the existence of those around them only by hearing and feeling, is the very sine qua non. The unusual sweetness and the superior qualities of her voice, were themes of conversation among the pupils for many a day, and one on which they delighted to expatiate. Maria, like most persons, when first admitted, was sad; but this we attributed to the regret she felt in having left home and the beloved scenes of childhood, or, perhaps I should say—associations, which to the Blind are as powerful as is any thing beheld by the seeing, and of which they delight to speak as constituting 'the charms of home.' But when day after day, for many months, Maria, still continued sad, we were surprised, and none of us were able to divine the cause of such habitual melancholy. She was one of the most gentle and amiable of the females, and every one, without a single exception, admired the traits of her character as they gradually unfolded themselves. No adverse circumstances, no petty annoyances which constitute so great a part of every day life, could annoy her. She seemed to be placed above being affected by those things which severely try common tempers. Her intellect was of no common order, and having enjoyed the blessing of sight for the first ten years of her life, she had acquired many things which those born blind are obliged to obtain after they enter the Institution. But of the advantage which she thus possessed over her companions she did not seem conscious, and to it she never alluded. In short, in the ordinary language of all men—'She was Beautiful!' beautiful, I say, in the highest and best sense of the term. 'She seemed,' in the language of Shakspeare, 'to be the very top of admiration, made of every creature's best.' During the whole time which Maria spent in the Institution, there was only one perceptible change of the aspect she wore—only once did the sadness which rested upon her like the shadow of a cloud depart and leave her an altered being. It was then that we first perceived what she might have been in her earlier years—a merry, laughing, happy creature,

'too good
 For human nature's daily food.'

Now that I am about to introduce another character, I would remind the reader that I am not dealing in romance or fiction, but simply portraying what belongs to the real occurrences of that period which was to me the beginning of life, though it was not till after I had somewhat advanced in years.

* B. B. B.

One day, a little more than a year after Maria came among us, we were officially informed that a young medical gentleman, a veritable disciple of Hippocrates, who had recently been, by accident, deprived of his sight, was about to become an inmate of our home. As he had received a collegiate education, and was withal a great man, having the grave title of 'M. D.,' some of the knowing ones among us prophesied that the 'Doctor' was destined for an instructor. In this, however, they were mistaken, as many a pretended prophet has been. Dr. Rochford, for such we will call him, having been deprived of his sight by one of those accidents to which medical men by their chemical experiments are exposed, and having thus all his bright hopes in life taken from him, was anxious to seclude himself from society, or if that was impossible, to spend his life with those who, like himself, were forever shut out from the light of heaven. He requested of the Trustees a room, and to share in the amusements and occupations of the pupils, on an equal footing with them. The day on which he entered was of course, a marked one in the annals of our school; he was regularly introduced, first to the males, and then to the females; and it was remarked that when he was introduced to Maria he repeated her name with emphasis, and so in like manner did she his. There seemed to be a silent recognition on the part of both, which could only have been perceived by those to whom the human voice is the only index to the human heart. It was remarked on that day that Maria seemed more cheerful than ever, that her laugh was more frequent, and that she was altogether a happier being. The Teachers—the seeing ones, I mean—attributed this to the natural cheerfulness and gayety consequent on the introduction of a new comer, which was in our school a sort of Jubilee; but the most reflective among our number thought of matters much deeper, but said nothing.

In a few days, the Doctor found the way round the Institution, which was always the first lesson to be learned; and it was observed by some of us that the Rotunda, the place where Maria often chose to practice her voice alone, was the place which the soonest became to him familiar. This was, of course, unobserved by the majority. There was between him and Maria a similarity of tastes—they loved the same songs and admired the same poets; there seemed to be a harmony, a unison of feeling, which can easily be accounted for on natural principles, but which some now-a-days would attribute to the influence of Magnetism. Yes, dear reader there was a magnetic something between these two hearts as I shall reveal in the sequel.

I must confess that long before I knew any thing of the real history of our hero and heroine, I could not but suspect that there had existed some relationship between them, but farther than this, I could not penetrate the veil. I never shall forget one occasion when unperceived by them I chanced to stroll into the room where they, as usual, were singing duets together. Although I have many times heard that beautiful Swiss air which so touchingly appeals to the tenderest feelings of the human heart, yet never did I listen with so much pleasure as on that occasion when with their clear and beautifully blended voices they commenced the following melody:

'Why, ah! why my heart this sadness?
Why 'mid scenes like these decline?
Where although strange is joy and gladness,
O say what wish can yet be thine?

All that's dear to me is wanting,
Lone and cheerless here I roam,
A stranger's joy so e'er enchanting,
Can never be to me like home.

Give me those, I ask none other,
Than those who blessed my humble dome,
Where dwells my father and my mother,
O give me back my native home.'

The song so wrought upon my feelings that when they finished, I unconsciously moved my chair; the noise was perceived by them, and the Doctor immediately walked up to see who had been intruding. Before I could succeed in making my escape he caught me by the collar, and made me speak, as this was the only way by which he could know who I was. I expressed some surprise that he should be astonished to find any one in that place, as it was the room where we frequently met to practise music; but he seemed to perceive intuitively that I knew more of his heart's history than he was willing should be known. And so without any hesitation he immediately made me his confidant. He told me very briefly that he had known Maria in happier days. They had both played on the green before the same homes; they had walked in the shade of the same verdant trees, and gazed alike interested into the waters of the beautiful Kennebec. They had looked on the same sunsets, and watched the infinitude of stars with kindred emotions. Nature had been alike eloquent to them, and to them the world was full of enchantment. They had looked on the blossoms of Spring, on the luxuriance of Summer, and the gorgeousness of Autumn, and in all the thousand beauties of the seasons there was always something that knit their hearts still closer together.

The first disappointment which they knew was when Rochford's father left his native village for a new home far away from the scenes of his boyhood. One of the objects of the removal was that Rochford might receive greater means of education, as his father had contemplated the fitting of his son for college, and this could not be done in the place where he then resided. Rochford entered the academy, made diligent improvement of the means afforded him, and was subsequently received into Bowdoin College, where he graduated with all the usual honors which crown the career of the persevering and successful student. But amid the new scenes and occupations consequent on this course, it may well be supposed that Rochford forgot the associate of his earlier years; not so with Maria—she remembered him as the friend with whom she had loved to roam in the wood, or sit beside the stream, and listen to the music of waving forests and running waters. She had heard nothing concerning him, save occasionally a word or two from the minister of the parish who kept up a correspondence with Rochford's father. His place was in a measure supplied by a beloved brother; in a few years he fell a victim to that dreadful scourge of New England—Consumption, and she was left again alone to wander in paths familiar to her tread and dear as home. The friends of Maria perceived that day by day her appearance betokened that health was departing from her; her step became feeble, and her countenance pale and wan. The physician of the village advised her parents to provide her with a change of scene, or she would soon lie low with her brother in the grave of the early dead. It so happened that about this time that the 'Commencement' of Bowdoin College was to take place, and the Physician being one of the Curators of the Medical Department, and the Minister being invited, it was arranged that Maria with her mother should accompany them to Brunswick, with the hope that the pleasant excitement of that interesting season might dissipate in some degree her gloom and revive her wasting spirits. During the journey the Minister remarked to Maria that among the students who were to graduate the next day, was her old school-mate—Francis Rochford. This called up in the mind of Maria thoughts of the past, and induced the reflection whether the proud student would remember at all the poor girl with whom he had so often roamed 'on the banks of their beautiful river.'

On the day of the Exercises the church was filled with the elite of Maine, and great expectations were excited by the very unusual large number of young gentlemen who were that day to receive the honors of the Institution. When the procession of students entered the church, the position of Maria was such that she could not discern distinctly the individuals composing it, and therefore, did not, of course, recognize her early friend. But as they each took a station upon the stage, she had a full view of them; and with no ordinary interest did she watch for the appearance of a new speaker, in hope of being able to distinguish her Francis; one by one, the speakers left the stage, till but one remained to attract the attention of the audience. All eyes were turned to him who was to deliver the 'Valedictory Address'—to bid farewell in behalf of himself and his fellows to the friends and the scenes of their college years. As he ascended the stage Maria gazed intently to discern what changes time had wrought, and gladly did she perceive in the man the fuller development of all the graces and charms of the boy. His cheek was indeed pale, and there was a shadow of deep thought upon his countenance, but there he stood to her a noble man—

'A pure, warm heart and spirit high,
Were written on his lofty brow,
And in his manly eye.'

In his address, Rochford spoke of the social feelings—their power and their charms, and of the ties which would bind him to the scenes of his most studious years. He turned to the Faculty and addressed them in a most feeling and eloquent manner, and took farewell of them and all in behalf of himself and those who like him were to leave the classic halls, so long their home. A simultaneous and enthusiastic burst of applause complimented his noble effort; and as he descended from the stage, it was to Maria like the departure of the sun to him who has no hope of beholding it more. Rochford did not, as may well be imagined, recognize Maria among the vast throng; and the next day she left with a relative to spend a few weeks in Augusta.

This, as will subsequently be seen, was a visit attended with most melancholy circumstances. A remnant of the Penobscot tribe of Indians had about that time visited Augusta, and all the lads of the place had acquired a great passion for bows and arrows to rival the skill of the savages. One day when Maria was out in the open air, her cousin was at his usual play, and by a most unfortunate accident, the arrow which he discharged from his bow, pointed to resemble a spear, entered her right eye. In consequence of an inflammation which afterwards ensued, the other eye became affected, and—sad to relate—she was at length pronounced by the eminent and skillful Dr. Warren to be totally and incurably blind! Every means was used for her benefit that promised to relieve, and she passed through a season of suffering most dreadful to endure. At last her friends made the necessary arrangements whereby she entered that noble monument of christian philanthropy—the New England Institution for the Blind.

After leaving College, Rochford spent a few months of recreation with his father, during which time he became acquainted with a young lady, of whom it is necessary that I should attempt a description. Amelia Brownell was a young lady whose principal attraction was a fortune which her father intended at some time to leave her. She had received what is denominated 'a fashionable education,' that is to say, she had spent a few years in a seminary of course not in her own town, but at a considerable remove from home, where she had been instructed in every thing but that which would have rendered her useful as a wife or companion. At this time she had just returned from the seminary, and had arrived at that precise period in such a young lady's life when she is very desirous of making an impression. She seemed to be conscious of her personal defects, but hoped to make up in flippancy and ostentatious display all other deficiencies. She was very particularly desirous of making a decided impression on our young hero, who was the guest in many a circle, and with whom she frequently met. Rochford did not admire her, nay, he was not infrequently vexed with her efforts to conceal her real deficiencies, but in consideration of the fortune in perspective, he overlooked all the want of real excellence of character, and when he left for Boston to pursue his studies as a physician, he was regarded as her accepted suitor.

Rochford's progress was rapid as a successful pupil of the Medical School, and was about, at the end of the third year, to receive his degree of 'M. D.' with honor to himself and his teachers, when by a sudden explosion of some chemical preparation with which he was experimenting, the fragments of the glass bottle which contained the substance, were thrown into his eyes and he was almost instantly rendered blind! He had expected at the close of the term of his studies in Boston to have returned to his father's and to have fulfilled his matrimonial engagement with Amelia. But on learning his misfortune she positively refused to receive any farther attentions from him, and it is easy to perceive that her affection had no sympathy with the true and holy passion which impels even to the martyrdom for the one beloved.

Dispirited by his misfortune and unable to make any use of his acquirements as a physician, he resolved to enter the Institution of which we have more than once spoken. It was there, as we have seen, that he again met Maria—his mind was carried back to the happiest years of life, and the powerful associations of the past came thronging into the soul, leading him captive to what had once so delighted him. It was natural in meeting with the being he had known in other days, sharing with him a common misfortune, and being in other respects similarly situated—it was natural for him to feel for her a deeper interest than he would be likely to feel for any others with whom he was surrounded. Associating with her day after day, and discovering the many amiable traits of her character, he soon found himself cherishing towards her a deeper affection than he had entertained towards any human being; and in short, gentle reader, he loved her with all the ardor of which his nature was capable. And this was strikingly manifested when by the regulations of the Institution the male and female departments were made entirely distinct, and of course, the opportunities of their meeting were less frequent. It is singular to see how difficulties will be overcome by the ingenuity of a mind when impelled by that master passion which poets and philosophers have vainly endeavored to describe. This ingenuity was brought speedily into requisition by the separation made by the regulation alluded to; and the contrivance they adopted whereby to correspond with each other was singular indeed. They had a method used in the Institution—that of pricking the letters with a sharp pointed pencil so that by the touch on the opposite side of the page, the words could be read. The room occupied by Rochford was in the left wing, and that of Maria was in the right wing of the building, and the windows of both opened into the yard. Rochford would tie his letter on the end of a long string or cord, and would then throw it a few times till he succeeded in making it lodge on the window sill of Maria's apartment, retaining in his hand the other end of the string; she would tie her letter on the string and Rochford would speedily draw it in to himself. This correspondence was of course carried on at night when the darkness favored them, and was continued for some time undetected. Now it chanced that there was a tree in the centre of the yard, and on a certain time when Rochford was endeavoring to draw back the answer to an epistle he had transmitted, the letter caught in the tree, and in endeavoring to extricate it, the string broke, the letter fell, not on the ground, but on a man's hat, and he—the man under the hat—was the last person into whose hands they would have chosen to have had it fall, for he was none other than the chief in authority. He could read it, and the effect of it may be judged of by the following: Both parties were severely reprimanded for indulging those feelings with which God had endowed them, and the exercise of which constitutes in those who are so fortunate as to cherish them, the purest happiness which this world affords. This long lecture however did not turn them from their purpose, and therefore, the first opportunity of meeting was improved to fashion a new Alphabet, by which they were able to correspond in a manner, or with a mystic language, which could not be read by any third person. In this way they did find ways of corresponding for a considerable time, though the windows aforementioned were nailed down. It was deemed proper in consequence of this, and the known ardor of their affection, to make more complete the separation and to stop if possible all means of intercourse between them. Accordingly matters were so arranged that Rochford received a peremptory letter from his father requiring his immediate return home. He was determined not to comply with this requisition till at least he could have one interview with Maria, and be able to leave her with a full understanding of their mutual feelings and purposes. This interview he obtained the eve previous to his leaving the Institution. They met at the place to which I have before referred as the home of music, and both seemed to feel a vague apprehension that it would be long before they should meet again. Rochford told Maria briefly that his father was a firm man and would doubtless object to their union, yet he was de-terminated that although he had never disobeyed his commands, yet he now should consult his own feelings, and Maria might depend on his unchanging affection. It was arranged on the part of Maria that at the coming vacation, she should return to her mother's and Rochford should meet her there. But now they must part, and the lovers were agitated beyond expression. As Rochford clasped his Maria to his breast, language was inadequate to express the deep emotions of their souls, and in nature's simple eloquence they but uttered each other's name—O Francis! O Maria! They separated, melancholy proofs that what God intended to constitute our purest bliss is too often made a source of our keenest misery! The next day, Rochford departed.

A few weeks passed and the vacation came. Maria was soon in her own home, full of hope and joyous expectancy. In a few days Rochford joined her, and once more they walked amid the scenes of their early years. It was a beautiful evening in June, at the mellow hour of sunset. The loveliness of the heavens reflected the serenity and beauty of their own souls, and they felt the charms they could not see. But alas! how changed was their condition when contrasted with what they were when last they stood amid those endeared retreats and walked by the glowing waters of the majestic river! They sat by the waters on a prostrated tree, and both, without any understanding save that which was natural to two hearts thus sympathetically tuned in harmony with each other, commenced the following melody;—

‘Softly the shades of evening fall,
Sprinkling the earth with dewy tears,
And nature's voice to slumber calls,
And silence reigns amid the spheres.’

The last sad notes of their voices died away over the quiet waters, and a silence ensued which was broken by Maria.

‘Francis, it is a beautiful evening! O how often have I wished that the close of my life might be as calm as such an eve fading away into night, when I have wandered amid these scenes with you or alone, and have felt the holy influences of the hour. Did you ever think, Francis, that the time must come when we must part—when one of us should be called to leave this world and no more listen to the voice beloved or the sounds so dear?’

‘That, Maria, is a thought on which I delight not to dwell. When I am with you, my affections are satisfied, I am contented with the present, and ask not to look into the future.’

‘But,’ replied Maria, ‘love must have a future. It is a dread thing to think of love only where death is permitted to exert its power, and my dearest meditations are of that world where reigns immortal youth.’

‘There is poetry in that; but my reasonings have been confined to the present existence. I know indeed that we shall live again, but more than that is not revealed.’

‘No more revealed! For what did Jesus live? for what did Jesus die? for what did Jesus rise? Was not the great object of his advent and mission to reveal God's everlasting love, reaching to all souls and enduring through all ages, here and hereafter? This, Francis, this is a truth which I have learned at Jesus' feet, and it is to me the sweetest solace in every hour of gloom and pain, and which I would not relinquish for the greatest boon which I could possibly receive—no, not even for the gift of sight! Gladly would I look on the scenes of life's earlier days and admire the beauties which once so entranced my vision, but dearer, far dearer is the hope of gazing with an undimming eye on a world of fadeless loveliness. O say, Francis,’ said the enthusiastic girl, clasping, almost wildly, his hand in hers, ‘O say, Francis, do you not believe that we shall meet in that bright and better world.’

The earnestness of the girl astonished Rochford, and he exclaimed—‘O God! is this a reality, is the beautiful creature at my side my Maria, or is it all a dream and she an angel!’

‘No,’ replied she, ‘I am no angel, but the weak, erring girl you call your Maria. I am earnest, for there is something—I know not what—that tells me this is the last time we shall meet on earth.’

‘Nay, nay, Maria, there is yet for us many happy years in store. But the hour is late—let us return to the house.’

They arose and directed their steps towards Maria's home. All the cheerfulness and gaiety which Rochford could throw into his conversation as they pursued their way, could not remove the weight of melancholy that pressed on Maria's heart. When they reached the dwelling, Rochford felt that he must part, and he briefly informed her that he was required to set out early on the morrow to meet his father, and must therefore say farewell to her.

‘Ah,’ said the poor girl, ‘are we then never more to meet!’

‘O do not utter such words. We shall meet many times—I have told you there are happy years for us in store,’ and imprinting a kiss upon her fair brow, he bade her ‘Good night!’

Early the next morning, Maria could have been seen sitting at her chamber window listening intently for the sound of the departing coach that should bear the beloved away. At length the rumbling noise, disturbing the hush of morn, broke on her ear, and she intently listened to the sound till it died away and no echo remained. Then did she feel her doom was sealed, though she could not in the least account for the apprehensions under which she labored.

At evening Rochford arrived at his journey's end. His father immediately called him into a private apartment; and there he frankly informed him that by letters from Boston he had been fully advised of all that had occurred between him and Maria, and that he should not consent, on any account whatever, to any farther intimacy between them. 'You are blind,' said the stern father, 'and can do nothing for yourself! I must therefore provide for you. Now, Mary Ann Neal is a good girl, she has lived with us several years, and I know she will make you a good wife. She has consented to marry you on condition that I will settle upon you a sum the interest of which shall be sufficient to maintain you and her. This, though my property will hardly justify it, I agree to do, if you will decide to be united to her. To-morrow I shall go to Portsmouth, and shall return in a week—that time I give you to decide, with the understanding that if you still cling to your present wild project, I shall discard you forever!'

We will not attempt to describe the feelings of Rochford, but return to Maria. Two days after the departure of Rochford, she was called to the bedside of her dying mother, who, always in feeble health, had received several apoplectic strokes, was now struck down by another and a fatal one. But the religion which had always consoled Maria, did not now fail to afford her the consolation she needed in this the most trying hour of her existence. Her mother had been to her all that maternal love could be in the soul of a christian, and now that she stood by her side in death, a new and the darkest mystery of life pressed heavily upon her soul. But she remembered God and was comforted.

After the last sad rites were attended to, and Maria began to feel how much had been taken from her, a kind sister, residing at a distance, sent her word that her home should be hers if she would make it so. Maria received this affectionate message with gratitude; and after a few days, she visited for the last time the graves of her sainted mother and darling brother, and strewed a few flowers on the place of their repose, as the last offering of her undying love, and then bade farewell forever to the scenes so hallowed by the varied events of the past.

The week apportioned to Rochford had now expired, and after vainly endeavoring to dissuade his father from his cruel purpose, he yielded a reluctant consent and promised to marry a being he did not love. Having taken this step, he dictated to a confidential friend, a letter to Maria, in which he informed her of the situation in which his father's determination had placed him, and that he was compelled to unite his destiny with a woman he did not love; but that though the husband of another, she would always have his affections.

One day, sometime afterward, Maria was sitting listening to the reading of a newspaper by her sister, and among the variety the list of marriages and deaths attracted attention. Her sister, unconscious of reading a name dear to Maria, read the marriage of 'Dr. Francis Rochford to Miss Mary Ann Neal.' The effect of this was electrical, but as soon as she recovered from the first shock, Maria immediately concluded that there were two Dr. Rochfords—she thought the 'Doctor' sounded unnatural, so unwilling was she to believe the fact of the case. But this indecision was of short duration, as soon afterward she received Rochford's letter that had been sent to her former residence, and after a long delay was transmitted to her enclosed in an epistle from the minister of the parish. The awful truth now flashed upon her mind. She was now indeed miserable. This was the last of a long series of misfortunes which had made her life a painful one, but which had revealed to her the power of religion in the soul. The effect of this last, sad and heavy stroke, was not perceptible to the observer, and while a tear trembled in her sightless eyes, she prayed God to bless her Francis.

Not long since it was my happiness to visit Maria, and as I conversed with her of the past, she appeared to have lost nothing of that enthusiasm which seemed to be a part of her very nature. 'But once have I seen Francis since he was a man, but oh! that once was sufficient to keep him ever distinct in my soul, the ideal of all perfection. He is compelled to drag out an existence far less happier than mine, united as he is to a being he cannot love, and who has no sympathy with his high endowments of mind.'

I mentioned to her that I should probably visit the East, and might perchance meet Rochford. 'Tell him, then,' said she, 'that at the hour when last we met, I shall ever offer up to heaven a prayer for him.' Then in a more subdued tone, she added, 'Tell him not to forget me.'

Before I parted from her she sang to me, with the same touching sweetness as in other years, Rochford's favorite—The Flower Girl's Song, in the 'Last Days of Pompeii.' As I took my leave of her, I could not but say half audibly, 'Poor girl! sad victim of a love too deep, too pure, for such a world as this.'

But yet in her soul she has hopes that give her the living waters of immortality, as she rests her spirit in the expectancy of the time when the mighty and loving voice of God shall speak—'Ephphatha!' ('that is, Be opened!') and on her vision shall burst the ineffable glories of that world where there are no changes but from glory to glory!

LITTLE KINDNESSES. 'Life is short'—let us add as we are able to the happiness of each other; pluck thorns and plant roses as fast as possible. It is little kindnesses that make up the great sum of pleasant sensations; and little deviations from the law of love form the greatest mass of afflictions. Happy is he who always means there shall be an affectionate meaning even in 'the soon forgotten charity of a kiss,' and whose heart of affection gives pulses to his hand whenever he clasps another in the courtesies of life. He shall 'be free from the great transgression.' R.

SONG.

BY MISS C. A. FILLEBROWN.

WHEN the dark shadows of night come on,
And the winds are revelling free;
Or, sleepless, I watch for the coming dawn,
Then, dearest, I think of thee.

When morning wakes with her glowing-smile,
And gildeth each flower and tree;
She has no power my thoughts to beguile,
For they are engrossed by thee.

I hie me away to the crowded ball,
And the merriest seem to be;
And gaily I tread the festive hall,—
But I only think of thee.

Unheeding I list to the viol's tone,
And the laugh of careless glee,
But I long for the hour to be alone,
To sleep, and to dream of thee!

MINISTERIAL AND PAROCHIAL DUTIES.

A SERMON.

BY W. M. FERNALD.

WE have received not a little pleasure from the perusal of a Sermon published in the 'Trumpet,' and the 'Freeman.' It was preached before the Middlesex Conference at their last session, and deserves an attentive reading from Universalists, especially, everywhere. It is a good performance, full of excellent thought, and plain and direct to the purpose. If we could command the time, we would give an epitome of it, with extracts; but as we cannot do this, we present a few passages which we decidedly like. We learn that Br. Whittemore of the 'Trumpet' objects to the sentiments of the first extract which we give, and we are very desirous to know what his objections are. We hope he will not keep silent. The preacher first treats of the 'Dignity of the Pulpit'—an important theme—and under this head he speaks of sacrificing duty to a desire to present mere entertainment and amusement. He speaks of two forms in which this is done, and the first is thus treated.

! The first is, a catering to vulgar taste, to supply, perhaps, a want of edification in a more substantial and profitable manner. How many painful instances of this sort are among the records and remembrances of human folly! We mean that appetency for popular fame, or interest for the time being, which induces so many to come down from the purity and strict propriety which their office demands, to hold converse with that more numerous host who are rather taken and charmed with a light and superficial, and perhaps, sophistical, illustration, than a just and well-conducted argument; or a low witticism, than a serious presentation of the truth. And they do this willingly. It is by this that men capable of the purest taste, and deepest research and demonstration, have brought dishonor to the cause they have advocated; they themselves, by this same unworthy compliance with the flippancy of vulgar taste, preferring, to the homage of the exalted few, the clamors and plaudits of the multitude. Young as I am, and in this delicate situation, I would rebuke such a spirit! It is unworthy and dishonorable to our sacred office. If propriety and purity are demanded anywhere, it is in the sacred desk. And if public taste is corrupted, be it our place (for we are the ones) to correct it—not to cater to it, for the miserable object of a wider popularity. All the Knappism and other such like notoriety in the land, is but the effect of such degradation. God knows that it is not talent. It is the willful prostitution of the mind and the office, to coarse familiarity, low witticism, levity and vulgarity in religious matters, for the low ambition of being run after, or some other equally unworthy motive. All of us might successfully aspire to such a popularity. In any secular cause it might not succeed; but in religion, there is such a disparity between its real solemnity, and this outrage committed on it, that the faculty for perceiving incongruities is stimulated to such excess, that the public very readily awards to such aspirants, the glory which is sought after. Verily, we may say of them, they have their reward.

'But it is our duty, I say, to correct public taste, if we find it perverted. We should rather set up a standard for them, than come down to theirs, even though, at first, we sacrifice the popularity of a superficial or a vulgar interest. We shall afterwards preach with more power and effect. And by all the solemnity of religion, by all the characteristic dignity of the pulpit, by a regard for ourselves and for Him who spake as never man spake, may we feel it pressing upon us, to preserve, in this respect, the propriety, solemnity, and religious decorum of the pulpit ministrations.'

He speaks next of the common misconception of the common mind—the idea that common people know nothing. We have heard of ministers who have declared that they could preach in the afternoon the same sermon they preached in the forenoon, with a new text, and the people would not know it! This seems to us to prove that the text must have been all that was really worth remembering! What a miserable opinion do such have of the 'people,' while at the same time they will often declaim loudly on what they are as sovereigns! Br. Fernald refers to this—quotes an excellent passage from Dr. Dewey, and adds:—

'I repeat, we cannot be too intellectual, or too rational. We may be too obscure, too dry, too fanciful, or too poetical; but not too intellectual. How in the world can you bring a great moral point to bear with the utmost feeling power upon the people, without taxing the hardest reason to shape and hew it, and point it to the very centre of the heart, and make the conscience own it? And if the people do not yet understand this, I insist upon it, they should be made to understand it. And, finally, the minister has a wonderful power to cultivate a proper taste among his people. He can train them to almost any habits of thought, so that they will easily detect the difference of a stranger; and it is our duty, in the exercise of this power, to preserve, by all the foregoing considerations, that character to our pulpit, which its sacredness, seriousness, and importance, all pressingly demand for it.

He next treats of preserving the interest of the pulpit—the peculiar value of timely and local sermons. Then the efficiency of the pulpit receives attention; and by this he means, that the great aim should be to cause the truth—the facts of the Bible, human nature and life, to so act upon the moral feelings as to induce to a christian course every where and always and in all things. He then turns to plain preaching, and makes judicious distinctions; then he considers the importance of words:

‘But I must pass, again, to a bare allusion to the importance of the preacher’s words, many times more important than he is aware of, in making impressions that never wear off. I have recently been convinced of this by circumstances altogether unlooked for. How much may a word—a single sentiment, a barely incidental turn of thought accomplish for the minds placed under our influence! Much more, an habitual ministration from week to week, and from year to year. The words we utter fall upon the susceptible mind, and, not there and then do they cease their work; but, like the dropping of rain into the gentle stream which is almost unnoticed at its source; the stream receives it, it mingles with its waters, it flows onward and is a part of that river as it swells and widens and rolls down in its importance; and as finally it empties itself into the ocean, and becomes heaved and agitated with it, those drops of rain are no less a part of that body of waters, than when first received into the stream, it was a part of it. So the preacher’s words fall upon the mind, and especially the young mind; and the thoughts mingle with its thoughts; and they go down in the stream of life; and they are no less a part of that mind when heaved and agitated with the temptations and trials of manhood, than they were a part of the thoughts when the preacher placed them there to work out their destiny! How should it affect us, when told without a figure, that one of these representations is, literally, as true as the other! And how should it stimulate us to look well at that efficiency, for good or for evil, which we may throw into the pulpit!

‘I confess, that when, from the places of my poor ministry, I receive any thing which amounts to a testimony of this sort, I am humbled under a sense of the importance of the stand we occupy. How affecting is it to read in the hand and lines of friendship, traced by the honest simplicity of those who have trusted to our fidelity, such private and confiding testimonies to the influence of our public labors: “I shall ever remember the sentiments of your sermons to the last day of my life”—“I love to dwell upon the influence of the past”—“I trust they have made some impressions upon my mind which will never wear off.” And is it so? And I have been moved to ask before God, what were those impressions, those sentiments, and that influence? Is it for good or for evil? Is it indeed what it should be? What have I done, and what are we all doing, my brethren, to honor our office, and to last with so many through all life? These considerations, together with the former, conclude what I have to say on the importance of a right and careful preservation of the proper efficiency of the pulpit.’

The Independence of the pulpit then becomes the theme of discourse. By this the preacher tells us he does not mean fearlessness in the treatment of subjects, nor does he refer to plainness of utterance, but to the presentation of subjects—that the minister should be independent in presenting those subjects which his convictions tell him are important, whatever they may be. He well alludes to some preachers who are indeed independent in treating whatever subjects they do present, but who are ‘bound hand and foot upon certain other subjects upon which they dare not open their mouth.’ He then goes on to say:

‘And there are two views in which this topic may be presented. The first is, with reference to any new truths which may be discovered, either in nature, bearing upon revelation, or in that revelation itself. For it is not supposable that we have yet reached the very meridian of all christian truth, so that nothing more is to be learnt, but we must sit down contentedly within the same old circle, and never venture to explore or expatiate beyond it. And God be thanked that we have neither creeds nor institutes to cripple us. I believe there are truths, which, if they are not all undiscovered, have never yet found their way into our pulpit with that freeness and fearlessness which they should. And there are, undoubtedly, truths yet hidden from us, which are yet to arise and shine. And yet, with all the rationally looked for light, there are still some among us (but blessed be God, they are few) who would form a theory of christianity so solid, so compact, and so dogmatical, that it should seem to say to Science, stand back! and to the newly starting inquirer, approach not here!—a theory well proved and so complete, that not another idea shall ever offer to encroach upon it.

'Now I say not that the preacher should make the pulpit a stand to unsettle all things by a vain daring to broach doubts, and speculations, and half-formed opinions on subjects of importance, to an audience which needs the products of a well disciplined and confident mind. But I do say, that if the minister, by faithful study, has found a truth which has his confidence, he is bound to lay that truth before the people. If it is a truth, it will abide the scrutiny and go out for profit to the world; if it is error, the sooner divulged and killed the better. Are we, at all times, and frequently upon matters of the utmost importance, faithful in this respect?—

'Another view which I would take of the Independence of the pulpit, is with reference to those questions which mightily agitate the public mind. And I say, let the minister be faithful. I do not say—now mind—faithful to present these matters invariably; but, faithful to his own convictions. If his conscience trouble him in withholding them, then let him present them; and let not the people put a chain upon his soul. They have no right to do it. And thank God, they have no power! They have a right and a power to change ministers, but none to fetter his soul. And if the minister submits to be enchained in one thing, what assurance have the people, that he will not be a mercenary slave in another and a more important thing? I believe there need be no trouble here. Surely none, if minister and people have a spark of that christian tolerance and freedom which they ought to have. It is never expected that all the people will agree in all things which the minister may utter.

'But, I say, let the minister be faithful—not to bring up all matters invariably—but faithful to his own convictions. If his conscience tell him that these matters may be withheld—that the cause of christianity, under the circumstances, does not require him to speak either morally or politically upon them, then let him be silent, and the independence of the pulpit is just as faithfully preserved. For it is the conscientious independence, and not the universality, if I may so speak, of the pulpit, which, after all, is the only matter in debate. He may be silent, or he may speak upon these topics; but the independence of his pulpit is quite consistent with one as with the other; and must not be sacrificed in either way to the frowns or favors of the people.'

The preacher next proceeds to speak in relation to Parochial Duties. To this should have been given time equal to that occupied by pulpit matters, for there are subjects which ought to be plainly treated, and which if plainly treated would awaken valuable thought.—Ministerial Gossiping, would be a good theme for some writer who loves to write honestly and treat matters with soberness, with true respect for the common mind. We like the following exceedingly, and should like to see the reasonings of those who think, as not long since we heard a brother say in his charge at an Installation—'A minister can do ten times more good out of the pulpit than he can in.' This is reversing the scriptural order of things. But to the extract:

'How then shall this be done? Is there any rule or principle that could be set up with reference to the proportionate amount of time and labor which we should devote entirely to the parish? All things, I suppose, may have some rule, and there is philosophy in every thing. I then propose this for one principle, of which I am very confident. It is this:—That we should not slight our SERMONS for any thing. Visit or not visit—talk or no talk—I still hold on to this principle, that we ought not to slight our SERMONS for any thing. The pulpit FIRST! And if it takes a whole week to be faithful to that, then be it so, the pulpit must come first. That must not be neglected. But can we not do more out of the pulpit than we can in it? No, never! What folly it is to set up any pretension of this sort, after all our conclusions on the interest and efficiency of the sacred desk! The man who does it, knows not the power of the pulpit. I have no hesitation in admitting that some do more out of the pulpit, than they do in. But that any man of respectable talents should set up the pretension that he can do more out of it than he can in, is, truly, humbling himself and the pulpit, to a very inconsiderable affair. No power that he can gain in enforcing his preaching, by seeking the wants and affections of his people in this way, can for a moment be set against this consideration. I say the pulpit requires study, and labor, and toil; and that, week after week, and month after month, to make it what it should be. There are mighty and enduring interests clustering there. And old matter will not always do for that stand. It must be ground over, and over, and over again. And it were a curious, but important question, were it capable of being accurately solved, how much more efficient and more attracting, would the pulpit be, were all the time spent in useless visits and chit-chat from house to house; the hours, and weeks, and months that are thus squandered—were all this time spent in faithful application of the minister's mind to the gathering up of useful and entertaining matter to redeem the pulpit from that charge of "everlasting sameness" which now sits upon it like an incubus, and drags it to the dust? And how much better would the people like it, too, should they once well find it out! No; the minister cannot do more out of the pulpit than he can in; he can do ten times more in than he can out. Or if he cannot, then I must say, that he has mistaken his office, and should seek another calling. And I say not this in any disparagement of the very humblest intellect. It looks to me, the most reasonable truth in the world.'

In conclusion, the preacher alludes very briefly, to the duty of cultivating acquaintance with the people, and especially, the duty of visiting the sick and bereaved and sorrowing. Thus will the minister be like the great Master, going about doing good, not wasting time in idle and hurtful gossiping, gathering praises and criticisms on sermons, and becoming like one of old who kept his shield turning—the white or black side out—just as circumstances needed. The pulpit is the place of power, and yet the minister mistakes his duty if he does not feel convinced that he should school his feelings, sympathies, and social tendencies, as that he may become one with the people, so that they may feel always assured that in their minister's heart is a deep, true and affectionate interest in their well being. Yet the apostolic direction is one which is seldom observed—the people should seek to know their minister.

THE CHILD AND THE BIBLE.

BY IONE.

'I LEFT my little son asleep with his arms folded around the Bible. He calls it mother's book and wishes it read to him at night.' The child is about two years of age.

Conversations with a Friend.

He sleepeth; and his soft, white arms enclose
God's holy word!
Peace o'er his brow her soft enchantment throws,
Nor is his bosom stirred
By one wild throb of anguish or of woe,
Such as maturer hearts must often know!

Fold ever thus, sweet boy, close to thy heart
The book of life!
It shall sustain thee if thy strength depart,
In the great battle's strife—
Bear thee triumphant through a world of sin,
Open the gates of heaven and lead thee in!

Blessings upon thee for the lesson taught,
Unconsciously by thee!
Within my heart its mission shall be wrought
Where none but God can see.
Love, with a single heart, thy guarded prize,
And keep thy sinless spirit from disguise!

I feel that bending angels mark the scene
With solemn joy!
Thou in thine innocence and sleep serene,
Which care does not destroy,
Clasping a gem unconscious of its worth,
While they are breathing 'it is not of earth!'

A CORRESPONDENCE.

THE following correspondence between a clergyman of the Free-will Baptist denomination, and a lady, who had for some years been a member of the church over which he is now settled as pastor, will explain itself. Its publication has been deemed desirable. It will undoubtedly be read with interest, by many whose circumstances have been similar to hers who forms the subject of these letters.

E——, N. H. Sept. 20, 1841.

Miss ——

DEAR SISTER:—Having an opportunity to send you an epistle by sister ——, and being desirous to know the state of your religious feelings and views, I embrace the occasion, deeming no other apology necessary than this, that I am now Pastor of the Free-will Baptist church in E——, N. H.

You can doubtless, call to mind the happy seasons you once enjoyed with your brethren and sisters in E——, when you met with them for the worship of God, and knelt there together for prayer to God for his Holy Spirit to be poured down upon you, and the blessed answers to your petitions, which you received, and how you sat with your brethren and sisters, in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, and enjoyed that hope which made you not ashamed to speak of his goodness to your soul; nor to warn sinners, and point them to the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world, and to plead with men to be reconciled to God, and come and taste and see how good the Lord is, and call on them to come and you would tell them what the Lord had done for your soul; that he had taken your feet out of an horrible pit of miry clay, and established your goings, and put a new song into your mouth, even praise to God. You can, in all probability, remember the place which you then selected for your retreat for secret prayer, and the heavenly season you there enjoyed, when you retreated from the bustle and busy concerns of life, to spend a few moments there in more intimate communion with God, when you had said to all of the world, stay here while I go and worship yonder. Oh, can you not remember how lovely Christ appeared to you then, and how you enjoyed a young heaven on earthly ground, and glory in the bud; and how your soul was wrapped up in visions of glory, and your soul could say, 'My willing soul would gladly stay in such a frame as this, and set and sing itself away to everlasting bliss?' Do you not remember how your soul yearned over the poor sinner, and how full your heart when you saw sinners turn a deaf ear to the calls of the gospel of Christ, and slight offered mercy, and choose to roll sin as a sweet morsel under their tongues? Do you not remember how your soul was fed with heavenly manna, as you listened to that devoted servant of God, whose tongue now is silent in death, and heard him pray men in Christ's stead to be reconciled to God? Have you forgotten all of those seasons you once enjoyed while you heard the word of life dispensed by ministers called of God as Aaron was, who counted their lives not dear to themselves, if they could but win souls to Christ?

Where is the blessedness of which you then spake? Where are the joys you then felt? By what spirit was you then led? Were you deceived, or did you in reality feel the love of God shed abroad in your heart, which passeth understanding? Did you not then feel a christian attachment to your brethren and sisters, which gave you an evidence that you had passed from death unto life? Did the spirit of God make these impressions upon your heart, or was it all delusion and fanaticism? I almost seem to hear you say, 'No; it was not delusion nor fanaticism, it was the spirit of the living God.' Then, my dear sister, why is it that you suffer us to pass on month after month, and no epistle comes from you to us to tell us of your prosperity or adversity, so that we may know how to bear your case to the throne of God's grace, and there remember you in our prayers? You may say, possibly, that you did not know you still was a member of the Free-will Baptist church in E——. If you do say so, sister, let me tell you it is no excuse, for you possess all the means of knowing, any time you please.

As there has been a report circulated here, in relation to your belief, permit me to ask you a few questions, which you will please answer by letter, and send the same by sister ———, by whom this is sent.

It is here currently reported that you have become a believer in the doctrine of Universalism. Is it true that you do believe that doctrine? Do you think it is proper for a Free-will Baptist church, believing as they do, in future rewards and punishments, and in the eternity of these, to report a Universalist as a Free-will Baptist?

If you do believe in Universalism, what would be a course of propriety and consistency for us to adopt, if you do not abandon it? If you cannot and will not abandon Universalism, can you blame us if we erase your name from the records of this church? Will you tell us plainly, what you do believe, and what you do mean to do?

This is all which relates to the church. But for my own private benefit, will you give me an explanation of Ezekiel 13th chapter and 22d verse, and tell me wherein that whole charge does not lay against Universalist preachers, in full justice?

Yours in all good will,

SALEM, Mass. Oct. 24, 1841.

Rev. ———: Dear Sir,—It is with great pleasure that I acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 20th ult., conveyed by the politeness of sister ———. In perusing its contents, there were two characteristics which gave me a high degree of satisfaction—they were the commendable interest which you manifest in my welfare, and the friendly and christian-like spirit which pervades the whole epistle. And inasmuch as you request and expect an answer, I would respectfully present the following to your consideration, as my reply.

You say I can doubtless call to mind the happy seasons I have enjoyed with the brethren and sisters in E——. Yes; I well remember those days. I was sincere in my faith and in my attempts to worship and serve God, and enjoyed much happiness therein—as all must, who are sincere and faithful followers of Christ, and diligent seekers after truth. But I praise my heavenly Father, that he has opened my eyes, and led me to see that the Religion of Jesus contains sources of happiness of which I was then entirely ignorant—sources as far exceeding those I formerly possessed, as the ocean exceeds a drop. No comparison can describe to you how much more happiness I now experience, in worshiping my Creator as 'the God of love and peace,' and the Father of the human race, than when I mingled with your church in former years, with my then limited faith.

You remind me of the time when, (to use your own language) I 'warned sinners, and pointed them to the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world.' Yes; I remember this too. But Oh, how blind and inconsistent I was, at the same time, to believe that Christ, the Lamb of God, would not take away the sin of the world; but that the sin of a vast part of the world, would remain untaken away forever! I pray God to forgive me this ignorance and unbelief in which I was then so deeply involved—and beseech him to give to all who are still cherishing this unbelieving spirit, the same happy deliverance he has mercifully granted unto me.

You also remind me of the time when I called upon sinners 'to come and I would tell them what the Lord had done for my soul—that he had taken my feet out of an horrible pit of miry clay, and established my goings, and put a new song into my mouth, even praise to God.' Yes; I had much to tell then, of what God had done for me; but blessed be his name, I have now, much more to tell of what he has since done for me. And I rejoice in this opportunity to tell you, and my dear brothers and sisters of the Free-will Baptist church at E——, what the Lord has done for me, while I have been away from them. He has removed a dark veil of ignorance, which then intercepted my spiritual sight—he has caused the scales of prejudice and unbelief to fall from my eyes—he has revealed himself to me in a light so adorable and attractive, as to captivate and fill with love and reverence, every capacity of my soul—even as a God of power Omnipotent, of Wisdom unerring, and of Love, boundless, impartial, unchanging, and eternal—as a God who rules his creation with so much wisdom, perfection and goodness, that everything shall finally eventuate in such manner, as shall promote his own glory, and secure the repentance, purity and happiness of that great family which he has created upon the earth! He has also revealed his Son unto me, as ‘the Savior of the world,’ as the Lamb of God, who indeed and in reality, ‘taketh away the sin of the world!’—so that when his work is finished, there shall be no more sin, no more evil, no more wretchedness, no more tears, but all shall be filled with the love of God, the holiness of the angels, and the happiness of heaven! Is there not perfection, and beauty, and glory here? I ask you—I ask my dear brothers and sisters of the church at E—, if you, or they can find anything in the pure and christian feelings of your souls, to object to, or dislike, in these views of God and of the Lamb? If you can, from what spirit is the objection made to so general a ‘spread of righteousness and felicity? With these soul-cheering prospects in view, revealed unto me by the grace of God, can you wonder that I feel he has truly ‘taken my feet out of an horrible pit of miry clay,’—even out of the pit of dark, dreadful, soul-withering and peace-destroying error,—and put a new song indeed, into my mouth—a song of praise to that justice which chastens and punishes us ‘for our profit’—praise to that wisdom which can bring out good from all evil—praise to that love, that ‘great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins’—(see Eph. ii. 4, 5)—to that impartial love which influenced him to send his Son into the world, ‘not to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved.’ This is the new song that has been put into my mouth; and can you be surprized that it gives me a joy and peace which is inexpressible?

You write me another inquiry—‘Oh, can you not remember how lovely Christ appeared to you then—and how your soul was wrapped up in visions of glory?’ I answer in the affirmative. Christ did appear lovely to me then, even when viewing him as saving but a part of the world. But I ask you to conceive, if it is possible, how much more lovely—yea how transcendently lovely—he must appear to me now, as the actual ‘Savior of all men’ from sin and death. It is true, I had visions of glory then; but there was ever a dark cloud resting upon those visions, which destroyed their brightest lustre. While rejoicing at the prospect of my own salvation, the thought that some of my beloved relatives and friends, and millions of my fellow-beings, whom God commands me to love, will be plunged into ceaseless woe, and darkness, and sin, where they can have no opportunity to repent and turn to God, but where they will blaspheme his holy name forever—gave me inexpressible pain and anguish of heart, which embittered all the peace that I might otherwise have enjoyed. And what soul possessing the spirit and love of the gospel, what soul that has benevolence and compassion within it, can fail of being unspeakably pained, in contemplating such an awful prospect as this! If you, or the members of your church, declare that the contemplation of these terrific evils, in your visions of glory, do not dim those visions, and give you great pain and anxiety, then I have erred in giving you credit for more of that spirit of love and compassion, which moved the Savior to ‘give himself a ransom for all,’ than you would thus represent yourselves as possessing. I rejoice that this dark feature is entirely removed from the visions which now enwrap my soul, in worshipping and praising the purest and best of all beings. I behold in the Divine Nature, in the all-perfect attributes of Jehovah, and in the gospel kingdom and reign of his Son, such measureless depths of grace, and mercy, and love—such infinite and inexhaustible capabilities and resources,—such unknown vastness of ways and means at disposal for the accomplishment of all good, and desirable, and benevolent, and righteous works—as to allow me to indulge in the most joyful hope and assurance, that at such times and seasons, and by such means as ‘the God of love’ shall judge best, he will bring to repentance, reformation and happiness, all his imperfect creatures! Oh, here is a vision that may well enwrap the soul of the christian with ‘joy unspeakable and full of glory!’ Here is a vision which now fills my mind, as much exceeding those that formerly visited me in brightness, in splendor and glory, as the beams of the glowing noon-day sun exceed the twinkling of a solitary star of night!

You ask—‘Where is the blessedness of which you then spake? Where are the joys you then felt? By what spirit was you then led?’ I answer—The blessedness of which I then spake, has become enlarged into the broader and sweeter blessedness, which I now constantly enjoy. The joys I then felt, have been magnified, infinitely magnified, into that higher and holier joy, that joy too deep for human utterance, which now fills my heart, in the assurance, that not a few here and there, shall repent and live, but all for whom the Savior tasted death, shall repent and live. As to the spirit by which I was then led, I am apprehensive it was a small, partial, selfish spirit, which led me to endeavor to find satisfaction in believing in my own salvation, without reference to the doom that might await others around me. But I cannot be too grateful to my Creator, that as he has put a ‘new song’ into my mouth,’ so has he put a new spirit into my heart—even his own spirit of love—a love so deep, so broad, so all-comprehensive, that I cannot feel ever to be infinitely happy, unless I can be assured all my fellow beings will be righteous and happy also!

You ask me why I have not written to the church at E—, to inform them of my prosperity or adversity. You will pardon me, Sir, but this appears to me a very singular inquiry. I have always supposed it to be the duty of the pastor to look after his flock, especially those of them who are in danger of going astray. May I not, then, inquire why I have received no letter, except in the present instance, during the many years I have been absent, from either pastor or church member at E—, asking information as to my spiritual welfare? I have been in company with at least one of your predecessors, and with many of the members of the church, since the enlargement of my faith, and no questions have been put to me,—no steps taken to reclaim me from error, if I was wandering into it. If, therefore, there is any fault to be found on the subject, I think I have more reason to complain of neglect, than the church.

I will now attend to the particular inquiries which your letter contains in regard to my faith, and my connection with your church. Your first inquiry is as follows:—'It is here currently reported that you have become a believer in the doctrine of Universalism. Is it true that you do believe that doctrine?'

In answer to this inquiry, I would state, that I do not suppose I believe in what you call Universalism. But that there may be a perfect understanding upon this subject, I will briefly state my belief in regard to the extent of salvation, which is the point involved in your questions. I believe that in 'the seed of Abraham,' which the Apostle says, is Christ, 'shall all the families of the earth be blessed.' Gen. xxviii. 14; see also Gal. iii. 8, and Acts iii. 25, 26. I believe it is the 'will,' the 'good pleasure,' and the 'purpose' of God, to gather 'all things' into Christ. Eph. i. 9, 10. I believe in 'the times of the Restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began.' Acts iii. 20, 21. I believe that 'all the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before him.' Ps. xxii. 27. I believe that 'the Lord will not cast off forever.' Lam. iii. 31. I believe the words of the Savior, 'And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me.' John xii. 32. I believe that God will 'reconcile all things unto himself.' Colos. i. 20. I believe that 'as in Adam all die, even so in Christ, shall all be made alive.' 1 Cor. xv. 22, and that 'if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature,—old things have passed away; behold all things are become new.' 2 Cor. v. 17. I believe that 'as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly.' 1 Cor. xv. 49. I believe 'God hath concluded them all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all.' Rom. xi. 32. I believe that God 'will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth.' 1 Tim. ii. 4.

The above Scripture passages express my belief as to the extent of salvation. If these declarations of God's word, are Universalism, then I am an Universalist; but if they are not Universalism, then I am not an Universalist. I am quite indifferent as to what name I bear. If I can but love God and my fellow-beings—if I can but cherish the spirit and faith of the gospel, and believe the declarations of divine inspiration, it is all I ask. I care not whether the world call me Universalist, Free-will Baptist, or any other name of sect or party. With the love of God shed abroad in my soul—with faith in him as my Father, and in Jesus, as my Savior, and 'the Savior of the world,' I am content—all else in regard to sectarian names, I deem as empty as 'sounding brass.'

You inquire—'Do you believe it is proper for a Free-will Baptist church, believing as they do, in future rewards and punishments, and in the eternity of these, to report a Universalist as a Free-will Baptist?' I answer, No.

Your next inquiry is as follows:—'If you do believe in Universalism, what would be a course of propriety and consistency for us to adopt, if you do not abandon it?' To this inquiry I would reply—If the Free-will Baptist church of E—, deem my belief, as above expressed, to be heresy—if they have no fellowship for such belief,—then 'propriety and consistency,' would seem to require that they should grant me a respectful letter of dismission, signifying their consent that I should withdraw from their church. And in case of such disagreement in faith, I would hereby notify you of my desire and design to withdraw my membership from your church.

This concludes the portion of your letter which relates to my connection with your church. And I wish my brothers and sisters of the church at E—, to believe, that in requesting to be allowed to withdraw from them, I am actuated by no feelings of bitterness or enmity. I still cherish toward them the same emotions of regard and sisterly affection that I have always entertained. I pray that the richest of God's blessings may descend upon you all, individually and collectively—that you may be led speedily to a knowledge of the full truth, as revealed in Jesus—that you may be filled with the kind and gentle spirit, and the broad universal love of the gospel—that you may faithfully love and serve God in the present life, and be received with the ransomed of the Lord, into purity and bliss, in the life to come. It is impossible to describe the joy and peace I receive from the assurance, that although we may differ in our faith here, we shall meet hereafter with a redeemed and reconciled universe, in a world where there will be 'one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all.' In this hope and belief in the final repentance of all sinners, the ultimate reconciliation of all beings to God, I can find rest and peace. It crowns the whole work of creation, and the whole scheme of redemption, with a perfection, a beauty, and glory, which I look for in vain, in any of the creeds or doctrines of man. It is such a termination of the reign of Christ, as every true christian must desire, must hope for, and pray for. And finding the most convincing evidence of it, in Scripture, in reason and nature, and believing it as I sincerely do, can you wonder that my soul is filled with rejoicing? Would you not rejoice could you believe that all for whom you pray—even all the sinful world,—would in due time, (in such time as God, in his infinite wisdom shall deem the most proper,) be turned from the love and service of sin, to holiness, blessedness and peace? I know that this belief would give you the most inexpressible joy. Blame me not then, brothers and sisters, that God has mercifully enlarged my faith so as to take in this crowning glory of the gospel, this brightest beam in the lustre of the Sun of eternal and impartial Love! this perfection of all faith, this entire filling up of the cup of joy! May you all in due time, be led into this light, this liberty and this joy of the gospel. May you be brought, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit of Truth, to give God the glory that belongs to him—the glory of creating the world, not under such circumstances of imperfection, as that a part shall fall into endless ruin, which he must have foreseen, but the glory of creating them in such a manner, that they shall all at last, become stars of beauty in his kingly diadem of love! May you be led also to give Christ that glory to which he is justly entitled—the glory of not only attempting to save the world, but of actually succeeding in his blessed work, and actually saving all for whom he tasted death!

At the conclusion of your letter, you say:—‘For my own private benefit, will you give me an explanation of Ezekiel xiii. 22, and tell me wherein that whole charge does not lie against Universalist preachers in full justice?’ I must express my great surprise, that you should suppose this passage contains any charge against Universalist ministers. They are the last class in the world, which can be considered as subject to its imputations. Were you to address your inquiry to any of those ministers, I have no doubt they would return an answer which would place the subject in a very different light from that in which you now seem to view it. But as you have directed your inquiry directly to me, I shall return you such answer as my abilities will allow, and one that I hope may prove satisfactory. The passage to which you refer reads as follows:—‘Because with lies ye have made the heart of the righteous sad, whom I have not made sad; and strengthened the hands of the wicked that he should not return from his wicked way, by promising him life.’

In regard to the first part of this passage; you will perceive that the question is not who makes the Free-will Baptist sad—or who makes the Methodist, or Orthodox, or Universalist, sad; but who makes the righteous sad—who makes the good man sad, the man who has the spirit of Christ, and the love of God shed abroad in his heart?

Now how does this passage apply to Universalist ministers?—how do they make the heart of the righteous sad? I suppose your reply will be, that they make the hearts of the righteous sad, by the doctrine they preach. But what doctrine do they preach? They preach that God will overrule all evil, and make it terminate in Universal good. Does that thought make the heart of the righteous sad? They preach that Christ shall destroy the devil and all his works—see Heb. ii. 14, and 1 John iii. 8. Does this thought make the righteous sad? They preach that all sinners shall be brought to repentance—that every child of Adam shall be reconciled to God—that every member of the human family shall become pure and holy and happy—that the Good Shepherd shall seek and find every lost sheep of the great flock, even all men, for whom he died—that he shall bring them back to God the rightful owner, and that thenceforth there shall be but one sheepfold and one Shepherd! Can any of these doctrines, make the heart of the righteous sad? If these sentiments make their hearts sad, pray what will make their hearts glad? No. If Universalist ministers wished to make the righteous sad, they would preach that God will not or cannot overrule all evil for good—they would preach that the devil shall never be destroyed, but shall forever live and forever triumph over millions of God’s creatures, and eternally deride and laugh at all that God, and Christ, and angels, can do to break his power or deliver man from his clutches—they would preach that all sinners shall not repent, nor become reconciled to the Father of spirits—that all shall not become pure, nor happy—that the Good Shepherd shall not find all his lost sheep—but that countless multitudes who were created in the image of God, and for whom the Savior shed his precious blood, and who are the objects of the love of God, and Christ, and angels and good men, shall be plunged into ceaseless despair and agony, there to blaspheme and writhe, world without end! Oh, horror of horrors! If Universalist ministers were to preach such doctrines, and were to make the righteous believe them, then would they become sad, sad indeed, if they possessed the least spark of love, and if their hearts were not harder than the nether mill-stone! Judge ye what kind of preachers make the hearts of the righteous sad!

But do Universalist preachers ‘strengthen the hands of the wicked?’ This inquiry can be answered by showing what they preach to the wicked, in regard to their wickedness. They preach that God will bring the sinner into judgment for every crime that he commits—that ‘the wicked are like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt’—that ‘the soul that sinneth, it shall die’—that ‘though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished’—that no man can possibly sin, without receiving, either in this world or the next, all the punishment that his iniquity deserves, or God's justice demands! This is what they preach to the wicked; and I ask you candidly, if a wicked man hears this preaching and believes it, can it strengthen his hands? Your own good sense will tell you it cannot. But if they were to preach a different doctrine—if they were to leave a loop-hole through which the sinner constantly flatters himself he will avoid the penalty of his sins—if they were to preach a doctrine which teaches that a man may run riot in sin, and plunge into iniquity, and glut all his wicked passions, for three score years and ten, and then by repenting of his crimes, can escape all punishment here and hereafter—then they would indeed strengthen the hands of the wicked!—judge ye, then, what class of ministers strengthen the hands of the wicked! I trust I have dwelt sufficiently on this subject, to satisfy you, that to whomsoever this passage of Scripture does apply, it cannot be made justly applicable to the preachers of God's free and impartial grace. If Universalism strengthens the hands of the wicked, why is it that our prisons are not filled with Universalists?—why is it that in a late examination of Charlestown, Mass. State Prison, not one Universalist was found, while the great mass of the convicts are believers in endless woe! If the proclamation of doctrines of endless wrath and fury, is so salutary and restraining, how is it that at least nine tenths of all the most wicked wretches in christendom, are believers in those doctrines, and have never heard any different sentiment preached? I pray you sir, look around and let facts convince you, that you have been led by prejudice to attribute influences of a corrupt nature to the preaching of the gospel of impartial love, which it never does and never can produce!

In conclusion I would respectfully request that you would read this letter to the Free-will Baptist church of E—, as my reply to your epistle.

I remain yours in the love and charity of the gospel,

LINES TO A PORTRAIT.

BY MRS. J. R. SPOONER.

MAIDEN with the meek blue eye—
Hair of richest golden dye,
Lip of coral, snowy brow,
Beauty's charm is on thee now,—
Yet a nobler gift hast thou!
Genius rare, and lofty thought,
Tell thy mind is richly fraught
With aspirations strong and deep—
Yearnings that shall never sleep;
Breaking from th' immortal soul,
Onward they must ever roll,
Till in heaven thou dost find
All desires of the mind,

Shall be 'satisfied' above,
Dwelling with a God of love.

More than this thine eye doth tell,
And I read the tale too well
In thy sad and chastened brow—
In the sorrow that doth now
Steal the roses from thy cheek,
And the lily's reign bespeak—
In the sadness of thine eye,
And the rising of that sigh,
There are shadows o'er thee cast
By the memory of the past!
Maiden! hast thou not believed
Thou hast loved and been deceived.

A BEACON-LIGHT.

BY DELTA.

THE quaint John Bunyan hath written what will cause thousands and tens of thousands, not unfrequently, to regard this life as a perilous and danger-encompassed pilgrimage. Though no equal genius has been employed in the representation of life under the allegory of a voyage, yet that is a similitude which as often as the above occurs to us. We think of ourselves in life as employed in making a voyage upon a dark and stormy sea, our bark beaten about by tempestuous winds, tossed upon tumultuous waves, and ever in danger of damage or shipwreck from rocks and shoals, and those eddying whirlpools and disastrous currents or trade winds of which a diseased public sentiment is the origin. Truly, and profitably too, may life be regarded as a dangerous and difficult voyage; for how often, alas! do we see shipwreck made of man's best treasures, best hopes, best blessings. These shipwrecks should not be without warning to us. Where others have foundered we should erect a Pharos, a beacon-light.

Of all the rocks which we have laid down in our chart, we guard particularly against one. Of all the beacon-lights which we have erected for guidance over this dark and stormy sea of life, there is one marked and prominent. The rock is that on which a whole nation foundered; the beacon-light burns brilliant where once, upon Mount Zion gleamed resplendently in the rays of the sun, the Jewish Temple of our God. The rock which shivered to pieces the nation of the Jews was Prejudice—obstinate adherence to traditionary dogmas. On that rock have we built our most brilliantly illuminated light-house. Of that rock would we call on all our friends—on all our race, to beware. Besides the Jews, that rock has shipwrecked and sunk its thousands.

The city of Jerusalem was laid in ruins—the guilty nation of the Jews was scattered abroad, and why? Because they obstinately persisted, in spite of the clearest and strongest evidence, in adherence to priest-prescribed, popular, and traditional opinions relating to their expected Messiah. They rejected, in consequence of this obstinate adherence, the clearest proofs of the Messiahship of the lowly Nazarene—even miraculous attestations of the divinity of his mission. The faithful and true Witness—the well-accredited Messenger of Heaven, they denounced as a blasphemer and impostor. For this, in conjunction with many previous departures from duty and abuse of privileges, were the seed of Abraham cast off, and visited with great tribulation, 'such as was not since the beginning of the world to that time, no, nor ever shall be.' And in the scriptural records of the facts connected with this case have we not a beacon-light, an admonition by God himself, to all succeeding generations, to guard, with utmost caution, against this rock on which his chosen people suffered shipwreck?

In the case of the Jews we see, in a strong light, the power of Prejudice, Pre-conception, Pre-judgment. We see in them a signal manifestation of the truth that a mental bias or prejudice is inaccessible to the strongest evidence, even the evidence of miracles—that where interest or pride of opinion or attachment to party are in the way, no evidence—not even that of a miracle,—can avail to banish cherished ideas, or withdraw the mind from its previous modes of thinking.

Let us then cherish openness to conviction—a Love of Truth, which is indeed that 'Spirit of Truth,' which Christ promised to send to his disciples as their 'Comforter'—as 'the best substitute for his personal presence and teaching among them. Love of Truth is the Love of God—to love and obey the Truth, are the only means by which we can elevate our thoughts of God, and so love Him more, or by which we can elevate our own nature, and so develope what is God-like in ourselves. Let the Beacon-light of the Jewish nation warn us to beware of Prejudice—and to cling, with full purpose of heart, to an unfailing devotion to Truth: and freedom, progress and heavenly peace shall be our portion and reward. 'He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.'

THE FLEETNESS OF TIME.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON

WHEN we look abroad upon the darkly undulating wave of human life, we readily discover that change, blight and ruin mark our passage through this vale of sorrow and tears.

Life is a continued quarantine, where our frail barks are tossing about, vainly striving to enter the port of happiness, that we may escape the rough blasts of adversity that sweep wildly over the stormy billows. Time waits for no man. Whatever of good we purpose to perform, let us be diligent, remembering that the night cometh wherein no man can work. Can we in any way aid a fellow pilgrim; let us not postpone the work. Can our humble endeavors promote the great cause of religion and humanity? Let us not forego the present opportunity. Sleeping or waking, our days are on the wing. If we look upon the past, they seem but as a point; and change and desolation have marked their flight. New characters arise in every scene, new principles, and even a new creation insensibly arises from the ashes of the old. The great feature of human nature is rapidity of growth and declension. Ages are renewed, generation succeeds generation, but the fashion of this world passeth away. God only remains the same, unchangeable, immutable, and glorious. The torrent that bears us onward down the vale of Time, rushes to mingle with the waves of eternity's ocean, which through the 'countless lapse of ages has rolled around the pillars of his imperishable throne; where veiled with unapproachable grandeur, he sees from the dazzling clouds of his glory, the puny race of mortality, as they swiftly pass their onward way; cheating their pride, and insulting his majesty by the visionary hopes of sharing that attribute that belongs to him alone.

Change, change is written upon the very threshold of existence; and until we pass the hoary portals of Time, we shall in our own natures verify the definition of the word. I know there are some among our own order, who say that when the spirit passes the bonds of mortality, it shall at once be endowed with infinity of vision and knowledge, and can no more be susceptible of change. To me this is an unintelligible idea, for I cannot conceive how we can ever comprehend the Godhead. And for one I suppose there may be enough of the unexplored mysteries and glories of the boundless creation, to gratify even my unsatisfied mind, through cycles of eternal ages, while still I am at an immense distance from the fullness of knowledge which I may attain. It may be because science has barred her doors against me, that I esteem her pearls so highly; but it seems to me as if knowledge—that knowledge which shall compel the spirit to reverence and adore the inexhaustible fountain of Truth and love, must be the very foundation of all our bliss, in the glorious state we so fondly anticipate. Nor does it derogate from my anticipations of happiness, to suppose that I shall continue to learn from age to unending age, while still new glories of the Incomprehensible One are forever unfolding to my enraptured vision.

But I am digressing. My object in penning these feeble remarks, was to endeavor to impress upon our brethren and sisters, not to forget amid all the changing scenes that surround them, that God is unchangeable. That what he requires once, he never ceases to require of us; and that the service he requires of us, is for our best possible good, as well as his own eternal glory. Now in all humility I would ask, (and I put the question to those whom God has endowed with abilities for obtaining wealth, and blessed the exercise of those abilities,) whether they do as faithful stewards use their energies for the advancement of the gospel kingdom; whose purifying influences alone can lead the human soul in that path, which shall shine brighter and brighter unto the perfect day. When the unseen angel shall hover around our pillow, what legacy would we wish to leave our children? Surely, the priceless pearl of a religious heart, as an amulet to guard and keep them, in every trial and temptation. Then let us be faithful, and according to our best ability help to establish and spread the glorious gospel that was proclaimed on the hills of Judea by him whose life was a tissue of goodness.

THE DYING STUDENT* TO HIS NURSE.

'TALK to me of heaven; tell me of Jesus.'

Oh! talk to me of heaven; of that blessed shore,
For which my spirit's pluming its swift flight;
The feverish dream of life will soon be o'er,
Shut out its pageants from my fading sight.

Tell me of heaven; earth cannot aid me now;
Vainly I've striven for its gilded crowns;
What now to me with death-damps on my brow,
Its smiling honor—or its chilling frowns.

Tell me of Jesus; him who knelt and prayed
In agony—the cup might pass away;
How shall man meet the contest undismayed,
When He the guiltless—struggled for delay!

Have I not struggled? mighty the conflict's been,
Between the spirit and this trembling clay;
Mournful and long has been the task to wean
All bright affections from the world away.

But I have conquered; comes it O God! from thee,
This soaring triumph o'er the dreaded grave?
It must be so; none else the soul could free
From the strong fear of death's o'er-mastering wave.

Farewell, old Harvard! from thy ancient elms,
The summer leaves by Autumn winds are riven;
Revealing in their fall night's starry realms,
Those realms that breathe high hopes of bliss and heaven.

So from my spirit, while its leaves are shedding,
Look I thro' death and gloom on one bright star
Beaming from courts my feet will soon be treading,
Guiding me onwards to that land afar.

Oh! cease not yet; thy words are meek and mild,
Shrouding the future in no rayless gloom;
A fitting teacher of His truths who toiled,
To break the mists that gather round the tomb.

* A member of the Senior class of Harvard College.

Still let thy voice of heavenly glories tell;

I've yielded up the palm—the Laurel wreath;
Let holier visions on my last hours swell,
God's name the last—that hallows parting breath.

THE GOSSIPINGS OF IDLE HOURS.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

HOOR SEVENTH.

THERE, the fire burns brightly now, and its genial warmth, diffused through my chilly frame, has acted by a kind of sympathetic magnetism upon my brain and heart. How unfortunate, now that I am in a social mood, that no kind neighbor will 'just drop in' to chat an hour with me.

Rap! rap! rap! How like a fairy benison comes that welcome announcement of a visitor! Who, I wonder, can it be? Let us take a peep through the window before giving admittance. Ah! it is old Uncle Moses, the village sexton. I know him by his long white hair and low-crowned hat. It is too bad to keep the old man standing so long in the furious storm. I will hasten to admit him.

Take the arm-chair, Uncle Moses, and let me unlade your cloak of the snow that has gathered upon it like a drapery of ermine.

'Shake off the snow, you mean, girl, I suppose. Pray don't starch up your sentences, and embroider them over with so many figures and fine words. I am an old man, and love to hear things said in the old-fashioned, homespun way. Young ladies are getting to be sadly artificial, now-a-days.'

True, Uncle Moses; and I beg pardon for having offended your ears with 'fine words.' It is not a common fault of mine, I assure you. If any body talks simply, it is I. So allow me to draw my chair close to your side, and have a real gossip with you about things past, present and to come. First, then, is there any 'news' about the village:

'News; yes, that's it! You women are also wanting something new. Gossip is the food you live upon.'

Now don't be so hard upon us, Uncle Moses. You know there must be a little pepper in the dish of life, and I have had none in mine for a long while past. So do tell me directly, have there been no births, deaths or marriages within the last month?

'I used my spade yesterday.'

Oh, Uncle Moses! you make me shudder. Pray don't be so frightfully laconic. Tell me at once, who is dead.

'No one. I used it to break the ice from my doorstep.'

How could you frighten me so for nothing. But as you seem determined to tell me nothing of recent occurrence, do satisfy my cravings for novelty with some fragments from your basket of memories. I am sure you must be rich in reminiscences.

'I am, I am, girl! An old grave-digger like me is always picking up some little incident to lay aside in his store-house of recollections. But they are all of them simple and trite—scarce worth repeating to one who is eager as you are for novelty. However, I will talk to you awhile about some of the tenants of my houses—those narrow houses with green, grassy roofs, and graven slate-stones for tiles. Do you remember a beautiful white rose-bush, the only one in the grave-yard, that hangs its blossoms over the wall, near the gate?'

Yes, I have often paused at that spot, and wondered whether it were a grave—for there is no monument or name to give token of any sleeper beneath.

'If you had searched more carefully, you would have found a small tablet which lies quite hidden by the grass. "Jeanette" was the name of the lovely girl whose grave is there, and it is the only epitaph left to memorialize her quiet history. I had not been many years a digger of graves, when there moved into the little mossy-roofed cottage by the church, a young Scotch gardener and his wife. One day as I stood by a half-made grave-pit, leaning wearily upon my spade, a little fairy of a girl came tripping modestly to my side. I am a great lover of little children, and never repulse them when they come about me at my work. This little girl fastened herself to my heart at once. She told me her name. It was Jeanette. She was the daughter, the only child of the Scotch gardener.

'From this day forth she never saw me at my work, that she did not make herself my companion. How she would chase about among the old gray tombstones, plucking the yellow dandelions and the purple heal-all, and weaving them into garlands to hang upon the baby-headstones! One day she found a nest of young robins close under the shelter of a reclining grave-stone; and such delight as the sweet creature experienced in feeding and watching the little brood, was beautiful to behold. Till she was sixteen years old, this darling girl never long neglected her favorite haunt. She became to me the angel of the place, cheering me ever in my hard and gloomy toil, and bringing her own serene and cheerful piety to brighten the darker colors of my own.

'About this time she suddenly neglected me; and I used to see her walking in another and more retired retreat, accompanied by a young, dark eyed youth, to whom in the course of time she was solemnly plighted by the holiest of lovers' vows. The young fellow enlisted as a soldier, went to battle, and was killed before he had gained a single honor. Poor Jeanette! she returned now to her olden haunt, but with a face and step so changed, it used to sadden, more than in former times it had cheered me to see her approach.

She never spoke of Harry; but she brought green and fragrant shrubs and planted them in the corner by the gate; and then she came to me with a sweet moonlight smile upon her lips; "Uncle Moses," she said, "I wish you to dig my grave just in the centre of those rose-bushes; and then, after you have covered me over, let the green grass grow upon the spot, and have nothing but a simple tablet bearing my name, laid there to designate my resting-place."

'Long be the time ere I am called to so mournful an office,' I replied, looking anxiously into the dear girl's eyes, which were unnaturally large and bright. She smiled again, and glided silently away. It was her last visit. When next she came, she was borne by the hands of eight weeping boys, and lowered into the grave which she had bade me dig among her rose-trees. That beautiful bush which now clammers over the wall, is the only one that has till this day survived; for it is now twenty years since they laid that little lamb in her quiet bed.'

Poor Jeanette! I shall visit that spot with a new interest in future. It is true, then, that woman does sometimes die of a broken heart.

'Indeed she does, often, often. If you doubt it, go with me some day among the tenements in yonder church-yard. I can point out to you more than a dozen mounds beneath which moulder away the fragments of broken hearts. Some have wasted beneath neglect; some have been corrupted and betrayed; others have been eaten away by sorrows that are without names; and not a few have died as Jeanette did, because the link of love was irremediably broken, to be re-united, only, in the world of enduring bliss.'

I doubt it not, Uncle Moses. Indeed, I presume I may follow their example.

'Not while that "lurking devil" in your eye (Uncle Moses reads the poets) so strongly belies the presumption. There are forty-nine wild spirits to be tamed in your heart before it will be in a breaking condition.'

Do you think so? So much the merrier my life will be, then—that is all. But why do you go so soon? You have not given me half your reminiscences yet.

'Wait till another time, child. My heart is too sad now, thinking of pretty Jeanette.'

TO THE MEMORY OF W. P.

I STAND beside the foaming shore,
Where once so oft in youth I stood,
I hear the restless waters roar,
The awful music of the flood;
Sad thoughts come o'er me—and I think
On by-past hours of mirth and glee,
When I have trod their mighty brink
With thee, departed friend! with thee.

And thou hast passed the peaceful shore
Beyond the reach of toil or pain,
And I, in sadness, must deplore,
That here we cannot meet again;
We parted, as friends ever part,
With kindly look and troubled eye,
Oh! who that knew thy gentle heart,
Could part from thee without a sigh!

But little deemed we then, that ere
My footstep there again should roam,
Thine should be hushed within the drear
And silent limits of the tomb!
That o'er thy dying pillow, far
By distant Afric's burning wave,
No friend should watch thy slumbers there,
Or weep above thy lonely grave.

Dim tears are in mine eyes—my heart
Is with thee on that lonely shore,
I watch thy fitting breath depart,
I feel thou art on earth no more;—
But shrined within my inmost soul,
Shall be 'mid thoughts most dear to me,
Till Life's dark billows cease to roll,
Sweet memories, lost friend! of thee.

'MEMENTO MORI.'

BY MISS M. A. DODD.

I HAVE been walking through Chestnut Street, that scene of business and gaiety and fashion, where the Philadelphia lady goes to display her silks and satins; where the gentleman of ton shows his fine broadcloth and finer ruffles; where the merchant piles and un-piles the choicest goods, and sets a price upon them which even the wealthy are unwilling to pay; where through the wide windows, every article of dress and ornament, the rich fabrics, the glittering jewelry, the splendid china, the shining glass, the costly plate and glowing pictures, are all displayed to please the fancy and tempt the eye. There the tailor will cut your coat in the most approved fashion, there you may purchase shoes, and hats, and gloves, such as are patronised by the exclusives; and there art, and genius, and industry, bring the fruit of their labors, and wealth and luxury receive them and give the merited reward.

It was a fair and sunny day, such as calls forth the man of leisure, the lovely woman, the delicate girl, and the happy child; there were many such passing, with measured pace and languid air; and there were others also, who, on business thoughts intent, were hurrying to and fro along the pavement. But were all well dressed, and wealthy and gay? No, oh no! for there too, was the old man in tattered garments leaning upon his crutch; the woman wrinkled, and thin and pale, offering her little store of cakes to the passer by with a beseeching air; the poor sweep with his soiled blanket and sooty face; the weary news boy and the ragged, neglected child. I did not envy the fortunate who passed me in their pride; but I pitied the weary, the old, the forsaken and the poor. I thought there must be something in wealth to harden the heart, else would the rich man have taken him by the hand who asked for bread and led him to his fire-side and his board; else would the fair girl, smiling in gems and satins, have guided the weeping child to a shelter, and clothed and fed it from her abundant store. I would ask for wealth only to be generous, only to have the means of doing good, but if the possession of much gold, brings with it much selfishness, I would say with the wise man, 'give me neither poverty nor riches,' let not my heart be insensible to the miseries of those around me, which I have the means, without the will, to relieve.

But where was all that throng of human beings hastening? They were coming and going, hither and thither; but however far their paths might diverge, the end of their journey would be the same; for the aged pilgrim, with tottering steps, the woman in her summer years, the purse proud man, the wandering child, and the lovely maiden, were all hastening to the same place, the grave.

There are many grave-yards in, and around this thickly peopled city, and all who now hurry over the pavements in the vigor of life, are few compared with the dead who have been buried out of their sight. How quiet the lost and mourned are slumbering, each in their narrow bed! they wake not from their rest at the dawn of morning, and the noonday sun dazzles not, nor unseals their eyes. The daily din does not disturb them; the thundering noise of the heavy wagon, the fireman's shout, the pealing bells, and the trampling of many feet, are all unheard by them; but the sound of the last trump shall awaken them, the voice of the Redeemer shall call them from their rest. How startling is the contrast between the life, the noise, the activity without, and the stillness, loneliness and peace within, the burial ground of a city! We pass from the thronged street, to the deserted grave; from the laugh, the jest and the shout, to the records of sorrow and the memorials of perishing mortality; from the paved way and the stately dwelling, to the green sod, the weeping willow and the mournful yew.

I would rather choose a cemetery without the city for my place of rest. Laurel Hill is a lovely spot. It was a fair, mild day in October that I first saw it, when the sky was soft and the air balmy as summer, and the mellow tint upon the foliage and the purple haze in the atmosphere, subdued the brightness without taking the beauty from any thing around. It is on such a day that I love to linger among the tombs; for a sweet sadness, a pleasant melancholy, fills and softens my heart. The frost had not stepped over the green turf to steal its freshness; only a few leaves had fallen in the pathway; bright roses were blooming among the graves, and the soft sunlight shone over all like the smile of a mother watching her children as they sleep. A sparkling river rolled its silver waves along, and the eye followed their bright path between the green and sloping shores, till far away, river, and shore, and upland, were lost in the hazy distance. A dreamy quiet reigned all around, and with slow steps and subdued emotions we passed among the sculptured monuments, and over the hallowed ground. Affection has caused many a touching emblem, many a fond memento, to be carved in marble over the spot where she has buried her dead. A fair child was cut down like a rose in its morning beauty, and the fond parents placed its marble semblance to point out where its perishing frame was laid. O, beautiful is the sculptor's art which could mould from the inanimate stone such a form of innocent, infantine loveliness, that seems to need but the breath of life, to make it perfect, to warm it into a cherub! How soft seems the pillow on which the young head with its straying curls is reposing; how delicate the flower clasped in the little hand; and how heavenly the expression of the still face, the round cheek, sealed lids, and silent mouth; and when the setting sun seemed to light those features with a holy smile, I almost fancied that angel wings were folded beneath its form, which would soon unfurl and waft it to heaven.

There too, in that place of graves, is 'Old Mortality;' but he moves not about with his chisel and mallet to renew the epitaphs which the elements have defaced; he no longer relates to the curious tales of the olden time; of the wars of royalist and covenanters; of the loyalty of Lady Margaret, the fanaticism of Burley, and the cruelties of Claverhouse; but turned to stone, he seems still to be engaged in his favorite occupation of retracing the letters on the tombs of the Cameronians, while he moralizes over his task to the meditative man, who leans in listening attitude against a stone near by. There too, is the grave, sedate, and faithful animal, which bore Old Mortality about the country on his labors of love, and he looks as though he could tell a tale, or preach a homily as well as his master; for I never saw a horse who appeared more humble or more wise. It is worth a long pilgrimage to see that sculptured group; for the scene so beautifully described in the words of the novelist, is here as faithfully represented in stone, and the characters appear before us like some old familiar friends.

How beautifully the broken column, the wreathed urn, and the tall shaft of stainless marble, gleam out from among the dark green trees! Art and taste have united to adorn this favored spot, for it is here that the wealthy and the high-born are reposing. Hither comes the hearse, with nodding plumes, bearing the costly coffin which contains the lifeless form, followed by the long line of carriages with the numerous circle of mourning friends; here the flower is planted, and the tree cultivated, by the hand of affection, and fair blossoms and bright foliage make pleasant the resting place of the dead. But how many in this great city yield their breath in loneliness and despair; and are carried to a nameless grave, with none to care for, or weep over them; how many in their last suffering hours ask vainly for some kind and loving friend to receive the farewell words, to wipe the death damp from the brow, and pay the final tribute of respect to the cold remains from which the spirit has departed. There was one thus unfortunate, thus deserted, who lately left this suffering world, and some circumstances were told me, connected with his life and death, which seemed peculiarly affecting. It is a brief memorial of a stranger, and alas! it is no 'fancy sketch.'

Thirty two years of joy and sorrow had been numbered by him of whom I now write. Of his early life little is known, for he had been in the city but a short time, and his acquaintances were few; but he was a man of unblemished character and upright conduct, with pleasing manners and a sensitive and kindly heart. His profession was one which too often yields only a precarious support, and which is generally found united with warm affections and quick sensibilities. Alas! for the poor artist! who dwells among ideal shapes of beauty, while misery and want are entering his doors; whose mind is filled with glorious visions, while he lacks the necessities to sustain his mortal frame; who goes on, dreaming bright dreams, toiling for excellence and sighing for fame, till disease palsies the hand, and suffering dims the vision, and the restless spirit wears out its tenement of clay. He seemed truly to be alone in the world, for he had no near tie of relationship either in this place or elsewhere; neither father or mother, brother or sister, wife or child. How sad to be thus deprived in early life of all our dearest friends; to be left to struggle and suffer in solitude; to know that there is not one heart near which beats in unison with our own; to see no loving eye light up with joy at our coming, and hear no gentle voice asking tenderly of our welfare!

The unfortunate man could not find employment sufficient to keep him above the reach of want; he was taken ill at his boarding house, and scant attentions were bestowed on one so destitute; for food was brought him as if he had been a prisoner, and left without one kind inquiry, one question of his wants, or one word of sympathy. He partially recovered, and a kind hearted man, who had become interested in his welfare, met him soon after on the deck of a steamboat, leaving the city in search of employment. It was a cold day, and he was thinly clad in a summer suit, while others were wrapped in their overcoats and cloaks. He had left his clothes where he had been boarding, for he would not dress himself handsomely while indebted to any one, and it was in consequence of such exposure, while yet weak from recent illness, that he suffered much, and was hurried to the grave. The kind man, mentioned before, who seemed to be the only one that cared for the lonely artist, lost sight of him for awhile, till one day a messenger came, saying he was very ill and requested to see him. A pressure of business prevented his answering the call directly, and when at last he found time to seek the sick man, he learned with sorrow that he had that very day been removed to the Alms House, which was a long way out of the city, and again he was for awhile prevented from going to inquire of his welfare; but as soon as possible he went out to visit him. He inquired for him by name; at first they seemed to know of no such person; but finally they took him to the 'dead house,' and there, on a rude bench, was a coffin of rough boards marked 'no friends;' he opened it and recognized the ghastly features of the one sought. O, how he then sorrowed to think he had come too late; to think how one kind word, one pitying look, from him would have soothed the sufferer in his hours of agony, and yet he was not there. He had breathed his last breath away from all who knew him, among the cold-hearted and indifferent, the careless and unkind. The gifted artist, the man of warm sensibilities, and high aspirations, who had suffered much, and seen 'friend after friend depart,' was carried away with the destroyer's seal already stamped upon his brow, to die within the cheerless walls of an Alms House, among the outcasts of society, with none to smooth his pillow or compose his features for the grave. How the heart shudders to think of the untold, bitter agony, which must have been his portion in those last fearful days; for one wild and horrid fancy which had taken possession of his mind, and which he mentioned to a stranger, was, that the physicians were giving him medicine to hasten his death that they might the sooner obtain his body for dissection. Such was the end he anticipated; he thought no prayer would hallow his rest, that no mourner would weep over his grave. O, God! can such things be in a christian land? Must body and soul thus suffer, and the world look coldly on? Shall the upright honorable man of gentle calling, because he is penniless, be thus cast out? Is there no remedy? Will none among us rise up and say that it ought not so to be? O, Charity, Pity, Love! ye angel sisters! will ye not come among us and take the hardness from our hearts?

'No friends.' Is there two other words in the whole scope of language of such melancholy import? Can anything convey a more mournful idea to the sensitive heart? I heard the story of the stranger's fate; I read those words upon his rude coffin, and my mind was impressed with a sense of the sufferings of humanity, and life's stern realities, such as I had never felt before.

He who had come too late to soothe the last hours of the dying man, was yet in season to save his body from the dissecting knife, and give it a decent burial. He told the circumstances to a friend of his own, who generously gave a spot of ground in one of the city's pleasant cemeteries to make a grave for the departed; he then came for his pastor to attend the funeral. I was one among the few who went as mourners for the stranger, and I trust my heart was made better by what I saw and felt that day. Some of us had never known him while living, but we wished to pay a tribute of respect to the dead. No plumes were on the hearse which bore him in his plain but decent coffin; no long list of relatives and friends swelled the procession; but kind hearts followed him to his rest; with a feeling address and fervent prayer he was consigned to earth, and all wept who stood around the grave. O, if he could but have known that he was not wholly abandoned and forgotten; that his fate would awaken so much kindly sympathy, and that so many pitying tears would be shed when the dust received him, how would his awful fancies have been banished, and his last hours made comparatively peaceful and happy. But this comfort was denied him; Heaven so ordered it; we may not question why. Such is the story, such was the fate, of an unfortunate, 'a forlorn and shipwrecked brother;' and again I say it is no 'fancy sketch;' for stern, and sad, and true, were all the circumstances here related concerning the death and burial of the stranger.

NEW YEAR THOUGHTS.

BY GEORGE D. PRENTICE.

GONE! gone for ever—Like a rushing wave,
Another year has burst upon the shore
Of earthly being—and its last low tones,
Wandering in broken accents on the air,
Are dying to an echo.

The gay Spring

With its young charms has gone—gone with its leaves—
Its atmosphere of roses—its white clouds
Slumbering like seraphs in the air—its birds
Telling their loves in music—and its streams
Leaping and shouting from the up-piled rocks,
To make earth echo with the joy of waves.
And Summer, with its dews and showers, has gone;
Its rainbows glowing on the distant cloud,
Like spirits of the storm—its peaceful lakes
Smiling in their sweet sleep, as if their dreams
Were of the opening flowers, and budding trees,
And overhanging sky—and its bright mists
Resting upon the mountain-tops, as crowns
Upon the heads of giants. Autumn, too,
Has gone with all its deeper glories—gone
With its green hills, like altars of the world
Lifting their rich fruit-offerings to their God—

Its cold winds straying mid the forest aisles
To wake their thousand wind-harps—its serene
And holy sunsets hanging o'er the West,
Like banners from the battlements of heaven—
And its still evenings, when the moonlight sea
Was ever throbbing, like the living heart
Of the great Universe. Ay—these are now
But sounds and visions of the Past—their deep,
Wild beauty has departed from the earth,
And they are gathered to the embrace of Death,
Their solemn herald to Eternity.

Nor have they gone alone. High human hearts
Of Passion have gone with them. The fresh dust
Is chill on many a breast that burned erewhile
With fires that seemed immortal. Joys, that leaped
Like angels from the heart, and wandered free,
In Life's young morn, to look upon the flowers,
The poetry of Nature, and to list
The woven sounds of breeze, and bird, and stream
Upon the night-air, have been stricken down
In silence to the dust. Exultant Hope,
That roved for ever on the buoyant winds,
Like the bright, starry bird of Paradise,
And chanted to the ever listening heart
In the wild music of a thousand tongues,
Or soared into the opening sky, until Night's burning gems seemed jewelled on her brow,
Has shut her drooping wing, and made her home
Within the voiceless sepulchre. And Love,
That knelt at Passion's holiest shrine, and gazed
On his heart's idol as on some sweet star,
Whose purity and distance make it dear;
And dreamed of ecstasies until his soul
Seemed but a lyre, that wakened in the glance
Of the beloved one—he too has gone
To his eternal resting-place. And where
Is stern Ambition—he who madly grasped
At Glory's fleeting phantom—he who sought
His fame upon the battle-field, and longed
To make his throne a pyramid of bones
Amid a sea of blood? He too has gone!
His stormy voice is mute—his mighty arm
Is nerveless on its clod—his very name
Is but a meteor of the night of years
Whose gleams flashed out a moment o'er the earth,
And faded into nothingness. The dream
Of high devotion—Beauty's bright array—
And Life's deep idol memories—all have passed
Like the cloud-shadows on a star-light stream,
Or strain of softest music when the winds
Are slumbering on the billow.

Yet why muse
Upon the past with sorrow? Though the year
Has gone to blend with the mysterious tide
Of old Eternity, and borne along
Upon its heaving breast a thousand wrecks
Of glory and of beauty—yet, why mourn
That such is destiny? Another year
Succeedest to the past—in their bright round
The Seasons come and go—the same blue arch
That hath hung o'er us will hang o'er us yet—
The same pure stars that we have loved to watch,
Will blossom still at Twilight's gentle hour,

Like lilies on the tomb of Day—and still
Man will remain, to dream as he hath dreamed,
And mark the earth with passion. Love will spring
From the lone tomb of old affections—Hope,
And Joy, and great Ambition will rise up
As they have risen—and their deeds will be Brighter than those engraven on the scroll
Of parted centuries. Even now the sea
Of coming years, beneath whose mighty waves
Life's great events are heaving into birth,
Is tossing to and fro, as if the winds
Of heaven were prisoned in its soundless depths,
And struggling to be free.

Weep not that Time
Is passing on—it will ere long reveal
A brighter era to the nations. Hark!
Along the vales and mountains of the earth
There is a deep, portentous murmuring,
Like the swift rush of subterranean streams,
Or like the mingled sounds of earth and air
When the fierce tempest, with sonorous wing,
Heaves his deep folds upon the rushing winds,
And hurries onward with his night of clouds
Against the eternal mountains. 'Tis the voice
Of infant FREEDOM—and her stirring call
Is heard and answered in a thousand tones
From every hill-top of her western home:
And lo! it breaks across old Ocean's flood—
And 'FREEDOM!' 'FREEDOM!' is the answering shout,
Of nations starting from the spell of years.
The day-spring—see—'tis brightening in the heavens!
The watchmen of the night have caught the sign;
From tower to tower the signal fires flash free;
And the deep watchword, like the rush of seas
That heralds the volcano's bursting flame,
Is sounding o'er the earth. Bright years of hope
And life are on the wing! Yon glorious bow
Of Freedom, bended by the hand of God,
Is spanning Time's dark surges. Its high arch,
A type of Love and Mercy on the cloud,
Tells that the many storms of human life
Will pass in silence; and the sinking waves,
Gathering the forms of Glory and of Peace,
Reflect the undimmed brightness of the heavens.

PRAYERS AND EXHORTATIONS FOR THE NEW YEAR.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

A HAPPY New Year, beloved readers, one and all!
And how shall it be happy? What charm shall I call around you to ward off the accidents and privations of time? You who are poor and needy, whose earliest thought at morn is an anxious one for the daily bread that must be won by the sweat of the brow, shall I petition the God of Grace to send you luxury and wealth?

Behold the petition granted! No longer is there need for the instrument of toil; and the garments of labor that are marked by many a sturdy stroke, and torn and worn by conflicts with the machinery of human industry, are banished from the home of luxury as unpleasant memorials of dark and troublous days. The sons are recalled from their manual crafts to play the gentleman in foppish attire; and the daughters retire from the wash-tub and the weaving-loom to drum upon the piano, and 'work little dogs upon crickets.' Rich carpets overspread your floors. Costly furniture surrounds and fills your apartments. Luxurious viands minister to your appetites. Is my wish granted, and are you happy?

No, you are not. I see it in the anxious and perplexed brow; in the fevered and sallow cheek; in the proud and disdainful eye. You are not happy, for wealth has brought with it a train of curses, unknown to those who are poor. Strife for public precedence, anxiety to maintain splendid appearances, continual thirst for admiration and display, and all the hollow pageantries of artificial life, have tortured your minds, and thronged your hearts with a host of evil spirits; while luxury and indolence have enervated your frames, and filled them with incurable disease. You are not happy.

Young student! Thou who art bending with feverish enthusiasm over the lettered page; whose days and nights are wedded to wearisome thought, and whose dreams are troubled with visions of future fame, what shall I wish for thee but the fulfilment of those dreams, that the measure of thy happiness may be complete?

Behold the petition granted. Thou art master of all eloquence. Thy name is shouted by thousands with acclamations of praise and admiration. There is none to rival thee. Old age and youth, and blushing beauty alike bestow their applause; and who shall say thou art not happy? And yet, thou art not! Something more thou cravest, which is not thine. Love—pure, unselfish, deeply devoted love; and health, and rest, and spiritual peace, which have been sacrificed on the altar of fame. Thou art not happy, and my prayer has been in vain.

Gentle maiden! I know by the deep thought in thy shrinking eye, by thy quiet and subdued manner, and low, half-plaintive voice, that there is a fountain in thy soul that is not filled. Every night thy pillow is wet with tears, and thou fallest to sleep with a gushing and sorrowful prayer upon thy lips that the God of mercies will bless thy devoted love.

Thy prayer and mine is answered, and thou art loved, even with the completeness that thy heart desired. Verily, thou must be happy. And yet, why comes that settled paleness to thy cheek, and why so often droop thy thoughtful eyes with tears? Thou seest too truly that thine idol is of perishable clay; that decay is stealing upon him with slow and stealthy, but irretraceable steps, and that soon—O sooner far than thou canst willingly resign, he will be called forever from thine earthly gaze. Good God! and so, even thou art not happy!

* * * * *

A happy New Year, beloved readers, one and all!

And how shall it be happy? By effort—serene, earnest, and hopeful. We must labor for many things. First, to meet, unblenching, the inevitable destiny that awaits us, be it weal or wo, joy or sorrow, life or death. Second, to be good and useful to our fellow beings by every sacrifice that duty demands, and every work that ability permits.

We have much to do for religion. Let us be ready and earnest in the work. Stop not to gaze around and ask, is the harvest ripening to reward our toil? but work on with resolute hearts, trusting to God to tassel forth the grain, and streak the cheek of the fruit with crimson. We can speak, we can write, we can act. Life is a scene of works. Shall they speak for Christianity, or shall they blacken and defame its sacred name? Oh! be thoughtful of the interests of religion. It is the first, greatest, crowning duty of our lives. See to it that we falter not by the wayside, but press nobly on with the strength of God in our hearts, and ere we are aware, the garner will be filled to overflowing with all spiritual riches and delights.

Let us strive earnestly to be charitable. Not with that charity, alone, which feeds the hungry and clothes the naked; but with that long-suffering, never-failing, unwearying love, that is ready, ever, to pardon iniquity and assist the fallen; to excuse weakness and palliate faults; to be gentle, merciful, patient, and easily entreated; without partiality or hypocrisy; preferring another ever to itself, and finding sufficient reward in its own exercise. Oh God grant that we fail not in this great and holy work of self-reformation. God grant that we become more and more partakers of his holiness and love.

Let us be trustful, hopeful, confiding. If the hour of trial come; if want, disease and death beset our way; if we are forsaken of friends; if our fondest hopes are blighted; if every beautiful hue fade out from the sky of our future,—Oh let us still cling to that faith that will never forsake, or fail, or deceive us. Let us still trust in that celestial mercy that endureth forever.

How often we have murmured in the past, and been prone to forget the kindness and long-suffering of our heavenly Father. Shall it be so in the future? Are we to make no progress in spiritual strength and religious faith? Are we to pass on to the grave the same repining, unthankful creatures we have been through many by-gone years? Oh Father, help us, for we are, indeed, very weak and very weary. We have no hope nor strength save in Thee. Make us, then, more wholly, more sensibly thine, and we shall, indeed, be happy.

Time may come with its changes. It may steal away our youth and physical strength; impair our intellects; dull our senses; rob us of friends, wealth, human affection; but Thou, O God, art Eternal. No time can change Thee. We never look to Thee in vain for either strength, or comfort, or love. Thy promises never fail. Thy goodness never wearies. Thy love never decays.

Beloved readers, a happy New Year to you all! Be active in the cause of religion; be charitable to your fellow-mortals; be full of hope and trust in the God of your salvation; and when the next New Year comes round, we will ask our hearts the simple question—Has the Old Year been a happy one? And God grant that from their secret depths shall go forth a joyful answer to bear witness to his eternal Truth.

THOUGHTS,

ON THE REMEMBRANCE OF MRS. BETSEY HADLEY.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

It is the solemn midnight; and the stars
Gaze quietly upon the darken'd scene,
And glance along the undulating wave
With softly tremulous light. The fitful glow
Of their reflected beams, seems like the soft
And hallow'd light, by memory's veiled lamp,
Shed o'er the mystic tablet of the soul.
'Tis sweet to cast a retrospective glance
O'er the long vanished years, and fondly muse
Upon the treasured images that love
Has shrined within the garner of the heart.
O memory, sacred charmer! how our souls
Should bless the Giver of each perfect gift,
That thou art sent to cheer our pilgrimage
Along life's varied desert. When the bruised
And stricken heart, in every fibre bleeds,
And the lorn spirit wearily bows down,
Nor longer strives with sorrow's tyranny;
When the aspiring soul has sadly knelt,
And wept through the dark hours of agony,
'Till hope's receding star was lost in gloom;
How soothing then to bid thy magic wand
Call from the mystic chambers of the past
Visions of worth, and spirit-loveliness.
How would the soul grow weary on its way
Through this vain world, where sin and vice abound
To mar God's beauteous heritage; could we
Not rest our mental vision, and refresh
Our saddened spirits as we contemplate
In memory's faithful mirror, noble hearts
Where shone the glory of that spirit
Which God implanted in the human soul.
Alas! how few in this world's changing scenes
Can stand the trying ordeals; that test
The spirit's excellence. How very few
Maintain their native dignity of mind
Unsullied by the false world's flattering tones
That lure but to deceive. And when our hearts
Have almost worshipp'd at some earthly shrine
Where the undying seal of love and truth

Had stamped its holy impress; then how chill
And drearily the solemn sounding knell,
Has startled the sad spirit from its dreams
Of earthly happiness. But oh how sweet,
When we have seen the snowy folds enrobe
The form so much revered,—when the loved brow
Has turn'd to marble 'neath the blighting seal
Of death's chill signet, and the half clos'd eye
Mirrors no more the indwelling spirit; then
How sweet to know the lov'd one passed away,
Resting upon the arm of Him who gave
His life blood as the seal of changeless love.
How sweet to feel, that in those flowery meads
Those bright parterres, and ever smiling groves,
That wooed the parting spirit,* as it hung
Reluctant o'er the dark and shadowy waves,
Dreading the gloomy passage; we shall meet
In robes of stainless splendor, the pure soul
Whose lustre seemed an emanation bright
From him whose nature, and whose name is Love.

* During her last illness she often spoke of seeing the most beautiful meadows, the most splendid groves of trees, clothed in such richness of hue, that she could not express her admiration. Her last whispered words were 'those beautiful meadows, those tall and beautiful trees, how rich and green.' She died in the enjoyment of that faith, which alone can give full joy and consolation, proving that a virtuous life and the full belief in the gospel can divest death of its terrors, and gild with immortal splendor the gloomy pathway of the tomb.

WORDS, OR A GLIMPSE AT PUBLIC LIFE.

BY MRS. N. THORNING MUNROE.

'O MANY a shaft at random sent,
Finds mark the archer little meant;
And many a word at random spoken,
May soothe or wound a heart that's broken.'

WORDS, what are they? Things of vast import, and yet how lightly are they spoken. We send them out into the world regardless of their errand, or careless of the effect they may produce upon our fellow men. Words are the messengers of Thought. Careless, light-winged messengers are they, they tell their errand and are gone. We send them forth, and they cannot be recalled; and like the arrow sent heedlessly from the bow, they oft-times find a mark we little meant. How needful then, that they should be fitly chosen, for vast is their power. The kind words of sympathy, may fall upon the bereaved and stricken heart like dew from Heaven. O give then unto the mourning, kind words of affection; do not wound by light and unthinking remarks, the heart that is already bleeding from affliction. Stir not up with bitter words of anger, the spirit that is worn out and tired in the stern conflict of life. Speak gently to him whose quick temper can brook no restraint, but O, above all, speak no careless and unthinking words, no words against the character, the fame, the moral reputation of your fellow man. For O, if there is one habit or rather vice, which does more hurt in the world than any other, it is the vice of slander. This pouring out upon our brother, from whatever cause, the light, unthinking jest, the contemptuous sneer, the railing words, which of themselves may mean nothing, but yet, spoken in such a manner, in such a place, and to such a person, may mean so much, and may fall upon that brother's path like a deadly blight, and send misery to his heart, and discord and contention to his hearth-stone.

And if there is one vice in our land, if there is one blot upon the fair escutcheon of our country's honor, it is this vice of slander, this treating as though it were a thing of no worth, the honor, the reputation dearer than life of our public men. This raking up by one party, all the evil it knows, and much that it only conjectures of the other, and spreading it abroad, as though it were a meritorious action. And adding to known facts, such high and distorted coloring, as wholly to pervert the truth, and so, by destroying the character of our brother man, and trampling his honor to the dust, rise upon the ruins we have made, making them our own stepping stones to public favor. And for what? That we too in our turn, may have our own character as basely handled, our own motives as misjudged, and actions as widely perverted, as the poor fallen fellow being upon whose ruined honor we have risen. And all this results from the evil influence of too much party spirit, the crowding and fretting for public office, the upholding those whom we know have no principle nor honor, merely for the sake of party. Is it not a shameful blot upon American honor? But I may not pause to moralize, I have a short, a simple tale to tell, merely to illustrate my meaning; a tale of the present day, of real life, and wholly unvarnished.

There was not in the whole town of G——, a man of stricter integrity and honesty than Mr. Vinton. No stain rested upon his character, not even the slightest whisper of calumny or envy, had ever been breathed upon his name. All owned him strictly honest, of pure moral worth, steady habits, and an unblemished life. He had grown rich by untiring industry, not by fortunate speculations. Much of his worth and prosperity in life sprung from a silent, a hidden and unnoticed source—even from the encouraging, the gentle spirit, the ready hand and untiring affection, of an exemplary wife. She had made his home pleasant, so that he had had no inducement to seek for happiness elsewhere. She had toiled with her own hands to assist in supporting a rising family, and truly had the labors of husband and wife been blessed.

Mr. Vinton was now about forty years of age, his wife some years younger. There was a romantic tale connected with their marriage, but it concerns not my present narrative to relate it. But any one to look upon the broad open brow of Mrs. Vinton, into the clear, sparkling eyes, would say that in his younger days her husband must have been as proud of her beauty as he was now of her virtues. Their wedded life had passed in harmony, mutual forbearance had been exercised and Christian charity extended by each to the other. Yet life had not been to them all flowers. In the village grave-yard, side by side were two green graves, and a white stone marked the head of each, and there lay buried two buds, which had once graced, for a short, sweet period, the home and the hearts of the now bereaved parents. And so among other virtues, they had learned that of Christian resignation. But still there had been spared to them three children of rare beauty, who grew up around their hearth-stone; thankful for those who had been spared, the mother looked to heaven, and felt that it was well her infants were there, else the ties of earth might be too strong.

But I linger too long on this part of my story. We have said that all spoke and thought well of Mr. Vinton. He had been chosen to fill various offices in town, and they had been filled to the satisfaction of all parties, and none dared to say that he looked more to private than public interests. A year came when party spirit ran high, and nothing but elections and candidates were thought or spoken of. Each party called its members to the rescue, glorious victories were to be won, and the country saved from ruin. Neither party was spared by the other, but open slander and calumny stalked abroad; envy with his dark, frowning brow was busy, and private malice was often gratified under the mask of public spirit. There might have been a few who condemned those violent and unjust proceedings, and who would have done things 'decently and in order.' But those spirits were few, and their voices could not be heard amid party rage and tumult. And among these few stood Mr. Vinton. He had the fortune, we cannot say whether good or ill, of being held up as a candidate for the highest office, the very bone of contention between the parties. We may not pause to inform the reader of the details of the election. Suffice it to say that Mr. Vinton was elected and the dispute decided. But party feeling was not dead. Disappointed and embittered spirits were abroad, who paused at nothing to gratify their malice. The worst passions of men had been roused. There were some who had looked for public honors and emolument, who were now sadly disappointed. I speak not of either party. An unprincipled man will vent his indignation and malice, as quickly upon friend as foe; and there might have been some of Mr. Vinton's own party who were among these office seekers, and who under the mask of well meant friendship, with soft words and meaning looks, were endeavoring to sow the seeds of malice and ill will in the hearts of their townsmen.

The character and reputation of Mr. Vinton which had ever been fair and pure, his honor which had never been doubted, were now handled, and in not the gentlest manner, by his townsmen. His motives were misjudged, his very words perverted, and every action of his life made a theme upon which every idle speculator might comment, and turn and twist to suit his own base purposes. And the man who had ever served aright his fellow men and his God,—upon whose past life rested no stain,—who had passed the fiery season of youth, and escaped its snares and pitfalls, who stood in the proud strength of his manhood, with pure intentions in his heart, and honesty and integrity written upon his broad, open brow, that brow which care and time were but just beginning to furrow,—whose step had never swerved in the path of duty, before whose strict worth and purity the unprincipled and base would cower as before a master spirit,—that that man should be held up now, in such a light, that the tongue of slander should be let loose to blast his spotless name, was a shame and a disgrace, a foul stain upon the name of party and freedom. It is dangerous to stand in high places, for the spirit of envy rises up and follows close on to public fame and honor; and ere the honeyed words of praise and flattery have died upon the ear, the voice of slander is heard, and its envenomed sting is felt in the heart which was but just beating with triumph. It is dangerous to be the idol of a people, for of all worshippers they are the most faithless. They raise up an image of their own, they bow down and worship it with their tongues, they look up to it as a god, but it is faithless worship, and ere the object of their idolatry has been well placed upon its lofty pedestal, rough hands have been raised to demolish it, and hoarse voices have shouted for its downfall and cried, 'We will not have this man to rule over us.' The voice of the people! The west wind is not softer nor more welcome to the heart, than its approbation,—nor is the thunder of Heaven's artillery louder, nor its lightnings more hot and blasting, than its slander and hatred and malice! Trust it not! It will turn like the viper, and sting the very bosom that has nourished its interests, and devoted a long life to its service. Trust it not. History will point you to the scaffold and the guillotine, where patriotism has been repaid by death. And though in our land no blood may flow, though the scaffold can have no terrors for the upright, honest man, yet let him beware! there is a snare around him, his path is beset by dangerous enemies, who aim at his dearest interest, even at his honor—dearer than life, his stainless name which he would guard as his heart's blood.

But to proceed with my narrative. One short winter of public service, a winter of toil and servitude, and the man of upright heart and honesty, had seen more of care and misery than ever before in his life of manual labor. It had preyed upon his constitution, it had marked deep furrows upon his open brow, drawn lines around his handsome mouth, and saddened and depressed his heart. He had been blamed as who that has served his country has not? and he was not a man to bear blame calmly. He had been misrepresented, accused of base motives, and his soul sickened and he turned from his country's halls with a sad heart. A cloud was on his brow, and the smile which had ever hovered around his mouth and illumined every feature, came now but seldom or with a pale and sickly light. Even his very home seemed less joyful than usual. His children seemed to look coldly on him, and the wife of his bosom to greet him less cordially. It was but because his own soul was ill at ease, that disappointment and discontent had invaded his heretofore peaceful heart. He was harassed and perplexed, and knew not on which side to turn. He mistrusted those who professed friendship, for some whom he had considered fast friends, had proved to be his worst enemies.

Mr. Vinton was a man of many virtues. He had learned many lessons,—honesty, integrity and moral purity, and by suffering he had been taught Christian resignation and patience. But he had yet one more lesson to learn, a lesson which would comprise every other virtue, and which experience alone could teach him—a lesson which needed much practice, and hard for him to learn. It was to stand forth in the strength of a good and honest man, to go right on in the path of duty unshrinkingly, to lend no ear to base slander, to let its light stories pass by him as the idle wind. There is to the man in public life, one straight and narrow path, to be trodden. It must be trodden firmly; there must be no indecision, no shrinking back from the future; the eye must see clearly and quickly, the mind decide promptly, but not rashly; yet he must walk carefully, as if surrounded by hidden snares, but seemingly fearless, as if fearing and thinking no danger. And the lesson is a lesson of firmness and forbearance, firmness in the right, and forbearance towards those in the wrong.

Mr. Vinton left the walks of public life, as many a good man had done before him, in disgust with the world's heartlessness. And the man who might have been an honor to his country, who would have served her to the best of his abilities, retired to the quiet of domestic life, when his term of office expired, with a determination never again to be held up as a mark for every idle speculator's jibes and jeers. It is hard for a good man to tread the walks of public life. Hard because he must heed more or less the vile slanders which ever are afloat. But for a bad man it may be comparatively easy, for the breath of his enemies will pass him unheeded, he will give back slander for slander, rebuke for rebuke, in high words he will not be outdone, falsehood will be met with falsehood, and vice does very often seem to be best foiled with its own weapons. And so he will pass on, and men will call him a smart man, an able speaker, and his party will hold him up higher than ever. But still we trust there are good men in public life, men who have learned to walk that narrow path, and practice that difficult lesson; and whose worth will sometime be appreciated, and whose names will sometimes rise in all their freshness from the foul breath of slander, falsehood and envy, and before whom the fabricators of those falsehoods will flee as the beasts of prey flee from the glorious sunlight. But it will not be while party spirit runs so high, it will not be while men will listen and believe every idle tale, because they can turn it to their own advantage. But when the mist of excitement has blown over, when men can see something else in freedom, than the rule and dominion of their own party, then and not till then the time will come.

It is merely a sketch, gentle reader, that I have given, a sketch of one whom all would call a good man. I did not intend to awaken your sympathies, or call forth tender feelings; had I designed this, I should have clothed my narrative in glowing colors, and called imagination to my aid. I merely state the plain truth, as any one may see who looks abroad upon our land; how the vain and foolish words of the idle and the ignorant, have power to weaken the influence of the good; and how men will bow and cringe to the voice of the multitude, though it be but the voice of slander, envy and falsehood.

VIRTUOUS AND VICIOUS PROSPERITY.

'THE Church of England Magazine' contains an excellently written essay entitled, 'The mysteriousness of some of the Divine Dispensations.' We give it, save a few subtractions, and ask for it an attentive perusal, knowing that the reader will have an abundant reward.

'THAT God is righteous in all his ways, and, however frequently mysterious, just in all his dealings towards the children of men, is a truth which is inseparable from our notions of a perfect being. The declaration of the prophet Jeremiah will readily be allowed—"Righteous art thou, O God." The indignant reply of the apostle will readily be adopted—"Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid." And yet, perhaps, there are few persons to whose mind the question has not suggested itself, wherefore doth the way of the wicked prosper—wherefore are all they happy that deal very treacherously? We find Job, for instance, asking, "Wherefore do the wicked live, become old, yea, are mighty in power? Their seed is established in their sight with them, and their offspring before their eyes. Their houses are safe from fear, neither is the rod of God upon them." While Asaph uttered the language of complaint—"I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked. For there are no bands in their death; but their strength is firm. They are not in trouble as other men; neither are they plagued like other men. Therefore pride compasseth them about as a chain; violence covereth them as a garment. Behold, these are the ungodly, who prosper in the world; they increase in riches. Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency." And it was to correct this spirit of complaint—a spirit by no means unusual—that David gives the salutary advice—"Fret not thyself because of evil doers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity."

'This apparent injustice in the dispensations of a gracious Providence, however satisfactorily it may be reconciled to the mind of the true believer, has yet been employed by the enemies of the truth as an argument that the Supreme Being does not concern himself with the affairs of his creatures; that what are termed the leadings and purposes of his providence, are merely the results of chance; that it is absurd to suppose that God would act so unjustly as to permit his faithful servants to encounter a variety of hardships, not unfrequently to pass their lives in sickness and destitution, while those who have not his fear before their eyes—who despise and set at nought all his requirements, are in the enjoyment of the comforts and frequently of the luxuries of life.

'The design of this essay will be to "justify the ways of God to man;" to prove the injustice so much insisted on by the unbeliever, is only apparent, and that, in fact, God's dispensations are all regulated by the tenderest feelings for the welfare of his creatures. Nor is the establishment of these points a matter of little importance. There is in man an inclination to murmur against God; to call in question his goodness, his wisdom, his justice. Of this inclination the enemies of the truth have not been slow to take advantage. How needful is it, then, for each one of us to become fully convinced that whatever God does must be just as well as merciful; that, if there be any apparent inconsistency in the plans of his providence, it must be only apparent, and that in reality, all must be ordered by him for the best.

And first, it may be well to consider whether the way of the wicked may be said to prosper, or that they can be happy "who deal very treacherously." Prosperity and adversity are terms which convey very different notions to different minds. To the worldling they convey the notion of an abundance of earthly possessions, and the sensual gratification which this abundance places within man's reach. But, by the true believer, he only is regarded as prospering whose soul is advancing in grace and in knowledge, and in a participation of heaven's glories; and he only is esteemed happy who, being mercifully reconciled to his heavenly Father, is enjoying the privileges, and participating in the blessings, and animated by the hopes conferred upon the adopted children of God. The wicked may prosper in a worldly point of view. Their riches may increase; their flocks and herds may multiply; their garners may be full and plenteous with all manner of store; and upon the change or in the market-place they may be regarded as persons of consequence and of property, and as exceedingly fortunate in all their speculations, and lucky in all their enterprises; and yet, meanwhile, they may be utterly destitute, and poor and wretched in God's sight; and they may be total strangers to that peace of conscience and serenity of mind without which happiness can never be found. It is of importance to feel assured, then, that outward prosperity, as it may exist with internal destitution, so it is not to be regarded as a mark of the divine favor, nor as an evidence of real happiness and substantial joy: and this conviction will enable us to perceive how untenable is their position, who, viewing man's estate simply with regard to his external circumstances, scruple not to affirm that there is injustice in the dispensation of the Almighty.

'But again it may be remarked, that this very prosperity which calls forth the envy and excites the astonishment of so many, who, discontented with their own condition, scruple not to sit in judgment on the Almighty's procedure in the government of the universe, may prove, and must prove, a curse rather than a blessing to its possessor, if not employed, as God would have it, in the furtherance of his glory and the promotion of the good of others. How frequently is the man of wealth an object of envy, even at the very moment he deserves to be an object of most intense commiseration; and such he ought to be when he squanders on the indulgence of his own selfishness (in pampering his appetites and gratifying his pride) those resources which are placed in his power for far higher, and nobler, and more important ends. It has been well said, indeed, that "the prosperity of fools shall destroy them;" and in how many instances has this been the case? How melancholy is it to observe the tendency of worldly riches to alienate the soul from God, to impede their possessor in the road that leads to Zion. Perhaps there is not an object on earth more painfully distressing, than of a man for whom God has done much, but who will do nothing for God; who has received many blessings from the hand of his Creator, and yet will not dispense with his own hand for the supply of his fellow-creatures' necessities. Surely such a one ought not to excite our envy: surely his wretched condition need not be the object of our desire. Over him we ought rather to weep, as we doubt not the angels of God are weeping, while we earnestly pray that he may yet feel the responsibility that there is laid upon him, to improve the talents committed to his care.

'The class of objectors alluded to, argue solely on the supposition that man's life is to consist in the abundance of the things which he possesseth; that, where there is an abundance of earthly goods, there must be happiness; that where there is a want of these, there must be misery. Here lies the fallacy of their arguments. It were vain to assert that a certain competence is not necessary for the enjoyment of life, that health and strength are not blessings, that poverty and disease are not truly hardships; still must it be acknowledged that, even under external circumstances apparently the most adverse, true happiness is to be found; and this will be the case when the heart is surrendered to God; when a living faith in the Savior enables us to overcome not merely the follies, but the miseries of the world; and when the hopes are substantially fixed on that better and never-ending inheritance which is laid up in store for all. But who is it that can appreciate this happiness? Certainly not those who seek to arraign the divine wisdom and justice. Who is it that can tell of the unspeakable comfort which arises from a sense of the pardoning mercy of God in Christ Jesus? And who would not exchange this comfort for all the treasures of earth? Certainly not those who are envious at the supposed prosperity of the wicked. It is the true believer who is qualified to judge of the attributes of God. It is he alone who can form a correct estimate of the character of Jehovah; who can bear his testimony to the infinite mercy of that Jehovah towards himself; and who, enlightened by the Eternal Spirit, the fountain of light, can discover the admirable adaptation of all Jehovah's dealings for the promotion of the everlasting welfare of his creatures.

'Enough has been said, I trust, to show how vain and futile is the argument by which the unbeliever, on the score of injustice in the divine dispensations, endeavors not only to throw discredit on that sacred volume which proclaims the tender care which God exercises over his creatures, but even to root out all notion of a particular and superintending Providence. It is quite a mistake, then, to suppose that it is unnecessary to enter upon such topics as that under consideration, when it is more than probable that to the minds of some, the notion of injustice on the part of Jehovah may have presented itself, and they may have been thence led to entertain unworthy views of his character, which lie at the root of all practical atheism. They may be led to adopt the paralyzing notions of those who exclaimed—"It is in vain to serve God; and what profit is it that we have kept his ordinances?"

'Is any reader inclined to cavil at the justice of the Divine Being, from this apparent inconsistency in the mode in which he bestows his temporal benefits? Let him seriously consider what has been now advanced: let him be assured that not only has the Lord Jehovah a right to do whatever pleaseth him in heaven and earth, in the sea and all deep places, but that he ever exercises that right with consummate wisdom, infinite justice, boundless mercy. For listen to his own gracious declaration: "Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom; neither let the mighty man glory in his might; let not the rich man glory in his riches: but let him that glorieth, glory in this—that he understandeth and knoweth me, that I am the Lord which exercise loving-kindness, judgment, and righteousness in the earth; for in these things I delight, saith the Lord.” Let him endeavor to realize the humiliating fact that it is his own blindness and ignorance which cause him to err when considering the divine procedure, and that the day will unquestionably arrive when every difficulty will be solved—when the Lord God Almighty will not only be admitted to have been great and marvellous in his works, but in his ways just and true.’

THE SEASONS OF THE HEART.

‘My heart has passed through its budding and its prime. It is now in “the sere and yellow leaf.” Yet all of its glory has not yet departed. Many Indian summer days still visit it; and when these are passed away, then will come the immortal spring time!’ Letter.

THE Spring of the heart! ‘Twas in that young hour
When its dearest treasure was some pale flower;
When it gathered its dreams from the dim, wild dell,
And wove them in wreaths by the moss-grown well;
When Life lay spread like a fairy book
In whose spell-fraught pages I dared not look,
Yet fancied each tale was of love and truth,
Like the chronicles kept in my artless youth.

Then the Summer came. ‘Twas when thou wert near;
Thou, whom it ever hath held too dear!
When the birds flocked gaily around Life’s tree,
And each sang sweetly of Love and thee.
Oh that was the Summer—the heart’s sweet prime,
When Hope played music, and Love kept time!
When its waters sparkled, and bright trees shook
Their blossoms down o’er its half-read book.

‘Tis the Autumn now! the perishing time;
When its streams run deep, with a saddened chime;
No flowers are found on its sere, brown knoll,
For the frost hath entered and chilled my soul.
Yet something of solemn magnificence broods
O’er the heart’s wild desert of rocks and woods;
And the rook that haunts it with mournful cries,
Still builds its nest where the sunshine lies.

Will the Winter come, with its clouds of snow,
And bury the soul in still deeper woe?
Shall the raven that feeds upon Death be there—
The black-winged croaker they name Despair?
Oh never! The clime of the heart shall know
No dreary season of clouds and snow;
For its Autumn sadness shall melt away
In the beauty and bloom of an endless May! S. C. E.

No Use. There is no use of meddling with others’ affairs—no use in wishing that a poor person may be better off—but there is some use in looking after self, and use in relieving the needy. PR.

WISDOM BETTER THAN WAR.

BY HENRY BACON.

[We make up our work for general interest, and always design so to do, but for once we insert an article for our own gratification, that the hearing of the ear may be, perhaps, to some, corrected by the seeing of the eye. This discourse was delivered May 15, 1842.]

‘Wisdom is better than weapons of War.’ ECCL. ix. 18,

THE pulpit would be false to its trust were it not to have a solemn and earnest voice for these perilous times; and it would be as false to its trust were that voice to be a partizan one. I call the times perilous, and they are so—look from whatever point of view we may on the political aspect of the community, remembering the lessons of history. Much that is and should be dear to the patriot and the christian is periled; and no man, to whom peace, order, and progress, are dear, can be without anxiety. The pulpit should speak to utter the monitions of religion—to call men to a consideration of their common responsibilities, and to bid them amid political strife to remember and obey christian principle. If it were not so, the christian ministry would not be adapted to man as he is—to all his relations in life—to all times and circumstances—to follow him wherever he goes, and be with him wherever he tarries. And is there not as much need of religion speaking with power in the soul when man is surrounded with political excitement, and loud voices are pouring into his ears the arguments for various positions, as under any other circumstances? I cannot but think so; and if so, the pulpit must speak—it must use the sacredness of the Sabbath and the sanctities of the temple to impress the mind and calm the passions, that rationally and soberly, and with manly patience, all parties may approach a consideration of those higher duties which govern and mould all others. For what is the object of our gathering here? It is not simply to make a public manifestation of our respect for religious institutions, or to offer public homage to Almighty God. We come to correct, improve and strengthen our principles and feelings—to question the character of our six days course—to implore grace to assist us in holding to the convictions of our sober hours amid the heat and controversy of other gatherings—and to deepen in our hearts the truth that wisdom is better than weapons of war. We cannot forget the state of the community—we cannot keep down the questionings of our hearts, and we should—we must confess that we need a Higher than ourselves to guide us. We are not here to overlook the world and think only of heaven; but rather to think of heaven that we may better—more justly and prudently look upon the world, see the position to be taken and maintain it—come weal, come woe.

I have said the pulpit must not have a partizan voice, and it must not. We can choose to our liking, and have to our heart's content, party utterances without entering the sanctuary. Here ye have gathered from all parties, with all the variety and shades of opinions, and for me to use the hour to party purposes, were to outrage the unity of mind that placed me here. No, my brethren, we are to day to recognize but one party—the Christian; and as here we are removed from all disturbing influences, it becomes us, as responsible beings, to consider well the character of our passions, to scrutinize our motives, to temper our zeal, and to clothe ourselves with patience and hope, that we may act as those fully convinced that wisdom is better than weapons of war.

Some may, perhaps, be ready to ask, is there really a necessity to ponder on that truth? I answer, there is—that it may be felt to be a truth. There would be a necessity for discussing this axiom were our domestic disturbances all quieted, for the time has not yet come when men study war no more. The histories of martial achievements and stories of battle fields are still too much delighted in, and the show and pageantry of war have yet too much attraction. The roll of the drum, the floating of banners, the glitter of burnished arms, the gorgeous dress, and the martial array, still combine to exert a powerful magic. Take these away, and the pride of the eye has no food. Let man be met as he is met in social and busy life, and war would not be dreamed of; but dress men up in the usual fantastic uniforms, and a veil is drawn over what revealed a friend or fellow citizen, and the soldier seems to belong to a different race than the man. I never felt this difference so deeply till I beheld the late chief magistrate of Massachusetts on the day of great parade, move on clad in his usual dress of simple black, surrounded by his guards. All looked strange but him—the man was not hid beneath feathers, lace and embroidery, and in his plain costume he looked the governor of a republican people. And as all eyes were attracted by the contrast, and many comments with one spirit were made, I could not but feel that wisdom is better than weapons of war. Wisdom in its own dignity and unadorned majesty, appeals to better feelings and fixes deeper convictions in the soul, than all the array that can be made by weapons of war. Wisdom calls into exercise the reflective faculties, inclines men to labor to compass right ends by right means, and wait patiently for the issues of the operation of truth, while weapons of war—the exhibitions of force or compulsion, drive them to their own armories, to take up corresponding weapons.

Wisdom is better than weapons of war, because wisdom will supersede the necessity of weapons of war. If this be not true, why was the proclamation of christianity one of peace and good will among men? And what is the meaning of those eloquent prophecies that seem to point forward to a golden age of peace when men shall beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning hooks, and they shall study war no more? There is a divine meaning in these prophecies, and that meaning is being clearer and clearer developed. Men are beginning to discern that one conquest over mind, is worth a thousand over the mere outward man; and that it is one thing to put the foot on the neck, and quite another to subjugate the heart. The genius of our philanthropic institutions is decidedly for peace, as it speaks for the worth of man and pleads the cause of human sympathies. And wisdom, breathing in every power that is active for progress, for the advance of true civilization, offers demonstrations of the intimate union which exists between peace and every promise of permanent good.

Wisdom is better than weapons of war, because it has the work of preserving and strengthening a just position when obtained. When men yield to the temptation to use force in domestic political matters, they cannot keep from the excitement that disturbs the power of forecast, and they deal too much with the present, to the neglect of the future. They consider too little the difficulties which will press upon them; and in striving to withhold, or aiming too speedily to grasp, the effects of the strife linger as wounds upon the body politic, preventing its healthy and most powerful action, and transmitting the evil to other generations. There is a beauty and a glory in the calm reliance upon the right—in a patient waiting for results from the clear utterance of opinion, and a firm belief in the accumulation of moral power with the evolving of circumstances, which never was and never can be gained by weapons of war. Why should we seek to fence round the Truth with glistening bayonets? Why offend the genius of Republicanism with the show of royalty? Why put on a look of defiance when we believe we have right principles within that alway impart a majesty more commanding than any frown or aspect of sternness? Wisdom is better than weapons of war; and what is gained by wisdom, can be, in due time with patient energy, brought out with overwhelming power. God is with Wisdom.

Our difficulties are not with a foreign power, and we should hear as spoken to us the exhortation—'Let there be no strife between ye, for ye are brethren.' Forget not this great truth in the tempting hour—in the season of excitement—in the time when a practical trial shall be made of how much we trust to the law of force, and whether we do indeed believe that wisdom is better than weapons of war.

And do we not all need to listen to wisdom's voice as she teaches the true idea of Liberty—the increase of responsibilities with the enlargement of the freedom of government? We think too seldom of this—we talk so much of the sovereignty of the people that we forget that really the law of Justice and Rectitude is sovereign. There is a higher than the people—there is something better than any freedom ever yet wrought out, and still to the future must we look for the true realization of a free government. We hold up the great declaration of our fathers and declare ourselves free and independent; but are we really so? have we the true attributes of the freeman? is freedom with us a feeling, or a solemn trust? When freedom is made the burden of the orator's declamation, it is spoken of as a blessing and a great blessing, and it is so. Its cause is justly described as the cause of human right, virtue, and progress; and high wrought pictures and glowing descriptions are given whereby the shout is made to rise higher and higher that freedom is the greatest good! that we are a free people! But is the solemn moral brought out with the same eloquence and felt with the same power? Would to God that it were! for then a greater degree of soberness and rational prudence would pervade the doings of the political world, and men in power, and men aiming to be in power, would act in view of lofty responsibilities. Then would our halls of national legislation be free from those disgraceful scenes which clearly exhibit the dogmatism and the blustering folly of the independence of self-will. Then would a more manly and courteous tone be assumed in political discussions everywhere, for the freedom of others would be as much respected as the freedom of self. And then no longer would the stranger to our shores have the means of inferring from our journals, that the leaders in all the various political parties are men of worthless characters and utterly devoid of principles of honor and integrity, as they are now set forth by their antagonists.

And what is the solemn moral of freedom? It is that liberty is a trust, to be used as all precious gifts from God are to be used—prudently, not as disuniting us from any allegiance to the right—to duty. It absolutely takes from us many apologies for wrong doing which might have been put forth before our freedom was bestowed; and the wider the range given for action, the greater is the danger, and the greater is the necessity for prudence and caution—as on the part of him who goes out from a narrow strait into the open ocean. As the mariner moves out into the wide waters, he has indeed more freedom, and it is well—but it is a freedom which demands the exercise of the most cautious prudence, a frequent consultation of the chart, and a perpetual reference to the course desired to be pursued. He is free to sail, but he is bound to duty, and can alter no law which rules wind, current or tide; and truly does he realize that wisdom is better than weapons of war—for weapons of war can, at most, befriend him against but one kind of danger, while wisdom can aid him against many forms of evil.

Indeed, I think all must allow that we dwell altogether too exclusively on the blessings of Freedom, and too little on its Dangers and Duties. I do not say this to imply that freedom is not the great good it is described to be, nor that it is possible to exceed the reality in the grandeur of description. No; for there is not a chord of feeling that does not respond with quivering music of joy to the shout, We are free! As the pealing chorus rises, we know an elevation of feeling that pervades our whole being and makes us realize our consequence in the scale of existences. The winds as they blow, the waves as they roll, and the birds as they fearless cut through the blue air, are types of our liberty, and we exult to speak of them as such. While we do thus speak of them, the eye kindles, the countenance is more and more illuminated, and the voice increases in enthusiasm. We are all orators then, and the 'flow of soul' in the current of words is deep, strong, and continued. And all this is well, if beneath all is a right consciousness of responsibility to ordained and perfect laws. It is only in obedience to similar imperative and unvarying laws that the types referred to are such—that the winds blow, the waves roll, and the bird wings his high and venturesome flight. This we should take into our analogy, that our favorites may teach us lessons of obedience, as well as awaken exulting feeling—lessons that would moderate this feeling and direct it to good purposes, that whereas it before would incline the hand to grasp weapons of war, it now, sobered and made rational, inclines the heart to inquire after and exercise wisdom as better.

And do not the checks and balances of government—and does not the complicated machinery of the conventionalities of state, continually speak to us of the dangers of freedom? Where is the public man more strictly regarded as accountable than in our country? where is he brought before more judgment seats, and where is there a severer scrutiny examining his conduct? In our estimate of our freedom we regard every man as capable, or at least permitted, to judge of those in power, and we delight to speak of them as 'the servants of the people.' They are instructed how to act, and directly or indirectly limits are set to the exercise of the right of opinion in legislative debates. If they rise above the sphere assigned and burst any one of the gilded bands, then have we the burning censure that almost sears the soul, while through the land sounds the voice of condemnation. Here and there may be a more generous spirit maintaining a broader idea of freedom, but it is as a voice from the shore drowned amid the tumult of tempestuous waves.

It is not my object to question the correctness or justice of all this—I only refer to the fact because of what it teaches. And does it not teach that there lies at the base of our ideas of freedom a feeling or sentiment of responsibility? That feeling or sentiment is right, for under no government is individual responsibility so clearly defined, as under the free or republican. Here the right of every man to speak is recognized, and the worth of every man is acknowledged. Here individual virtue and intelligence are confessed to be the sources of national strength and glory; for without virtue and intelligence a despotic government may stand, but a republic must perish—the unalterable records of history declare it. Weapons of war may work out monuments of grandeur for a monarchy, but wisdom alone can glorify a republic. Faith in the great ends desired, energy to work with the appointed means, and patience to wait the due time for results—these are the elements of true patriotism, and their power in the soul forms a beautiful and normal character. It is these that continually say to the freeman that liberty, as saith a certain writer, 'imperatively calls upon us to be thoughtful and serious and wise; that its very greatness should fill us with caution and self-distrust; that its very glory, like that of reason and a moral nature, may be turned only to more exceeding shame and ruin.' Let him who strives for more freedom, resolve to use that freedom when obtained to work out loftier virtues—to give nobler expansion to all the attributes of the true man, and live more faithful to the great interests of the state, the country, and the world. A greater work is ours than was ever given to any people. From the past ages of blood and strife—of noble struggling and devoted heroism, come voices bidding us be true to the great duties, which if well performed, will give to the world, what ages have desired to see, the beauty and glory of republican freedom perfected. When that shall be, the last groan of despotism will soon be uttered, the last link of tyranny's chain will be broken, the last pillar of the thrones of monarchies will fall, and the music of our sphere, as the earth rolls round, will be an everlasting hymn of praise to the God of Liberty! O let us bow down and own with devoutest reverence that wisdom is better than weapons of war!

What is the history of war, in comparison with that of literature, science and art? How different the pictures that rise before our vision! On the one hand, we behold misery, crime, and desolation! we see how true to its purpose war has been as the art of destruction, and where the shout of conquerors rose, now abide abject want and pining misery. Europe has trusted to weapons of war, and the bloody pages of her history tell the result. England has boasted of the glory of her arms upon the land and her thunder on the sea, and what is she now? Is she an object of envy? Hear the groans of her suffering millions, and the cries of vengeance that ring far and wide. Yea, from her own midst there comes a voice that tells her—

'There's blood upon thy jewelled sword,
And shame upon thy crown;
Pollution marks thy belted lord,
And sin thy churchman's gown;

And from the islands of the sea,
The groan of millions curses thee.

Thy masses in their hovels pine,
Or curse thee, while they toil;
Thy nobles, of illustrious line,
Like vampyres suck thy soil;
And now, proud "mistress of the sea,"
The meanest wretch gives food to thee!

But turn from the dark and blood stained picture—from the outward wretchedness and inward desolation of the progress of War, and behold the blessings of Wisdom, as she has wrought through literature, philosophy, art and science! Is she not a divine artist—are not her pictures beautiful! She is the patron of every industrial vocation of productive labor; she smiles on the inventive arts that increase the comforts and conveniences of life, while they lessen the drudgery of labor; she goes with the artizan to the work-shop or the manufactory, and the laborer to the field, and the mariner on the sea, and assures them, all of the security of the rewards of industry; she encourages the erection of the hall of science, the retreat of philosophy, and the schools of learning; she teaches respect for the means of knowledge, for the instructors of mind and the educators of the heart; she guards the altars of religion from profanation, and leads the people to them; there she draws out the deep and strong affections of the soul, and makes men feel the highest purposes of their being; there she reveals the beauty of virtue, the glory of holiness, the loveliness of Jesus, and the grandeur of God; there she trains willing subjects for active and unswerving devotion to the immortal principles of goodness, and unveils the blessedness of the invisible that they may nobly endure the evils of the present and labor for humanity with the spirit of Christ. How peaceful is her mission! How charming is her aspect! She is the high priestess of the good, the beautiful, and the true. The angels of God bless her, and from the throne of eternal Majesty comes the perfect benediction. Let us serve her.

And how shall we serve her? We can serve her by tearing away the tinsel coverings of the hideousness of War, and by solemnly rebuking the spirit that jestingly treats of the probabilities of warlike movements at home or with enemies abroad. We can serve her by strengthening pacific principles in our own hearts, and exerting the influence of a correct example in calming turbulent feelings and passions. We can serve her by preparing ourselves for all times of excitement, that whatever may be our station or circumstances, we may not fan the flame that may destroy many of the golden bands of social harmony and lay waste the hopes of the christian philanthropist. We can serve her by patient study into human rights, by examining the true position which man should maintain towards man, and by the advocacy of broad and generous views of freedom, without participating in denunciatory declamations on the one hand or the other—which denunciations do nothing towards union and peace, but kindle strife and prevent the best action of the mind to think, reason, decide, and rationally act. Wisdom is better than weapons of war—than any show or exhibitions of force. May God give us ‘the wisdom from above, which is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy.’

[NOTE. I have just met with the following eloquent passage—its author I know not—but add it for its truth and beauty.]

‘More heroes have been crowned with laurel than authors; but have they won more victories? Do they achieve as much? Your great captain may overrun a continent, and the nameless adventurer, Mohammed or Bonaparte, may become a despotic king over kings. Your world-renowned man-killer may acquire sovereignty; gold and a gory glory may be his. He reigns, at best, over so many millions of human bodies susceptible of pain and fear. But the author too governs, though less externally; he rules men’s minds. All potent in his proper sphere, he may be equally a conqueror therein. To conquer, to reign, are to achieve and hold dominion. Hence, rightly speaking, he conquers whom he convinces. If I overturn one common error, put in its place and propagate as an active principle, one new truth, I achieve a greater victory over mankind, than he who wades through seas of slaughter to a throne; inasmuch as mine is bloodless and perpetual; it is not of an age, but for all time. Alexander and Napoleon won and lost empires, and in one score of years thereafter, was left no sign of them but some ruins and a name; while Aristotle and Bacon, Christ and Luther, have conquered and still conquer, not in this country or in that; but Christendom. The founder of a system is greater than the founder of a kingdom, as the perdurable pyramid is more stable than the perishable pillar. A kingdom established is less than a truth, by as much as the temporal is less than the eternal. For this kingdom of the Saxons’ to-day is the Normans’ to-morrow—is now Harold’s, now William’s. But the author’s conquests are enduring. Heaven and earth shall pass away; but not one word shall pass away. The power of the sword perishes with the arm that wields it; but a good book lives and works forever. Well said the poet who felt its truth:

“The pen is mightier than the sword.”

So it is, and so it has been always. But if there is truth in prophecy, or insight in man, a brighter and milder day is yet to dawn upon us. Letters shall some time civilize all men, whom wars shall cease to consume. The schoolmaster shall go abroad among the nations, bearing in his hand the Book of Peace, fulfilling the high destiny which is foretold of the human race; a destiny as certain as that Christ shall ultimately reign, and put all enemies under his feet; the swords shall be turned into ploughshares, and the spears into reaping hooks, ere Time shall close his record, and the heavens pass away as a scroll.’

THE WARRIOR'S DEATH.

BY IONE.

It is related by Mr. Bancroft, the Historian of the United States, (and to what better authority can we refer) that, during the battle of Bunker Hill, the regiment to which Major Pitcairn and his son belonged, was crossing Charlestown Neck, when a shot deprived Major P. of life. His son sprang to his side exclaiming, ‘I have lost a father!’ and as the news spread through the ranks the soldiers took up the cry and repeated ‘we too have lost a father!’ What a touching and comprehensive eulogy! Before relating the story Mr. B. remarked, ‘let us do justice even to our enemies, or, I should rather say, let us do justice to our enemies before all others!’ A truly noble and christian sentiment.

From the broad battle plain
Went up a fearful cry!
A leader of that martial train
Had lain him down to die!

Not from that veteran’s lip
Escaped a word of fear!
He quailed not death’s dark stream to sip,
Nor shunned a soldier’s bier!

A brave young warrior came,
And raised that lifeless form.
He saw that death had quenched the flame,
And bowed beneath the storm!

But one low mournful wail
Hung on the morning air!
‘I’ve lost a father!’ hearts might quail
To see such anguish there!

As drew each soldier near
The hero’s grassy bed,
‘We too have lost a father here,’
In broken words they said!

Up from the blood-stained sod,
Glanced many a tear-dimmed eye,
As if to mark the path he trod
To worlds beyond the sky!

A fearful price to thee
Unhallowed war we pay!
God give us grace the curse to flee
While time shall roll away!

'A TIME FOR ALL THINGS.'

BY MRS. S. R. MORRIS.

AMONG the many sayings of him who from ancient time has been proverbial for wisdom, is one to which we give our hearty assent; 'There is a time for all things.' There is a time for Youth. How bright and sunny its visions,—how rich and varied its hopes, how pure and joyous its pleasures,—how strong and ardent its desires, how fond and glowing its expectations,—how blest its loving and guileless spirit. The earth is clad in richer verdure, the sun imparts a more brilliant light, the rays of the night queen are sweeter and more silvery than can ever be given to maturer years. There is a charm thrown round youthful scenes, which succeeding years can never obliterate, or corroding cares destroy or efface.

There are hallowed remembrances, gladsome thoughts, and golden dreams, almost bursting the fount of feeling, which can never die; they were born in heaven, and must live and expand, and flourish there. The days of my early youth, how fresh to my vision, ere yet the glad fount of mirth had been broken, or the contents of sorrow's cup been tasted. The cottage by the wayside, the garden and surrounding grounds, within whose enclosure was a beautiful reservoir, on whose sloping and grassy bank I have spent many happy hours, catching the shining fishes that played in its pure and limpid waters. On either side was a broad and pleasant pathway, shaded alternately with the majestic oak, and the stately elm. At one extremity, standing on their everlasting bases, apparently unchanged by time, and as yet spared by a more ruthless hand, towered a ledge of granite. A little murmuring rill, which had wound its way quietly along for many miles through woodland and meadow, scarcely disturbed by the tiniest pebble, rushed down this rocky precipice as with youthful ardor and impetuosity, paying to the little pond its never failing tribute of bright and sparkling waters. From the fissures in the rock, where deposited by the passing winds was a scanty supply of earth, sprang up the wild rose and columbine, which I have oft-times climbed to procure for a little brother now in heaven, while his tiny fingers almost convulsed with impatience to grasp the 'beau'ful poseys.' To me how numerous are heaven's attractions. Four little beings whom I watched over with a sister's affection and almost with a mother's care, with seraph harps are mingling their praises with the redeemed on high! Three darling babes cherished with all the ardor and affection of a youthful mother, around which clustered the fondest hopes, are numbered with the pure spirits who continually worship around the throne. He who loved me in earliest existence, and him to whom I plighted my youthful vows, are also numbered with those whose garments are washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb. But I digress, pardon me.

When the future is spread before us like a picture in the distance whose gorgeous coloring and gilded surface entrance the vision, covering thereby its shades or imperfections, then is the time for youth.

There is a time for Joy. When the eye is brilliant with smiles, and the heart light with mirth. When hope's enchanting cup is circled with pearl and gems, sparkling in the sunlight of enjoyment, before one string has been broken or one brilliant dimmed by sorrow or disappointment. When the holy light which illumines fancy's paintings is fresh and glowing, when every scene is colored with happy thoughts, when imagination casts her magic spell on passing events, when on her tireless wing we soar, and by her powerful influence discover untold beauties. Before the feelings are seared by distrust, or the thoughts corroded by suspicion; before the heart is made sad by deception, or the mind stamped with unyielding reality, is the time for unsullied joy.

There is a time for Love. When from the well-springs of feeling rise up deep and fervent thoughts, when in the heart are awakened glad sensations, and undefined and varied hopes. Like the glow which gives brilliancy to the sunset cloud, whose light gradually changes to soft and mellow twilight filling the soul with devotion and gratitude, so does pure affection awaken thrilling memories, which give peace and joy in retrospect. Before the treachery of the world is known, or its bitterness felt, is the time for love.

There is a time for Grief. When musing on the buds of promise which fell and withered before us ere the flower was permitted to expand or shed its refreshing fragrance; when busy thought calls up the loves which gladdened our path-way, and brings again voices on every breeze like those which gave melody and sweetness to young existence ere the golden sunlight of joy had been obscured by clouds, or the wave of time became turbulent by the storms of adversity. When each fond remembrance is forever crushed, and the recollection of each departed joy rushes through the very springs of feeling, then is the time for grief.

There is a time for Peace. When nature's unutterable though powerful voice speaks in soft and gentle accents to the sorrowful spirit and with its music-tones brings rejoicing to the bursting heart, and bids it cease to feel its cheerless bitterness. The verdant hills, the cerulean sky, the glittering stars, give peace in contemplation. The little summer bird, whose entrancing melody as he rests on the grassy bank of the quiet stream chanting his evening song, speaks peace in eloquent tones to the listening ear. The very atmosphere speaks peace at the twilight hour, and instills its silent breathings into the thoughtful spirit until grief is utterly banished therefrom, and the eye swims with tears of ecstasy. Prompted by this silent though eloquent voice, whose silvery tones are given to the soul in abundant mercy, the spirit learns to trust in that God, with whom are the issues of life; in the order of whose providence there is a time for all things.

EDITOR'S BOOK TABLE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., JANUARY, 1843.

Eighteen hundred Forty Three. A serial work, in twelve chapters, 365 pages, with 'pictorial illustrations,' 'engraved on' earth and sea and sky, in the most perfect style. Veritable Time, publisher.

The issuing of this work may be depended upon, for if the publisher ever disappointed any one, it was not his own fault, but was in consequence of incorrect anticipations. We mention this, because some think it will be suspended in the early part of the volume. It will be published punctually, and will deserve an attentive consideration on the part of every human being. Subscribers are not asked for, as the work is prepared for the public good; but the enjoyment of subsequent issues, we are well assured, depends in no small degree on the right improvement of those which take precedence. Readers should be careful to preserve what 'notes' are suggested to them as they go from title page to preface and thus carefully on from page to page, as we have reason to believe that these suggestions will be of great value in the sequel. We trust all will appreciate the efforts of Time in this great work, and gratefully acknowledge the divinity and goodness of the AUTHOR.

Sermons of Consolation. By F. W. P. Greenwood, D. D., Minister of King's Chapel, Boston. Boston: Little & Brown. 1842. Duodecimo, pp. 335.

This is a beautiful volume, pleasant to the eye as the calm and engaging face of its author. He always writes as one who has a good purpose in writing, and who feels that purpose to be an important one. He is, moreover, an eloquent writer; and no one will question the truth of this remark, who has read his articles—'The Eternity of God,' 'The Falls of Niagara,' and 'Teachings of Autumn.' The latter production is placed in the present volume. When we speak of this work as a beautiful volume, we do not so speak merely in reference to the letter press and binding, but to 'the inner life'—to the volume as a work of thought, as a rich out-breathing of a soul that lives in the heavenly, and whose words are sweet and balmy to a bruised or bereaved heart. His philosophy is a christian philosophy, inclining us to think of the strokes of pain, (to change one of Goethe's figures) as the beat of the thresher's flail, that brings from 'the dry and fallen ear' 'so much of nourishment and life.'

The following will give his idea of the Future in reference to the sinful: 'An exchange of worlds is best even for those who have grossly abused the present life; because it is well known to Infinite Wisdom, when the time of probation has been sufficiently extended, when the souls of friends have been sufficiently tried, and when the discipline and awards of another scene, should in their deep mystery be commenced.' Pp. 121, 122, see also p. 116.

We must add our regret that Unitarian preachers when they wish to discuss the subject of Death as an appointment of God, cannot find any other text than Heb. ix. 27. We can refer to three or four Unitarian sermons, at hand, on 'Death as an Appointment of God,' with that verse as a text or motto.

Claims of the Country on American Females. By Miss Coxe. Columbus: Isaac N. Whiting. 1842. 2 vols. Pp. 243 and 243.

We were disappointed in the purchase of these volumes, and have learned a lesson—not to send for works written by authors of whom we know nothing, or whose productions we have never seen. The author is an Episcopalian, and 'our fallen nature' is a theme for frequent remark and dull comment. The volumes are very different in character from what almost any one would expect from the title. The first volume aims to bring out the fact that under Protestant Christianity, woman holds a higher rank and exerts a wider influence than under any other form of religion. The second discusses the characteristics of our political condition, and treats of what woman's influence should be in order to perpetuate our free and good institutions. These present good themes; and discussed with concentration of thought and directness of purpose, they might be made powerful in chaining attention and moulding character.

We do not wish to be understood as condemning these volumes. No; there are many good things in them, but they are very different from a work that would be written on the same theme by a liberal christian—by a Miss Sedgwick.

The Salem Belle: A Tale of 1692. Boston: Tappan & Dennett. 1842. Pp. 238.

This little work has been received with universal favor, and deserves the immediate popularity which has been given to it. It is written in a very good and agreeable style, and very graphically describes the times of Witchcraft and Folly. The narrative is well calculated to enchain the attention, and the reflections—suggested by the turn of events—are well timed and judicious. The reader will rise from its perusal with a vivid picture of the times of 1692, and with, we trust, devout gratitude for the passing away of those superstitions which clouded the mind of the good and were successful aids to the evil in prosecuting their wicked schemes. It does 'expose the danger of popular delusions,' and will do something to 'guard the public mind against their recurrence,' and will render it more difficult for dreamy fanatics to establish their vagaries and prostrate reason before error.

Fables of La Fontaine. Translated from the French, by Elizur Wright, jr. Boston: Tappan & Dennett. 1842. 2 vols. Pp. 247 and 290.

The first issue of these Translations was made in a very expensive form, and we are exceedingly glad to greet the present edition which is in a very neat and convenient style and form. There has certainly been no work of this character which has received more praise than this, not only from the press everywhere, but from eminent scholars, and one commendation we quote for its brevity and point; 'It is certain that this French diamond has lost none of its value in passing through your hands.' And the diamond, we may add, is one of the 'first water,' rare and beautiful indeed. We know not how we can better give an idea of the spirit of the work, than to quote a part of a recommendation of it—the Original and the Translation—given by a distinguished Professor of French in the Albany Academies:—'To all those who have read La Fontaine's Fables, no recommendation is necessary; and to those who have not yet read the beautiful translation of Mr. Wright, the following extract from the eulogy of La Fontaine, by Chamfort, will be sufficient proof, that in no other book now in the hands of children is more regard paid to morality and virtue.'

"What distinguishes La Fontaine from all moralists, is the insinuating mildness of his morality; it is that wisdom, natural as himself, which appears to be only a happy development of his instinct. Virtue, with him, is presented in its most pleasant robes. Does he offer any example of generosity, any sacrifice, he makes it spring from love, from friendship, from a feeling so simple, so pleasant, that the sacrifice itself must have appeared a blessing. But if he generally shuns the harsh ideas of efforts, privations, and self sacrifice, it seems that they should cease to be necessary, and that society should have no more need of them. He speaks to you only through yourself or in your own stead; and from his lessons, or rather advice, general happiness would spring."

SKETCHES FROM REAL LIFE. NO. V.

BY MRS. J. R. SPOONER.

THE SCHOOLMISTRESS.

'How CAN you, Lucy, persist in seeing Mr. Raymond, when both our parents have forbidden you to do so? You know they are not only displeased but grieved at the thought of your giving him any encouragement to pursue the acquaintance farther.'

'Why Charlotte, I cannot help seeing him occasionally; what would you have me to do when I meet him in my walks?'

'I would advise you not to walk with him. You know you never can marry him with the consent of our parents, (and surely you would not do so without) and they have good reasons for withholding it. The infidel principles he is known to hold, form a sufficient cause for discountenancing his attentions to you, if others did not exist, in his circumstances, and his evident ill temper.'

'I do not see why a person is to be blamed for not thinking exactly as we do, and as to Raymond's poverty, I care not for that. What is that love worth, which would not share the fate of its object? And you forget that his profession will at least afford him a competent support.'

'I am sorry dear Lucy, to hear you allude so indifferently to the irreligious sentiments of your friend; true, he is more to be pitied than blamed for his blindness to the great truths revealed in God's word, yet this is an objection, a most serious objection to your marrying him. "How can two walk together except they be agreed?" And if a wide difference of taste and opinion in minor matters is an impediment to the happiness of the married life, how much must opposite sentiments on this all important subject detract from its pleasure. To me it seems one of the highest and purest enjoyments of friends, to walk together to the house of God, worship him at the same shrine, and take "sweet counsel together" in reference to the lofty themes indicated by religion; and when one, with whom you have formed the dearest of all earthly ties, possesses the cold heart of a sceptic, and instead of sympathizing in your devotional feelings, regards them perhaps with scorn, you will find it a sad trial. I hope you will reflect more deeply on this serious subject; no other step in life can be so important to a woman, as on this depends her happiness or misery, and it is probably owing to the carelessness with which marriages are contracted, that they are often so unhappy. I think it is Addison who says, that "the mischief generally proceeds from the unwise choice people make for themselves, and even in expecting happiness from things incapable of giving it; and that nothing but the good qualities of the person beloved, can be a foundation for a love of judgment and discretion; and that whoever expects happiness from any thing but virtue, wisdom, good humor, and a similitude of manners, will find themselves widely mistaken." But however good the temper and disposition may naturally be, this forms no safeguard against the temptations to sin which are so thickly crowded about the path of a young man in a place like London, where vice dressed in her most alluring colors leads thousands astray. With Raymond's views, what security can you have that he will even hesitate to plunge into the broad way to ruin, should his inclinations or his associates lead him to do so. Be assured that without the restraining influence of religion, the good resolves and intentions of man are but too apt to vanish like clouds before the wind. You may trust in his love, but you have not yet tried it. I know dear sister I pain you by these remarks, but I feel certain that as his wife you will be called upon to endure much that you little dream of. Our beloved parents have only your happiness in view in objecting to your marriage; do be persuaded to avoid all future intercourse with this man; he will I think soon leave the village, when he sees you are determined upon this. The sacrifice on your part I know will be painful, but you will be rewarded for your acquiescence in the wishes of your friends, and I doubt not that you will live to rejoice that you did so.'

The most important events of life frequently owe their origin to some very trifling circumstance, and sometimes upon the balance of a question, the result of which appears to be of no moment, is attached an influence which spreads itself over the whole course of our future path, either for good or for evil. When 'Squire Dalton yielded to the solicitations of his youngest and favorite daughter to sit for his portrait, he little thought that from that simple act there would arise causes which would break up his hitherto happy circle, cloud it with gloom and sorrow, and occasion his darling Lucy to drink of a cup dregged with bitterness and wo.

Mr. Dalton was a wealthy Englishman, residing on an estate which had descended to him from a line of ancestors who gloried in the appellation of the yeomanry of Britain. He had early in life married a beautiful but portionless girl, whose worth amply compensated him for displeasing some aristocratic connections by this act of folly, as they were pleased to term it. His children consisting of several daughters, had now grown up; the whole family lavished an almost idolizing affection upon the youngest, who was truly one of the loveliest of earth's creatures. To a slight but well formed figure, she united regular and beautiful features, and a complexion that might well have vied with the lily and the rose. She was at this time scarcely seventeen, and was pursuing her studies under the superintendence of her governess, an accomplished and intelligent person, who had for years occupied that station in the family. Lucy had never known care, her light and cheerful spirits were never clouded by sufferings of her own, though her feelings for the trials of others would often cause her eyes to be suffused by tears of sympathy. She was truly a child of nature, frank and artless herself, she suspected no guile in others, and her feelings were warm and ardent, even to enthusiasm. Mr. Dalton's residence was in the pretty village of Tiverton in Devonshire, the scenery of which is highly picturesque and romantic. Bold hills rise here and there, interspersed with fertile valleys, through which a small river winds along in peaceful beauty. The tall Gothic tower of the old church rose far above the dark cypress and yews which shaded the graves of the forefathers of the village, and its gray walls were clothed with the moss and ivy of centuries. Close by stood the parsonage, also an ancient looking edifice, but the bright flowers and tasteful shrubbery surrounding it, gave it a cheerful aspect, contrasting not unpleasantly with the solemnity of its neighborhood. The minister was a promising young man who had not long since assumed the pastoral office. The inhabitants of the village were with few exceptions of the poorer classes, and the greatest man in the place was Lord E——, who possessed a country seat in the neighborhood, where with his family he usually spent the summer months. It was this gentleman who brought with him from London an artist whom he had engaged to execute several portraits of his children, and it was on hearing of this, that Lucy Dalton urged her request to her father.

Henry Raymond (so was the painter named) was nearly thirty, remarkably handsome in person, and possessed of pleasing and gentlemanly manners; but a phrenologist would have hesitated to confide in him, from the fact that his cranium showed that the moral sentiments did not predominate. But there was no phrenology in those days, and even had there been, I doubt whether in the present case, in a trial of phrenology versus love, the latter would have been put to flight. Under a pleasing exterior, Raymond concealed a most worthless character; an infidel in principle, he regarded no laws of religion or morality. Bold, calculating and unfeeling, he ever sought his own gratification, without reference to the feelings or interests of others. Lucy's beauty early attracted his attentions, and it was not long before he perceived that she did not regard him with indifference. At first the idea of marrying her did not enter his mind, but the repute of her father's wealth caused him soon to think of it, and having no other income than that derived from his profession, he thought he could submit to the encumbrance of a wife, provided she brought him enough to render his own exertions less necessary. But Mr. Dalton having received some intimation of his real character, coldly and positively rejected his proposals, and giving Lucy his reasons for this, ordered her on pain of his severe displeasure, to avoid all future intercourse with her lover. She had however met him more than once (accidentally as it seemed to her) since her father had forbidden her to see him, which as has been seen, formed the subject of conversation between Lucy and an elder sister, whose persuasions at last elicited a promise that she would immediately write to Raymond and apprise him of her determination to yield obedience to her father's wishes that she should see him no more, and declared her intention of confining herself to the house until he had left the village. To write such an epistle called for no small effort on the part of a young girl who loved for the first time with all the fervor and confidence of her nature. Raymond had assured her that calumny alone had prejudiced her family against him, and he succeeded in convincing her that his character had been aspersed. It is easy to believe what we wish true, and poor Lucy's attachment was strengthened by the conviction of his innocence.

Lucy received a few lines in answer to her note, saying that since she had really resolved to obey her father's injunctions he would trouble her no more, and would leave the village on the following day, never to return, on condition that she would consent to see him once more, if only for five minutes, entreating her if she had ever loved him not to refuse to grant him an opportunity of bidding her a last farewell. After some hesitation, the request was granted, and early the next morning before any of the family were stirring, Lucy left the house, intending to return before she was missed. But the artful Raymond had determined otherwise; on Mr. Dalton's refusing his consent, he had formed a plan (which he was now determined to execute) to persuade Lucy to consent to a clandestine marriage, by assuring her that her parents would not withhold their forgiveness of this step, when they saw that it was no longer of any use to oppose it. She withstood his solicitations for awhile, then more feebly, and alas for poor Lucy! il est que la premiere pas que coute, and ere the sun had risen, she had suffered herself to be drawn toward the carriage which waited at the end of the lane, into which Raymond lifted her, and they drove off at a rapid rate.

It was a lovely morning, not a breath of wind stirred the leaves, and the bright hues of the sky were reflected by the pure and peaceful waters, the wild flowers that decked its margin were yet bathed with the refreshing dew, and the early lark clove the air trilling his melodious song. But Lucy for the first time in her life was insensible to the sweet influences around her, and a deep sense of humiliation seemed to wither every feeling of her heart, and her tears flowed fast in spite of the soothing attempts of her companion. She raised her head as they were about to pass the old church, which she looked upon with almost sacred reverence, being associated with all her earliest impressions and affections, and a death like feeling came over her as she was startled from her intense gaze by the tolling of the bell for some spirit that had just departed. It was a thrilling sound in that calm, pure hour, speaking of death and the grave as the sun was breaking forth in all his glory, investing the earth with life, warmth and beauty. It was like the voice of another world asserting its claims in the quiet and loveliness of the morning hour. And the deep tones fell upon Lucy's ear with the awe of a warning voice from heaven, and at that moment she could not help regarding it as an evil omen of the step she had taken. Throwing herself on her knees she implored to be taken back to her home, she would have given worlds to have retraced the events of the last hour, but her pleading was in vain, and when they arrived at the first stopping place, she was lifted fainting from the carriage.

Lucy's absence from the breakfast table attracted no particular attention, but when at the dinner hour she did not make her appearance, and it was discovered that she had not been seen since the previous evening, a suspicion of the truth became general, and ere long it was painfully confirmed; the grief and consternation of the family could hardly have been surpassed, had they followed her to the grave. It scarcely seemed possible that Lucy had thus requited the almost idolizing affection of her parents, and after the shock occasioned by the intelligence had in some measure subsided, her father expressed his feelings at her conduct in deeply indignant terms; and when some days afterwards a letter was received from his daughter mentioning her marriage, and imploring forgiveness for the step she had taken, it was returned to her in a blank envelope, as an intimation that no reconciliation was to be looked for at present. Mrs. Dalton however obtained permission to write to Lucy, and forward to her a well supplied wardrobe, her harp and books, together with a handsome sum of money.

There was one other to whom Lucy's elopement occasioned no little pain; this was the young pastor Mr. Aylmer, who soon after his first introduction to them, had been on terms of intimacy with Mr. Dalton's family, and it was not strange that ere long he took a particular interest in Lucy. True, he considered her but little more than a child, fascinating from her extreme beauty, winning manners, and sweet disposition; in whom he discovered indications of a ripening intellect of no common order. And there were times when he would indulge in the thought, that at some future day she might be won to preside over his home. He had been absent from his parish for some weeks, when on his return he heard of Lucy's marriage, the intelligence of which was indeed a shock to him; he was not aware of the depth of his attachment until thus awoke to a consciousness of it; and the knowledge that she was the wife of another, was embittered by the thought that she was united to one every way unworthy of her.

Poor Lucy! hers was indeed a sacrifice. On the altar of her love she had offered her early home, her friends, and all that had hitherto made her life cloudless and happy. Would she had been better requited by him for whom she had sacrificed so much. It would present a dark picture, were I to describe the particulars of her sad life during the next two years. A brief sketch of the outline must suffice, leaving the shades to be supplied by the imagination of the reader.

After their marriage they proceeded immediately to London, where for some time they lodged at a respectable boarding house. From the moment she had fled from her home, Lucy's mind had become a prey to remorse, to the sufferings from which, was added ere long the bitter anguish of seeing her husband in his true colors. To her, warm hearted and enthusiastic as she was in her attachments, her friends seemed clothed with perfection; she was blind to the failings which cling in some degree to all, and it was with a feeling bordering on distraction, that the conviction at last became forced upon her mind, that she had married a heartless gambler, and a blasphemer of the holy religion in which she had been nurtured. He no longer deemed it necessary to impose any restraint upon his violent temper, which was but too often vented upon his wife. He possessed sufficient talent to warrant his attaining some eminence in his profession, if he applied himself diligently to the practice of it; but a small part of his time, however, was spent in his study, compared with that passed in gaming houses, those haunts of iniquity with which London abounds; and to these he was in the habit of repairing night after night, remaining till a late hour in the morning, and even some times through the following day.

There is perhaps no passion more destructive, and debasing to the better feelings of humanity, than that of gambling, when carried to so great an extent as to become an overruling desire, a thirst which is never quenched, an excitement which swallows every other, in short a mania. Such it was with Raymond; from early youth he had imbibed its spirit, which seemed to gather additional strength as he grew into manhood. As might be expected, his most intimate associates were such as he was in the habit of meeting at his favorite resorts, many of whom hesitated not to avow themselves disciples of Paine and his followers, and some time since Raymond had been added to their number; and the pure ears of his young wife were constantly shocked by hearing language and sentiments that inspired her with horror. His conduct soon became marked with cruelty and neglect, and he would frequently treat her in the most abusive manner, merely to give vent to his angry feelings on returning home stung by the disappointment of losing. In the course of a few months he neglected his business so much, that they were forced to resort to cheaper and less comfortable lodgings; here he became more savage than ever to his now almost heart broken wife, and not content with disposing of her trinkets, (the gifts of other and happier days) he even after awhile pawned one article after another of her wardrobe, in order to furnish himself with the means of again trying his luck.

Lucy had early manifested a great taste for painting, which had been carefully cultivated, and in the first months of her marriage she had beguiled many a weary hour in tracing from memory the features of the beloved friends from whom she was separated. Her proficiency in the art was gladly seized upon by her husband as a means to render her support less burdensome to him, and he took some pains to instruct her farther, until her skill enabled her to supply his place so well at the easel, that she was thus almost constantly employed; but her industry had not the effect of placing them in more comfortable circumstances, and it was eventually the cause of Raymond's relaxing in the little care he took to provide for their necessities, and his absence from home became more frequent than ever. During this time Mrs. Raymond often received letters from her mother and sisters, to whose inquiries concerning her circumstances she always returned an evasive answer. She felt that her sufferings were occasioned by her own imprudence, and she determined to conceal them from her friends, and to endure them in uncomplaining silence, as the just reward of her own folly. She formed no acquaintances, consequently she had no friend in whose sympathy she could confide, and amid the tumultuous crowd in which she lived, she found herself solitary and alone, an isolated, wretched being. She rarely went out unless to church, where with the feelings of the humble prodigal, she seated herself in one of the broad isles where seats were allotted for the poor. She had been taught from her childhood to revere the Scriptures as the word of God, and to prize them as such beyond all price; but she had been accustomed to rely upon the creed of her fathers, as deriving its authority from that holy book, and she had given her attention more to its moral precepts and instructions, its lofty expressions and beautiful images, than to an examination of its doctrinal passages. The idea, however, of the never ending torments reserved for the impenitent, had always chilled her with horror; and it was not strange that this caused her to regard the character of her Creator with a certain fearful awe, which mingled itself with all her conceptions of him, through the influence of which, her love and admiration were wholly invested in her Savior, whom she doubted not had suffered and died to save his followers from the eternal vengeance of his Father. The sceptical views of her husband were constantly brought before her in a manner that made her heart shrink within her; his assertions of the inconsistencies, and want of evidence of the truths of the Scriptures, caused her to examine them with a close and prayerful attention; and happily for her the more she read, the stronger her convictions became that they were indeed given by the 'inspiration of God,' that there was no other lamp to the feet or light to the path, no other guiding star amid the clouds of sin—no other 'anchor of the soul' under the buffetings of the waves of sorrow, and in the last sufferings of humanity at the hour of death, and finally no other light to pierce the darkness of the grave. And to this conviction was added another, which indeed filled her mind with 'peace and joy in believing;' this was, that God was the universal Father of every created soul, that he would 'never leave or forsake' them, that he afflicted mankind, not from vengeance, but 'even as a father chastens his children,' for their good, and that finally all the human family, 'no wanderer lost,' would be restored to holiness and happiness in the world to come, where sin and death should be destroyed forever. She saw in her own fate, that 'every transgression received a just recompense of reward,' which was also verified by the life of her wretched husband, for he was constantly unhappy and discontented, even when pursuing his favorite amusement. O that men would become wise! that their eyes may be opened to discover that the true road to happiness lies in the performance of their obligations to God, to man, and to themselves—that in the strait and narrow path of duty, there is more enjoyment to be found than in the broad ways of sin.

We must do Mr. Dalton the justice to mention that he did not intend to continue unrelenting towards his repentant child; but he had other daughters, and he seemed to imagine that it was a part of his duty to them to be in no haste to offer his forgiveness to Lucy. And even when his heart yearned to embrace her, he would reply to the solicitations of his wife, 'no, no, not yet, I will not see her now, perhaps at some other time.'

More than two years had elapsed, and some time had passed since any thing had been heard of Mrs. Raymond by her family, when a letter in an unknown hand was received by Mr. Dalton, who read as follows:—'Sir: As the medical attendant of your daughter, I have at length obtained permission from her to make you acquainted with her situation, which she has too long concealed from her friends. She is now ill, very ill, and without the most tender and long continued care, I fear she will not recover. My assistance was not called until lately, and she has suffered much from neglect, as well as from the want of the many little comforts required in her illness. Her worthless husband has deserted her, (and is gone she knows not whither) leaving her with two children, (the youngest of which was unborn at the time) in a state of utter destitution. But be assured that she does not at present experience any necessity that can be supplied by my wife, who is much interested in Mrs. Raymond; indeed she has stolen away the eldest child, who is delicate and requires more care than her poor mother can render her at present. I feel certain that a re-union with her friends will do much to renovate the health of my patient, whose mind appears to have been sadly distressed by the estrangement consequent upon her marriage. In the hope that you will readily avail yourself of the earliest opportunity to visit your daughter, I remain, respectfully, yours,

WILLIAM LESLIE.'

The reception of this letter diffused the most poignant distress throughout Mr. Dalton's family, and deeply did he reproach himself for so long persisting in his refusal to be reconciled to Lucy. It was immediately agreed that both her parents, accompanied by one of her sisters, should proceed to London on the following day, and as soon as she was able to endure the journey, bring back the poor sufferer with her little ones, to the home for which she had so long been a stranger. Not knowing her address, they proceeded on their arrival to the house of the kind physician who had interested himself in Mrs. Raymond's behalf. From him they received a truly warm welcome, but learned that the object of their solicitude still continued very ill, and Dr. Leslie feared the consequences that the excitement of meeting would most probably produce in his patient's weak state, and he went immediately to prepare her for the interview.

Lucy's close confinement to the house, and that too in one of the most thickly crowded and unhealthy parts of the city, joined to her constant application to painting by day, and to her needle by night, together with the mental sufferings she endured through her husband's conduct, and the sad feelings attendant upon her separation from her family, had wrought such an effect upon her frame, that it was difficult to recognize in her pallid, sunken and care worn features, the countenance of the once gay and beautiful Lucy Dalton. As soon as it could be done with safety, she was removed to more comfortable lodgings, where under care and kindness to which she had long been a stranger, she soon recovered sufficiently to return to her native village. Her feelings on again beholding the home of her childhood, may be easily conceived; a weary life of suffering seemed to have been crowded into the short space of two years, which it was indeed painful to contrast with the happiness of her early days, and many were the sad hours spent in wandering over her former favorite spots; though she rejoiced once more to look upon the scenes with which her fondest recollections and her purest feelings were associated. Her parents and sisters did all in their power to soothe and console her, and after some months had passed away, and her health became reinstated, she seemed in some measure to have recovered her former appearance, and was occasionally cheerful. She had endured her sorrows with meek submission, regarding them as just, and though abandoned and cruelly treated by him for whom she had sacrificed so much, she forgave him, and daily prayed that he might be turned away from his errors.

* Mrs. Raymond was welcomed as a sister by the minister, indeed he expected ere long to claim her as such, a promise of marriage having been duly 'given and received' between himself and Charlotte Dalton, (the discreet sister the reader was introduced to at the opening of this narrative) in whom he thought he discovered qualities that would enable her to fill the station of a minister's wife much to his satisfaction, and shortly after Lucy's return this event took place.

All went on smoothly for some time in Mr. Dalton's family, until he unfortunately became security for a friend, to an amount involving nearly the whole of his large property, thus reducing him to comparative poverty. He found himself obliged to dispose of the handsome house in which he lived, and with a small income, saved from the wreck of what he had once possessed, he retired with his family to a neat but humble cottage in the vicinity of his former residence. Here Mrs. Raymond came to the determination that she would not continue, in her father's changed circumstances, to burden him with the maintenance of herself and children. Her intention was at first strongly opposed by her father, who never wished her to leave his roof again, and it was also objected to by her kind brother-in-law, who offered her a home at the Parsonage, but she was not to be shaken in her resolution.

Since her return home Lucy had devoted much of her time to the pursuit of the studies in which she was engaged when her unfortunate marriage took place. She possessed a good mind which the trials she had been subject to seemed to have strengthened and matured, and in the assiduous cultivation of her talents, in communing with the mighty minds of past ages, and in acquainting herself with the standard literature of the day, she often found forgetfulness of her past sufferings. And she thus became prepared to sustain the character of a teacher. Through the advice and assistance of her kind friends, Dr. Leslie and his wife, she was enabled to establish a boarding school for young ladies within a few miles of London, and their influence was successfully exerted to procure her pupils. Her husband had now been absent three years, during which time she had heard nothing farther of him than that he had left England, never intending to return, which intelligence was agreeably received by her friends, who trusted that he would never again molest his wife. Mrs. Raymond soon became known as a most successful teacher; her industry, and her attentions to her duties were remarkable, and no one in that vocation ever commanded more esteem and affection from her pupils than did this excellent woman, in whose family the law of love seemed alone to preside, which enabled her to maintain the discipline and order necessary to be observed in a large school comprehending pupils of all classes and ages. For some time she employed the assistance of the first masters, from whom she took lessons herself in private, to improve her acquaintance with Italian, French, and music, until by her proficiency in these, she was competent to supply their places. She now became a contributor to several fashionable periodicals, to which employment she generally allotted a couple of hours when the labors of the day were over, and her charge all asleep, and this she called her recreation. It was no small wonder to her friends, how that young and inexperienced as she was, she should have been able to accomplish so much; the secret lay in her untiring application and self-reliance, as well as in her love for her children, to whom no mother could have been more devotedly attached. I have heard her say that at this period she had so many demands upon her time, that she only allowed herself four hours sleep.

Mrs. Raymond did not fail to reap the reward of her industry, and at the expiration of seven years she found her school so prosperous, that it became necessary to remove to a large house, and to engage the assistance of a partner. She had been but a short time settled in her new and handsome establishment, when she was surprised one day by the receipt of a letter from her husband, couched in terms expressive of the deepest contrition for his past conduct, soliciting her forgiveness, and urging her to receive him, promising faithfully should she do so, that he would give her no cause to repent. He said too that he had been idle for a long time, and that during his sufferings he had deeply repented of his sinful conduct, and that he had risen from a sick bed to implore her pardon. I need hardly say that the appeal was not in vain. What woman would have resisted it? True, the discovery of his utter worthlessness, and a long series of neglect and unkind treatment on his part, had changed her feelings, and she had long ceased to regard him with the blind but ardent affection through which she became his wife; but she could not forget that he was the father of her children, and she thanked God he had returned an altered man. And when she saw him feeble and emaciated as he was, shedding tears of penitence at her feet, she was almost overcome by her emotions, and readily assuring him of her forgiveness, she lent a willing ear to his promises that his future life should if possible erase from her mind the memory of the past.

Would that I might here drop the curtain, and allow the reader to infer that Mrs. Raymond was not disappointed in the confidence she so willingly placed in her husband's protestations. It is painful to say that she was again cruelly deceived; for a time, however, he behaved tolerably well, and appeared to receive the care and attentions of his wife with some degree of gratitude. But this did not last long, and before many months had elapsed he cast aside the veil of hypocrisy in which he had presented himself on his return, and once more resumed his former character. It would be difficult to describe the anguish of his wife on again finding herself a victim to his duplicity. She had hoped that the presence of the children (who were both more than commonly interesting) would have softened and subdued him into something like kindness and parental affection for them, but in vain; he seemed in this respect to outrage a common law of nature, and treated them in so coarse and brutal a manner, that Lucy found herself obliged to endure the pain of a separation from her children, by confiding them to the care of her father. Her partner now thought it advisable to leave, and established another school in the neighborhood, to which many of her pupils were removed by their parents, who would not permit them to remain any longer under the same roof with a person of Raymond's character.

Mrs. Raymond's patience and perseverance seemed to endure no abatement, as month after month she toiled on for the maintenance of her family, and although her friends strongly urged her to return to them again, she refused to do so for the present, saying she still hoped that he might one day be won to the paths of rectitude; and she might probably have persevered in her intention, had it not been for the following circumstance. One morning Raymond received a letter, the perusal of which appeared to occasion him some confusion, and on this being remarked by his wife, who said she hoped he had learned no unpleasant intelligence, he gruffly replied that the letter related to some business which called him out of town for a few days, and coolly asking her for ten guineas, he departed. In going out, he had in his haste forgotten the letter which he left upon the table. Lucy took it up, and read but a few lines before she sank senseless on the floor. It contained a proof of additional depravity on the part of her husband, for which she was not prepared; it was dated from Ireland, and written by a woman whom he had evidently married, and deserted previous to his return to London. From the tenor of the letter it appeared that he had left her with the plea of visiting his friends in England, but not hearing from him since, her anxiety had been so great, that she had determined to follow him, and with her babe she expected to arrive in London on the following day. The letter was written with much of the warmth of feeling which is a characteristic of the Irish, but apparently by one in humble rank; and on reading it a second time Lucy shed tears of pity and sympathy for the writer. This discovery occasioned her to break up her school immediately, and on Raymond's return home he found she had gone, leaving him the following letter:

'I have left you Henry, and forever! How I have borne with your unkindness you well know, and I was willing to endure it still farther, hoping (though sometimes almost against hope) that I should yet be rewarded for my long suffering, in seeing you an altered man. But my present determination is occasioned by the accidental discovery that you had married another during your desertion of me and my helpless little ones. I need not say how I was affected on reading the letter of the confiding young creature, whom in her turn it appears that you have also abandoned. In consequence of her anxiety for you, she has left her friends and her home to follow you to a strange land. Do not repay this act of devotion by ingratitude, or refuse to provide for her as your wife. In marrying her, you have it is true committed a crime for which you stand amenable to the laws of your country, but be assured that I shall never be the means of exposing it. All I have to request of you is, that you will never again seek to claim a re-union with me, and leave the children to my future care. I leave at your disposal the furniture of the house, and enclosed is the half of a sum which I had privately laid aside. The remainder I have retained to assist me in establishing a school in some place more distant from London. Your children shall be taught to pray for your welfare, and may that great Being, whose laws you have so much transgressed, lead you to repentance.

LUCY RAYMOND.'

Mrs. Raymond was warmly welcomed by her father's family, but her renewed sufferings severely afected her constitution, and for a long time after her return she continued so ill that it was the opinion of her medical attendants that she was on the verge of consumption, and that unless change of air to another climate was immediately resorted to, it was not probable that she would long survive. A short time previous to this, Mr. Aylmer had received an offer of a station in a distant land which presented a more extensive sphere for his usefulness, and promised some considerable advantages; but it was some time before he or his wife could resolve to tear themselves away from their friends and their native land, and when at length they decided to go, it was agreed that Lucy and her children should accompany them, and their preparations for a voyage to America were commenced without loss of time. At that period this was no trifling undertaking, as in many instances it then occupied almost as many weeks as it now does days, and the comfortable accommodations of one of our plainest packet ships were unknown.

It was a sad parting between the friends, and the hope of meeting again after the lapse of a few years, alone caused Mr. Dalton to consent to it, and amid tears and fervent prayers they parted—forever. After a tedious voyage of eleven weeks, and suffering much from privation and sea sickness, the travellers reached their destination. Mr. Aylmer was appointed to reside in C—, then only a large village, beautifully situated on the banks of the noble St. Lawrence. It would be amusing, but it would make my tale too long, to describe many little circumstances connected with their settling in their new abode. Suffice it to say, that at the expiration of a year, Mrs. Raymond found herself quite restored to health, when she embraced an opportunity of opening a school in the city of —. Here she resided for many years, and was eminently successful in her vocation. She gained the highest esteem and confidence of all with whom she became acquainted. By her numerous pupils she was warmly beloved, and after educating some of their children, she retired from her school to a handsome house purchased by a part of her earnings, the remainder of which ensured her even more than a comfortable competence during the rest of her days; and but a few years since, she died surrounded by her grand-children. It is probable that her husband never knew what became of her, and after some farther years had been spent in his ruinous career he died a victim to his own folly from an injury received in a quarrel at a gaming house.

Although I have thus attempted to sketch the outlines of Mrs. Raymond's life, my pen can but feebly describe the worth of this excellent woman with whom I had the pleasure of being long and intimately acquainted. Hers was indeed a noble heart. How generous, kind and affectionate she was! Never have I known a being more wholly divested of selfishness;

it seemed as if she lived but for others, and sought her own happiness in that of those around her. Usually cheerful and happy in her deportment, few could have imagined how severe had been the trials of her early life. It was from no want of an independent mind that she abstained from openly avowing her belief in the final 'restitution of all things;' she was peculiarly situated, and to have done this, would in all probability have lost her the means of maintaining herself and family, in perhaps the only way in which she could have done so. But if she kept 'all these things in her heart,' they were shown in her life and in her teachings. Never did she seek to win the youthful heart to God, by fearful threatenings of his wrath and vengeance! She sought to do this by showing his love and pity to man, his goodness in the creation, his wisdom in the various laws of nature; and pointing to the hand of God in the changing seasons, in the glorious tints of sunset, in the path of the majestic moon, and the countless stars, shining on as when at the creation they 'sang together'—in short, in every thing that was pure and beautiful. And though she has gone down to the silent grave, yet we trust that the influence of her spirit still remains upon earth—her memory is a shrine of pleasant things to one at least, who was so happy as to have received the seeds of instruction from her hands.

THE MISSION OF CHRIST.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

OH yes! there is joy in sincerely believing,
No heart that is faithless can dream of, or know;
There is strength in the thought that our souls are receiving Such wealth as a Father alone can bestow.
Then away with the dogma that sin is eternal!
It dims the bright glow of Immanuel's name;
For it was not to build up a kingdom infernal
That Jesus, the Friend of the sorrowful, came.

It was not to lay in the path of the blinded
High walls over which they must stumble and fall,
That He came, all sublime, and serene, and high-minded,
And laid down his life—a redemption for all!
It was not to slaughter, in anger and blindness,
The wandering lambs that were dying of cold,
That he lifted them up to his bosom in kindness,
And brought them all home to their rest in the fold.

He is good,—and the heart that serenely reposes
And lays down its burthens to rest in his love,
Will find that the door of salvation ne'er closes
So long as one sinner continues to rove.
He loves the young lambs the' afar they are straying,
He seeks out the weary with tender concern;
Oh hear his soft voice in the wilderness praying,
'To the arms of your Saviour, poor lost ones, return!'

REFLECTIONS AT THE GRAVE OF AN INFANT.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

THE radiant smile of joy gilded the glad green earth, and the murmuring songs of melody swelled forth from every thicket, and dew spangled hedge, as the golden sun looked proudly down from his orient lattice, to gladden with his vivifying beams the varied and smiling landscape. The silver-chiming rills, dancing merrily on through glen and glade, or along the flower-gemmed meads, rang forth the deep cadences of joy and love. The twittering swallow, as it darted along through sunshine and shade moved by the glad impulse of joy, heeded not the wail of agony that thrilled so moaningly upon the balmy air. The wild bird in its noiseless flight, softly silent as the snow flake's fall, seemed all unmindful of human woe, as its sunlit wing flashed across the vision, like forms of light that greet the fancy in the hushed hours of midnight, and vanished as suddenly. Alas! the glorious sunlight fell cold and cheerless upon one aching spirit. The choral sounds of joy and mirth fell cold upon the heart. It seemed but bitter mockery to the stricken heart, for each wild gush of music spake sadly of joys forever departed.

Strange, that the sad wail of grief should so blend and mingle with the stirring notes of joy and bliss. But few short days had passed, since a laughing cherub was mingling its silvery notes with the lark's glad hymn; now pale as the withered lily it rested unconsciously upon its pillow, no more to gladden the mother's pilgrimage through this vale of sighing and tears. I had seen it in its faultless beauty, its glad eyes flashing with spirit-light, its radiant curls dancing to the light-winged zephyr, and its merry laugh ringing gaily on the breeze; a thing of life, and hope, and joy, I had seen it clasped with unutterable tenderness, to the bosom of maternal love. But now the very sunbeams seemed to mock her anguish, for her first born blessing—fairer than the dew gemmed flowers, slept—not upon the soft bosom that had so often pillowed his rest; he slept in the chill embrace of the shadowy angel of death. O how lovely are thy forms thou angel of the unseen clime! Though pale and rigid as the monumental alabaster, yet the smile that curled those death cold lips, was pure and passionless as the signet of immortality upon the unsullied brow of innocence.

Thou weepest, childless mother! Ah well thou mayest. The son of God wept at the grave of his friend, but thou mournest for thy first, thine only one. Hard it is for thee to lay him down in his peerless beauty in the damp, cold mansions of the dead. Memory tells thee thou art desolate. It tells thee too of playful smiles, of soft and winning tenderness now shrouded by the icy veil of the spoiler. It tells of the sweet, wild throbbings of bliss that thrilled thy soul while softly soothing its slumbers. Now the dark waving foliage of the cypress must be its shelter; the narrow house its resting place. Thou weepest childless mother! and well thou mayest, for never again shalt thou gaze upon that beauteous brow. Thou must take the last long gaze of agony, and start, as thou imprintest the burning kiss of woe upon those icy lips; and then the grave shall forever curtain that vision of loveliness from thy sight. Well mayest thou exclaim—

‘No more my lov’d one, shalt thou lie
With drowsy smile, and half shut eye,
Pillowed upon thy mother’s breast,
Serenely sinking into rest;
For God has laid thee down to sleep
Like a pure pearl beneath the deep.’

Yet dry thy tears bereaved one, for angels are descending to comfort thee. Heardest thou not their music, when that gentle spirit was wafted on seraph pinions up to the realms of unclouded splendor?

O how that young spirit exulted, as the regions of immortal felicity burst upon his wondering vision. How soaringly his untried pinions swept along the ethereal pathway, joying in freedom; freedom from all that can sully or annoy the heaven born soul—from sin and pain and death.

Look abroad fond mother upon the ways of sinful man, and repine no more that God hath made thy child an angel in the regions of the blest. His song now mingles with the anthems of praise and thanksgiving around the throne of the eternal. No blight or darkening change can reach him there. Sanctified from sin and pollution, safe in the arms of unchangeable love; secure from the stormy blast of iniquity, he rests in the haven of glory, with Him who is from everlasting. Then mourn no more! Thy separation is but for a little season; and then thy glorified spirit shall fly to meet thy beloved one, upon the starry shores of unfading bloom.

THE CERTAIN TRIUMPH OF THE REDEEMER.

BY HENRY BACON.

If it were a subject for amusement, we should certainly be very much amused with the continual use of the language of Universalism by those who deem that doctrine the rankest heresy. It is certain, that when a theological preacher, or writer, wishes to rise to the true heights of lofty expression, without doing violence to the tender humanities of feeling, he always uses the utterances of the prophetic spirit of our faith; and the enthusiasm of soul awakened thereby is strangely communicable, as the glowing countenance of the hearer or reader testifies. Is not the heading of this article an instance to the point? copied, as it is, from the title of a discourse by President Wayland, of Brown University. Is there any real, emphatic meaning in it, separate from our views of Christ’s mission? There is not; for a chief glory of our faith is its completeness—comprehending under the head of sureness every thing essential to ‘the CERTAIN triumph of the Redeemer.’

Where is such a completeness—such an entireness, seen in any other system? The only system which in the least has an analogous feature, is old fashioned Calvinism; though the completeness of that system is of a vastly different character. It takes its position in defence of partial Election and Reprobation; and, true to the spirit of the defence, its disciples boldly affirm that God will be as much glorified in the misery of the latter class, as in the blessedness of the former. Every part is ingeniously linked together; there are no discrepancies any where; and the whole is as a perfect piece of mechanism designed to produce exquisite music for the party in one room, and to torture an imprisoned company in another apartment. Hence the solemn, but little regarded voices, which are lifted up with the note of warning against ‘new lights,’ declaring that ‘he that offendeth in one point, is guilty’ of relinquishing allegiance to the whole system—they touch a wheel or wheels which are so combined with all the others, that a variation of their movement affects the whole, and will soon wear every pivot, loosen every screw, distend every band, till the violent action shall weaken every tenon and mortise, and the whole fabric sink in ruins, singing its own knell as its heated members fall hissing and bubbling into the waters of oblivion.

The completeness of Universalism is well comprehended in its name. It alone, in glorious majesty, yet beautiful simplicity, defends the certain triumph of Jesus as the Redeemer according as prophecy proclaimed he would be, and as the Infinity of God requires. It alone, with a voice that never falters, and a tone of unvarying love, defends the supremacy of good; and that there is throughout the entire universe, an eclectic spirit operating for eternal ends. It penetrates to the realities of the works of the Creating Mind in nature’s round, and finds in every fact, the relations of which are discovered, hints to strengthen a belief that the whole scheme is one of complete and entire benevolence. It bids science and philosophy go forth in their strength to plunge the shaft to the deepest depths till they break the granite roof of the central fire, or scale the heavens till they leap from world to world with the feet of light, and tells them that the first and last echo will be, ‘God is Love!’ It commands that that echo be heard every where and always; that amid the jar and noise of tumultuous minds and the wild and passionate demands of vengeance and selfishness, its spirit should be obeyed unfalteringly, declaring that, whatever be the distracting circumstances inclining to doubt and cessation of effort, that is the only law of action, and that if in the hands of God and man it fail,

'The pillared firmament is rottenness,
And earth's base built on stubble.'

It cannot, will not fail. When man must leave its application, God does not desert it, but gives it conquest. Love and Renovation are one; God's glory and Human Redemption are united, and are inseparable.

President Wayland, in the discourse alluded to, offers as the first proof of 'the certain triumph of the Redeemer,' the 'adaptedness' of the Gospel 'to gratify the wants of the sensitive part of our nature.' I emphasise this proposition to suggest an order of thought or reflection; as by 'the sensitive,' he unquestionably referred to our sensibilities, or feelings, or perhaps more properly to the capacity of being moved to feeling—moral, intellectual, and religious feeling.

Now what other view of the Gospel can we take than that denominated Universalism, and maintain the idea that the Gospel is adapted to our sensitive nature—to produce lofty, pure, strengthening and joyous feeling? What ingenious efforts have been used to keep down those pure and expansive feelings that demand some prospect better than popular theology presents, and to assure the bleeding spirit that all will be clear in the light of eternity—that there God will annihilate or deaden those sensibilities and sympathies that now plead so strong for complete Salvation—the redemption of the world.

Such efforts miss their object, for the heart, with its deep affections, will speak out. It will remain human, however fiendish the creed may be. And around us, the strong affections are laboring, as the waters far down in the earth lift themselves degree by degree, till they burst through the earthly confines and spread the fruitful moisture abroad. Greenness and beauty spring up, and the loveliness of the operating spirit is confessed because of the richness called into being.

Reader, if to thee there is the sublimest meaning given by thy faith to the caption of this article, see that thou makest a direct personal application of it. Is a certain triumph given to the Redeemer in thy own being? Is there in thee victory complete for Zion's King? Are all imaginations cast down that should be? and is every thought brought into captivity to the obedience of Christ? Is every high thing that exalted itself against the knowledge of God removed? and art thou one with the Master?

GIFTS OF CHARITY. When men publicly proclaim their deeds of benevolence, it always reminds one of a certain minister who expected that he should sit on the best seat in heaven for his good deeds here. PR.

THE RETURN.

BY IONE.

WELCOME, most welcome! For our sunny hearth
Grew dark without thee, and our brooding fears
Threw countless dangers on thy distant path,
Till but thy name called forth the truant tears.

Welcome, thrice welcome! Life too soon is told
For such long partings to be calmly borne!
Why should the loved and loving leave the fold—
While the bereaved in lonely sorrow mourn?

Welcome most welcome! For the joyous band
Unbroken now, shall one by one depart,
Till all are gathered to the happy land
That knows no weary or divided heart!

When summoned hence to know our home no more,
And tremblingly to seek our Maker's face,
What shall our faded hope and peace restore
But a kind welcome from the throne of grace?

SECRECY.

WE transfer to our pages from the editorial columns of the 'New World' a sensible and useful article on Secrecy. It discusses briefly an important moral duty, and attention to the suggestions of the writer will prevent the recurrence of many evils which disturb social and domestic life. Too many deem it a sufficient apology for making common talk of what is heard at the home-table, that no injunction was laid upon them to keep it to themselves, whereas the very nature of the conversation dictated such prudence. 'A tale bearer separateth very friends,' said the wise man; and it is so every day, from the repetition of remarks uttered in the warmth of momentary excitement, or while the sting of some wrong touches the soul which is plucked out very soon by the hand of forgiveness that throws it away. But to the article:

'For once that secrecy is formally imposed upon you, it is implied a hundred times by the concurrent circumstances. All that your friend says to you, as a friend, is entrusted to you only. Much of what a man tells you in the hour of affliction, in sudden anger, or in any out-pouring of the heart, should be secret. In his craving for sympathy, he has spoken to you as to his own soul.'

'To repeat what you have heard in social intercourse is sometimes a sad treachery; and when it is not treacherous, it is often foolish. For you commonly relate but a part of what has happened, and even if you are able to relate that part with fairness, it is still as likely to be misconstrued as a word of many meanings, in a foreign tongue without the context.'

'There are a few conversations which do not imply some degree of mental confidence, however slight. And in addition to that which is said in confidence, there is generally something which is peculiar, though not confidential; which is addressed to the present company alone, though not confided to their secrecy. It is meant for them or for persons like them, and they are expected to understand it rightly. So that when a man has no scruple in repeating all that he hears to anybody that he meets, he pays but a poor compliment to himself; for he seems to take it for granted that what was said in his presence, would have been said, in the same words, at any time, aloud and in the market place. In short that he is the average man of mankind: which we doubt much whether any man would like to consider himself.

On the other hand, there is an habitual and unmeaning reserve in some men, which makes secrets without any occasion; and it is the least to say of such things that they are needless. Sometimes it proceeds from an innate shyness or timidity of disposition; sometimes from a temper naturally suspicious; or it may be the result of having been frequently betrayed or oppressed. From whatever cause it comes, it is a failing. As cunning is some men's strength, so this sort of reserve is some men's prudence. The man who does not know when, or how much, or to whom to confide, will do well in maintaining a Pythagorean silence. It is his best course, we would not have him change it on any account; we only wish him not to mistake it for wisdom.

The happy union of frankness and reserve which is to be desired, comes not by studying rules, either for candor or for caution. It results chiefly from an uprightness of purpose enlightened by a profound and delicate care for the feelings of others. This will go very far in teaching us what to confide and what to conceal, in our own affairs; what to repeat, and what to suppress in those of other people. The stone in which nothing is seen, and the polished metal which reflects all things, are both alike hard and insensible.

When a matter is made public, to proclaim that it had ever been confided to your secrecy may be no trifling breach of confidence; and it is the only one which is then left for you to commit.

With respect to the kind of people to be trusted, it may be observed that grave proud men are very safe confidants; and that those persons, who have ever had to conduct any business in which secrecy was essential, are likely to acquire a habit of reserve for all occasions.

On the other hand, it is a question whether a secret will escape sooner by means of a vain man, or a simpleton. There are some people who play with a secret until at last it is suggested by their manner to some shrewd person who knows a little of the circumstances connected with it. There are others whom it is unsafe to trust. Not that they are vain, and so wear the secret as an ornament; not that they are foolish, and so let it drop by accident; not that they are treacherous, and so sell it for their own advantage. But they are simple minded people, with whom the world has gone smoothly, who would not themselves make any mischief of the secret which they disclose, and therefore do not see what harm may come of telling of it.

Before you make any confidence, you should consider whether the thing you wish to confide is of weight enough to be a secret. Your small secrets require the greatest care. Most persons suppose they have kept them sufficiently when they have been silent about them for a certain time; and this is hardly to be wondered at, if there is nothing in their nature to remind a person that they are told to him as secrets.

There is a good reason for using concealment even with your dearest friends. It is that you may be less liable to be reminded of your anxieties when you have resolved to put them aside. Few persons have tact enough to perceive when to be silent, and when to offer you counsel and condolence.

You should be careful not to entrust another unnecessarily with a secret which it may be a hard matter for him to keep, and which may expose him to somebody's displeasure, when it is hereafter discovered that he was the object of your confidence. Your desire for aid, or for sympathy, is not to be indulged by dragging other people into your misfortunes.

'There is as much responsibility in imparting your own secrets, as in keeping those of your neighbor.'

THE CALL

BY MISS C. A. FILLEBROWN.

'AND they heard a great voice from heaven, saying unto them'—'Come up hither.'—REV. xi. 12.

Rise from your low pursuits,
Ye grovelling earth-worms! whom the rising sun
Sees heaping greedily your golden fruits,
And toiling still when the long day is done.

The gold hath dimmed your sight—
Ye grope like blind men in the light of day.
O cower no longer 'mid the shades of night,
Bask in the glory of the sun's full ray!

Ye weary ones and lone,
Whose hearts are sorrowing for the loved and lost,
Who yearn to hear the gentle music-tone
Of some young victim to the early frost—

And thou, whose troubled soul,
Sick of the world's contention, noise and strife,
And pressing forward to the eternal goal,
Pants for the waters of Immortal Life—

Come to the better land!
Here the beloved shall thy spirit greet,

Radiant with beauty mid the seraph-band,
And chanting anthems most divinely sweet.

Here shalt thou find the rest,
Pilgrim of earth! for which thy soul did long!
And when the golden cup thy lip hath prest,
Then shall thy spirit be made glad and strong.

O maiden young and gay!
Dream'st thou that youth and beauty must depart?
That clouds will gather o'er thy sunlit way,
And sorrow quench the gladness of thine heart?

When those dark days shall come,
As come they will—lift up thy tearful eye!
O 'come up hither'—to thy spirit's home
Where joys are changeless and love cannot die!

Turn from Ambition's dream!
Ye who are toiling up the hill of Fame;
For it will prove—all-glorious tho' it seem,
A glittering bauble, and an empty name!

Break now the bonds of sin!
Why waste ye thus the blessings God has given?
Who will not strive the 'Crown of Life' to win,
And 'come up hither'—to the joys of Heaven?—

PICTURES IN OUR ROOM.

WE always, from early childhood, put up pictures in our room, and the only evil arising from the practice was that of adding something to the already too great attraction of 'the study'—for we always had a study. We always loved pictures, for by them we could have just such a company, from all ages and nations, as we pleased; and as the mood was, we could have companions for gaiety or sorrow, success or disappointment, vexation or satisfaction. And then too, how many clouds have been dispersed by the bright smiles of a happy face that with its omnipotent witchery looks upon me from one niche, and how has many a grief been hushed and made as nothing by the sight of the suffering martyr! We well remember a day of intense anguish, when we lay with racking torture in every portion of our frame, and chanced to gaze on a picture. It was 'Jesus bearing the Cross meeting his Mother.' We gazed and gazed till we turned away abashed and ashamed to make so much ado, even mentally, about our own pains. And many such transformations have been effected by pictures in our room. We want to tell the world about some of those pictures, and as we cannot spare the copies we have, nor distribute them to a tithe of our friends, we mean to try something at word-painting and give such copies as we can in that way. But before we commence this effort, we would ask the reader to give a little thought to some sensible remarks of Leigh Hunt in his 'Indicator.'

'May we exhort such of our readers as have no pictures hanging in their rooms, to put one up immediately? we mean in their principal sitting-room;—in all their rooms, if possible, but, at all events, in that one. No matter how costly, or the reverse, provided they see something in it, and it gives them a profitable or pleasant thought. Some may allege that they have "no taste for pictures;" but they have a taste for objects to be found in pictures,—for trees, for landscapes, for human beauty, for scenes of life; or, if not for all these, yet surely for some one of them; and it is highly useful for the human mind to give itself helps towards taking an interest in things apart from its immediate cares or desires. They serve to refresh us for their better conquest or endurance; to render sorrow unselfish; to remind us that we ourselves, or our own personal wishes, are not the only objects in the world; to instruct and elevate us, and put us in a fairer way of realizing the good opinions which we would all fain entertain of ourselves, and in some measure do; to make us compare notes with other individuals, and with nature at large, and correct our infirmities at their mirror by modesty and reflection; in short, even the admiration of a picture is a kind of religion, or additional tie on our consciences, and rebinding of us (for such is the meaning of the word religion) to the greatness and goodness of nature.

'Mr. Hazlitt has said somewhere, of the portrait of a beautiful female with a noble countenance, that it seems as if an unhandsome action would be impossible in its presence. It is not so much for restraint's sake, as for the sake of diffusiveness of heart, or the going out of ourselves, that we would recommend pictures; but, among other advantages, this also, of reminding us of our duties, would doubtless be one; and if reminded with charity, the effect, though perhaps small in most instances, would still be something. We have read of a Catholic money-lender, who, when he was going to cheat a customer, always drew a veil over the portrait of his favorite Saint. Here was a favorite vice, far more influential than the favorite Saint; and yet we are of opinion that the money-lender was better for the Saint than he would have been without him. It left him faith in something; he was better for it in the intervals; he would have treated his daughter the better for it, or his servant, or his dog. There was a bit of heaven in his room,—a sun-beam to shine into a corner of his heart,—however he may have shut the window against it, when heaven was not to look on.

'The companionship of any thing greater or better than ourselves must do us good, unless we are destitute of all modesty or patience. And a picture is a companion, and the next thing to the presence of what it represents. We may live in the thick of a city, for instance, and can seldom go out, and "feed" ourselves but we can put up a picture of the fields before us, and, as we get used to it, we shall find it the next thing to seeing the fields at a distance. For every picture is a kind of window, which supplies us with a fine sight; and many a thick, unpierced wall thus lets us into the studies of the greatest men, and the most beautiful scenes of nature. By living with pictures we learn to "read" them,—to see into every nook and corner of a landscape, and every feature of the mind; and it is impossible to be in the habit of these perusals, or even of being vaguely conscious of the presence of the good and beautiful, and considering them as belonging to us, or forming a part of our common-places, without being, at the very least, less subject to the disadvantages arising from having no such thoughts at all.

With pleasure of the breathing fields;

'And it is so easy to square the picture to one's aspirations, or professions, or the powers of one's pocket. For, as to resolving to have no picture at all in one's room, unless we could have it costly, and finely painted, and finely framed, that would be a mistake so vulgar, that we trust no reader of any decent publication now-a-days could fall into it. The greatest knave or simpleton in England, provided he is rich, can procure one of the finest paintings in the world to-morrow, and know nothing about it when he has got it; but to feel the beauties of a work of art, or to be capable of being led to feel them, is a gift which often falls to the lot of the poorest; and this is what Raphael or Titian desired in those who looked at their pictures. All the rest is taking the clothes for the man. Now it so happens, that the cheapest engravings, though they cannot come up to the merits of the originals, often contain no mean portion or shadow of them; and when we speak of putting pictures up in a room, we use the word "picture" in the child's sense, meaning any kind of graphic representation, oil, water-color, copper-plate, drawing, or wood-cut. And any one of these is worth putting up in your room, provided you have mind enough to get a pleasure from it. Even a frame is not necessary, if you cannot afford it. Better put up a rough, varnished engraving, than none at all,—or pin, or stick up, any engraving whatsoever, at the hazard of its growing ever so dirty. You will keep it as clean as you can, and for as long a time; and as for the rest, it is better to have a good memorandum before you, and get a fresh one when you are able, than to have none at all, or even to keep it clean in a portfolio. How should you like to keep your own heart in a portfolio, or lock your friend up in another room? We are no friends to portfolios, except where they contain more prints than can be hung up. The more, in that case, the better.

'People are in general quite enough inclined to look after the interests of "number one;" but they make a poor business of it, rich as they may become, unless they include a power of forgetting it in behalf of number two; that is to say, of some one person, or thing, besides themselves, able to divert them from mere self-seeking. It is not uncommon to see one solitary portrait in a lawyer's office, and that portrait, a lawyer's, generally some judge. It is better than none. Any thing is better than the poor, small unit of a man's selfish self, even if it be but the next thing to it. And there is the cost of the engraving and frame. Sometimes there is more; for these professional prints, especially when alone, are meant to imply, that the possessor is a shrewd, industrious, proper lawyer, who sticks to his calling, and wastes his time in "no nonsense;" and this ostentation of business is in some instances a cover for idleness or disgust, or a blind for a father or rich uncle. Now it would be better, we think, to have two pictures instead of one, the judge's by all means, for the professional part of the gentleman's soul,—and some one other picture, to show his client that he is a man as well as a lawyer, and has an eye to the world outside of him, as well as to his own; for as men come from that world to consult him, and generally think their cases just in the eyes of common sense as well as law, they like to see that he has some sympathies as well as cunning.

'Upon these grounds, it would be well for men of other callings, if they acted in a similar way. The young merchant should reasonably have a portrait of some eminent merchant before his eyes, with some other, not far off, to hinder him from acknowledging no merit but in riches. Or he might select a merchant of such a character as could serve both uses,—Sir Thomas Gresham, for instance, who encouraged knowledge as well as money-getting,—or Lorenzo de Medici, the princely merchant of Italy. So with regard to clergymen, to professions of all sorts, and to trade. The hosier, in honor of his calling, might set up Defoe, who was one of that trade, as well as author of Robinson Crusoe; the bookseller, may the footman, Dodsley, who was at one time a footman as well as a bookseller and author, and behaved excellently under all characters; and the tailor might baulk petty animadversions on his trade, by having a portrait, or one of the many admirable works, of the great Annibal Caracci, who was a tailor's son. It would be advisable, in general, to add a landscape, if possible, for reasons already intimated; but a picture of some sort we hold to be almost indispensably necessary towards doing justice to the habitation of every one who is capable of reflection and improvement. The print-shops, the book-stalls, the port-folios containing etchings and engravings at a penny or two-pence a-piece, (often superior to plates charged twenty times as much) and lastly, the engravings that make their way into the shop windows, out of the Annuals of the past season, and that are to be had for almost as little, will furnish the ingenuous reader of this article with an infinite store to choose from; and if he is as good-natured as he is sensible, we will venture to whisper into his ear, that we should take it as a personal kindness of him, and hope he would consider us a friend assisting him in putting it up.'

When we are obliged, in making a call, to tarry fifteen or twenty minutes alone in a room, we love pictures—especially first rate ones, full of objects suggesting ideas. They consume the time so pleasantly, and furnish so much matter for remark when the friend arrives! Why, a picture is almost as good as a child to talk about, especially if the child be not of amiable manners; and then too, how quick you can make a child 'take' to you by the aid of a good picture or two! But there is no need of lengthening the 'argument,' and so we end with advising our friends to make their rooms sociable by good pictures. They do very well in the place of sunshine where sunshine will not come.

THE DYING GIRL TO HER SISTER.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

Go, LIFT the curtain, sister,
For morn breaks o'er the hill,
And busy murmurs greet my ear
From our old moss-roofed mill.
I hear the robin on the porch,
The swallow 'neath the eaves;
And our old roof-tree swarms with birds
That sing amid its leaves.

They say I'm dying, sister,
But still I love the sound
Of that old wheel that still goes on
In its unwearying round.
I love to hear the pleasant notes
Of happy living things,
And breathe in all the fragrant sweets
That Spring profusely brings.

I would not keep my heart a nun
From human love and joy;
These have a strength within my soul
No suffering can destroy;
And still I love as e'er I loved,
To meet the sun's warm smile,
Or watch from my uneasy couch,
Our little haunted isle.

That pretty isle—Ah, sister!
How oft our little raft
I've paddled o'er the narrow stream
With quite an oarsman's craft;
And mooring it beneath the boughs
Of that o'er-arching tree,
Have spent whole days in braiding flowers
To crown mamma and thee.

How beautiful was mother
In that fantastic guise,
With smiles around her dimpled lips,
And blessings in her eyes!

Ah! now she wears a brighter wreath—
A crown of love and bliss;
We must not mourn that she is gone
To happier life than this.

And wilt thou weep, beloved,
When in the old church-yard,
They lay me gently down to rest
Beneath the grassy sward?
When o'er my grave the robin sings,
And little flowers spring up,
And crystal drops, from far-off stars,
O'erflow the violet's cup?

Ah! dear and gentle sister,
I shall not rest me there;
Far up and on, beyond the clouds
And fields of ambient air,
Far up and on, where mortal eye
Hath ne'er aspired to gaze,
I shall resume a life of rest
And of eternal praise!

Oh sister, dearest sister,
I love to live—to know;
But life and wisdom here on earth
Are not secure from wo.
'Tis better, therefore, that I leave
This world of partial bliss,
And live in regions far removed
From all that pains in this.

So dry thy tears, my loved one,
And sit thee by my side,
With mother's Bible in thy hand,
That long hath been our guide,
Read me some strong and soothing psalm—
Some holy words of Christ;
In hours of pain, for all my wants,
His love hath well sufficed.
